"We believe that this program may be accomplished without jeopardizing other important uses of public lands. We sincerely hope that national wilderness preservation may soon become a definite policy of Congress."

"Congress should go ahead with the measure, this session, and see to it that our wildernesses are preserved," the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times wrote in an editorial entitled "Special Interests in the Wilds."

OTHER REASONS, TOO

The editorial pointed out that preservation of wildernesses is needed "not only for their esthetic and historic value, but for the practical purposes the bill envisions, such as watershed protection, the opportunity to study plant and animal life in primitive surroundings, and for recreation."

Let the members of both Senate and House Interior Committees know of your support of the wilderness bill. Ask them to vote out the bill promptly. Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana, is chairman of the Senate committee.

WAYNE N. ASPINALL, of Colorado, is chairman of the House committee, and one Minnesotan, ODIN LANGEN, is a member. What you can do is write our own Senators and Representative and ask them to speak to committee members and tell them of your interest.

Ask them to vote for the bill when it comes up for passage. Address your letters: Senator (or Representative): (Name), Senate or House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

I figure that anyone who doesn't know the names of his Senators and his Representative wouldn't write anyway. I'm sure that Mr. LANGEN would be glad to receive letters from Minnesota people to let him know they are interested in the wilderness bill.

Opposition to the wilderness bill comes from those who want to turn everything into money immediately. They remind me of the type Thoreau describes in Walden, "who would carry the landscape, who would carry his God to market if he could get anything for Him."

RACIAL PROBLEMS

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I read in the Washington Post on January 2, 1960, excerpts from a lecture given by Dr. John A. Hannah. Called Racial Problems Pose Acid Test, this speech is all the more compelling because Dr. Hannah is both the Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, and the president of Michigan State University.

Dr. Hannah states:

In the few busy months of its existence, the Civil Rights Commission has learned that the basic problem is one of securing the full rights of American citizenship to those being denied in any degree "that vital recognition of human dignity, the equal protection of the laws." It has learned that, by and large, the problem is a racial problem.

At the time of the report of the Civil Rights Commission, I called the attention of this body to the suggestion that Federal registrars enroll the voters in cases of arbitrary denials of the right to vote. I have introduced legislation, the Federal Elections Registration Act, to assure that citizens of the United States will not be denied the right to vote in Federal elections because of their race, religion, color, or national origin.

In the context of Dr. John Hannah's speech, Mr. President, I agree with his encouraging view on the extension of our voting franchise in this country. Historically, we have extended the franchise to nonproperty owners, to women, and gradually, to other segments of the population. As Dr. Hannah states:

Indeed, the lag in Negro voting in some sections of the South is almost the sole remaining disfiguring blot on a record of which to be proud.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Dr. Hannah's remarks be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 2, 1960]

RACIAL PROBLEMS POSE ACID TEST

(By John A. Hannah)

(These excerpts are taken from a recent lecture delivered before the annual meeting of the Anti Defamation League of B'nai B'rith in New York. Dr. Hannah, president of Michigan State University, is Chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.)

In the few busy months of its existence, the Civil Rights Commission has learned that the basic problem is one of securing the full rights of American citizenship to those being denied in any degree "that vital recognition of human dignity, the equal protection of the laws." It has learned that, by and large, the problem is a racial problem.

The children and grandchildren of the waves of immigrants from the nations of Europe, reared and educated as Americans, have dispersed and strengthened our communities everywhere. Discrimination, once widespread and victimizing Americans for reasons of race, religion, national origin, and economics, is now largely concentrated upon our 18 million Negro citizens.

In part this is the old problem of the vicious circle. Slavery, economic discrimination, and second-class citizenship have demoralized a considerable portion of those suffering these injustices, and the consequent demoralization has then been seen by others as an excuse for continuing some of the very conditions that cause the demoralization.

The fundamental interrelationships among the subjects of voting, education, and housing make it impossible for the problem to be solved by the improvement of any one factor alone. If the right to vote is secured, but there is not equal opportunity in education and housing the value of that right will be discounted by apathy and ignorance.

If compulsory discrimination is ended in public education, but children continue to be brought up in slums and restricted areas of racial concentration, the conditions for good education and good citizenship will still not obtain. If decent housing is made available to nonwhites on equal terms but their education and habits of citizenship are not raised, new neighborhoods will degenerate into slums.

The Founding Fathers were not content with voicing lofty idealism. Being eminently practical men who had risked their lives in revolution against a powerful king and growing empire, they installed the basic elements of a political system by which these ideals might be achieved in time.

Both their idealism and their practicality were put to the test at the outset. Slavery was an established institution, and slavery was inconsistent with their ideals of human freedom and dignity. Being practical men, they arrived at a compromise, which was to forbid importation of slaves after a specific future date in the hope and belief that with the supply of human chattels cut off, the institution itself would eventually wither away in the heat and light of public discussion.

That they were wrong we know now; the political machine broke down when it was called upon to deal with this issue, and our country resorted to war to settle it, perhaps needlessly.

All this serves to emphasize the fact that the Negro problem has been with us from the beginning of our country, and that our success or failure in dealing with it has always been and continues to be the measure of our success or failure in the making practical reality fit our theoretical idealism.

All of our history, speaking generally, is a reflection of our constant concern that we have not as yet achieved the ideals to which we officially and traditionally aspire. This accounts, as Myrdal points out, for our propensity to self-criticism, which sometimes amazes and pains our friends and gives aid and comfort to our enemies.

But viewed in retrospect, our history is one of great overall progress toward the idealistic goals which we hold constantly before our eyes.

Take as one example the extension of the voting franchise. At the end of the Revolution we were a Nation of approximately 3,250,000. More than 1 million were not free—they were slaves or bondsmen. Of that 2 million free citizens, not more than 120,000 were allowed to vote. The others were disenfranchised because they were women, or did not own property of sufficient value, or for other reasons.

Today, the right to vote in most of America is almost universal. Property qualifications have been eliminated save for token poll taxes, and women have won the right to the ballot. Indeed, the lag in Negro voting in some sections of the South is almost the sole remaining disfiguring blot on a record of which to be proud. By this margin do we still fall short of our goal.

LOAN TO EGYPT BY WORLD BANK

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I was greatly shocked by the recent decision of the World Bank to extend a loan to Egypt for the improvement of the Suez Canal, despite the fact that that nation is violating its undertakings to maintain free transit in that canal by intercepting ships and cargoes bound for Israel.

I sought to warn the President of the Bank, the Honorable Eugene Black, against any such decision in advance, as did numerous other Members of Congress. The inappropriateness of our Government's supporting such a decision by the Bank in the face of the assurances by President Eisenhower in 1957, is just as obvious as the inappropriateness of the World Bank, as an agency of the United Nations, granting this assistance to a nation which is acting contrary to the basic principles for the administration of the Suez Canal laid down by the United Nations.

One new demonstration of popular opposition to this course in our country and an appeal to the President to take action to reverse such obstruction by Egypt is contained in a resolution adopted by the Pioneer Women of Chicago on January 6, 1960. I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD the text of this resolution, which so succinctly and strongly states the position which I believe our Government should take.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas after Israel's withdrawal from Sinai in response to requests from the United States, President Eisenhower said on February 20, 1957, "We should not assume that, if Israel withdraws (from Sinai), Egypt will prevent Israeli shipping from using the Suez Canal or the Gulf of Aquaba. If, unhappily, Egypt does hereafter violate the armistice agreement or other international obligations, then this should be dealt with firmly by the Society of Nations"; and

Whereas President Nasser of Egypt has flouted international law and has defied the United Nations Security Council resolution of September 1, 1951, calling upon Egypt "to terminate the restrictions on the passage of international commercial shipping and goods through the Suez Canal, wherever bound"; and

Whereas Egypt has broken its pledge in 1956 to abide by the six principles governing the operation of the nationalized Suez Canal; and

Whereas President Nasser has violated the promise that he made to United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold in July 1959, to allow transit for ships and cargoes if they were not Israel-owned at the time of their passage through the canal, and has ordered the seizing on December 18, 1959, of a Greek ship bound from Haifa, to Djibouti with a cargo of cement, and

Whereas, we note that our country continues to offer financial aid and political support to the United Arab Republic, thus whetting its appetite for fresh intrigues in the Middle East and Africa, threatening the lifeline and security of Israel, democracy's surest bulwark and ally in the Middle East, and posing new dangers to the peace of the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That Pioneer Women of Chicago assembled this day of January 6, 1960, do call upon President Eisenhower to remember his sacred pledge of February 1957, that any further attempts of Egypt to block Israel's shipping in the Suez Canal "should be dealt with firmly by the Society of Nations" and to initiate such steps immediately in American policy and practice, as well as seek such measure in the United Nations as may be necessary to halt President Nasser's continued violation of his own pledged word and international law. We are persuaded that firm action by our own President will introduce a new note of international morality in the problems of the Middle East and that this will advance his quest and ours for peace and justice.

Mrs. Samuel Kaplan.
EVELYN P. KAPLAN

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I mention this issue as one of some urgency today because the press reports that U.N. Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold is going to Cairo tomorrow, January 21, to renew his efforts to persuade President Nasser to lift the Suez Canal blockade against cargoes bound for Israel.

In this appeal I hope the Secretary General will have the warmest and most vigorous support of our Government and of the other member nations. I am confident that Members of the Senate from both parties believe such action essential.

The decision to grant the World Bank loan has been made. President Nasser has thus been granted the assistance of the U.N. in his plans for the Suez. Surely it is now timely to ask for some reciprocity from him and to urge him to abide by the U.N. decisions and his own promises of free transit in the canal.

The legal bargaining position of the United Nations is weakened by the World Bank's decision. But the moral bargaining position with the nation now assured of United Nations help is stronger than ever. I earnestly hope our Government will not lose this opportunity to advance the prospects for peace in the Middle East.

In addition, Mr. President, the interesting newsletter Near East Report, which comments upon American policy in the Near East, edited by Mr. I. L. Kenen, in its January 15, 1960, issue includes an editorial which raises a basic question all Members of Congress must face in connection with the mutual security program when it comes before the Congress this year. If a nation persistently flouts the decisions of the United Nations and uses boycotts, blockades, new arms from the Soviet Union and a proclaimed state of war against one of its neighbors to unsettle the peace and threaten the stability of nations in the Middle East, should our extension of assistance to such a nation be continued or accompanied by some conditions that seek to end these violations of United Nations obligations and policies which endanger the peace and security of the world?

I ask unanimous consent that the editorial from the Near East Report be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEUTRALISM OR COLLECTIVE SECURITY—WHICH?

President Eisenhower's state of the Union message stressed the need to help the underdeveloped countries whose poverty and stagnation provided a drab background for his epochal journey to Asia and Africa. But this responsibility may be shared. The administration is calling on prospering European nations whom we have helped in the past to join and lend a hand.

New questions are being raised on Capitol Hill. Should we proffer aid without conditions?

Within recent years, a shibboleth has gained credence. It has been argued that it is a mistake to put strings on our aid because new nations are suspicious, sensitive and easily offended. They want to be neutral. They will reject our good offerings if they suspect these impinge on their independence and sovereignty and convert them into satellites.

This natural aspiration of new governments to be free in the full sense of the word must be recognized. But freedom is never to be confused with license. While the free world must respect the wishes of these new countries to cast their votes in the United Nations as their own conscience and judgment dictate, this does not mean we must shut our eyes to neutralist and negative policies which are devoid of any sense of responsibility to the international community.

The concept of neutralism has no special virtue to recommend it. It is accepted all too easily by inexperienced nations which fail to grasp the full implications of collective security as the very condition of their survival. (But let their own borders be menaced and they are the first to deplore neutralism in others. One must draw a line between the policy of "nonidentification" which attempts to appraise international problems on their merits without a bloc precommitment, and the "neutralism" which measures issues by the egocentric criterion of self-interest and ignores duty to international law and to world cooperation and peace.

These questions are asked on Capitol Hill because the administration and Congress have been receiving many protests as a result of the $56.5 million loan to the UAR to improve the Suez Canal despite the misuse of that international waterway as an instrument of blockade and aggression. It has been argued that the World Bank is an economic instrument and could not reject the loan on political grounds—that political action is for governments, not banking institutions. Such an argument has naturally directed attention to our own Government, which is offering large assistance to the UAR for other projects without questioning its illegal policies.

More and more Congressmen are coming to believe that they must now write conditions into the mutual security program if it is to preserve the concepts of mutuality and security.

They ask:

Should we insist on freedom of the seas and respect for the prestige and authority of the United Nations?

Should we unconditionally grant aid to nations which: Carry on boycotts and blockades against neighbors? Acquire arms from the Soviet Union? Defy U.N. Security Council decisions? Proclaim themselves in a state of war in contravention of the U.N. Charter?

It may be old fashioned to suggest that moral considerations should motivate our foreign policy. But the first half of this century has taught us that material and security interests are jeopardized—and millions of lives are inevitably squandered—when nations affect neutralist isolationism and turn their backs on collective security.

DISCLOSURE OF FINANCE CHARGES IN CONNECTION WITH EXTENSIONS OF CREDIT

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I am encouraged by the widespread and favorable response to the introduction of S. 2755, a bill to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit.

One of the most pointed and discerning comments on the bill was made by Mr. Edward P. Morgan on the American Broadcasting network, on January 11, 1960. I ask unanimous consent that the text of Mr. Morgan's comment be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"Never give a sucker an even break," that bumblingly belligerent and craftily calculating comedian W. C. Fields used to say. On the theory, presumably, that the term sucker and customer are synonymous, a number of merchants have religiously tried to follow Fields' advice in building their business practices. This category of sharpies has been thinned down gradually by the pressure and protests of ethical competitors, by legislation on various levels and perhaps even by some added discernment on the part of the buying public. But one area which has yielded less readily to treatment is that involving interest rates and purchases on the installment plan. One of the economic experts of Capitol Hill, Senator PAUL DOUGLAS, Democrat of Illinois, thinks it is time to plunge into this labyrinth of deceptive double charges and straighten it out with some clear labeling.

Last Thursday, with active liberal encouragement in both Houses, Douglas introduced in the Senate a bill to require that consumers be given true and lucid figures about interest rates and finance charges when borrowing money or buying things on credit.

"In too many instances today," DOUGLAS said, "the consumer who signs a document that places him in debt would have to be a lawyer to understand the fine print that spells out his rights and liabilities; and he would have to be an accountant or an expert in higher mathematics to compute the cost of the credit in simple annual terms. Altogether too often he is deceived into paying a higher cost for credit than he has been led to expect by the huckstering and fast-talking salesmen."

As the Wall Street Journal pointed out in a report on the Douglas bill, a small loan company which now tells a borrower simply that the interest rate on his loan is three percent per month would, under such a labeling act, have to specify that the annual interest rate might amount to 36 percent. And, a mortgage company would have to explain to the man getting a 6 percent home loan that finance charges on a $20,000 house might exceed $10,000 over a 25-year period.

What all this amounts to, in effect, is disclosure, something the public is coming more and more to expect. DOUGLAS himself was a prime force behind recently enacted laws requiring full accounting of employee welfare funds, whether union—or company run. One of the basic functions of the controversial new labor reform act is to bring to light the disposition of all union funds. It seems likely that when the full story of payola in broadcasting comes out remedial legislation will follow to prevent the practice of dispensing hidden payments for the plugging of certain products. The Illinois Senator reasons that there is a kind of payola in hidden interest rates and finance charges and he is hopeful that the current fashion for disclosure will provide an added impetus for his bill.

It is interesting to note, in this connection, that a bill on basic auto price labeling sailed through Congress in the summer of 1958 and there is no indication that it has had any adverse effect on the sale of cars; indeed the New York Times says today the prospect is bright in Detroit for record sales in 1960.

There is some speculation that the Douglas measure may gain support as an alternative to outright Federal controls on consumer credit which has swollen to what some economists consider alarming proportions, and/or that it might provide a qualified counter to high interest rates. DOUGLAS calculates that what consumers owe now on installment purchases, car loans, personal loans, mortgages and the like totes up to a staggering $175 billion in personal debt. Consumer credit, he argues, has been transformed from a "financing mechanism to a merchandising tool, where loans are disguised as sales, to the detriment of our economy." One theory is that if the public were aware of how much these loans cost it would ease off on borrowing. This may or may not be true but if the buying public has been played for a sucker in the past I suspect it was largely because it wasn't getting an even break with clearly labeled facts.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the pending amendment, as modified. Perhaps the modified amendment is not quite as objectionable as was the amendment when it was first read. Nevertheless, it is based upon the premise that a political committee which operates in only one State must file a Federal report.

We should remember that if in any State a majority of the people want to regulate the elections, and if they insist upon a certain type of reporting of expenditures, they can do so and they will do so. If we resort to the device—and certainly it is not a remedy; it does not solve anything—of transferring every problem to Washington, we do a disservice to the public.

The reports which are filed under the existing law are seldom referred to, although it is true that they may receive some publicity that is helpful in nature.

However, today we are asked to embark upon the following course: If a group of citizens band themselves together, and if they operate in only one State, to exercise the great American privilege of taking part in self-government, the pending amendment, as modified, would require them to file reports in Washington, or else face the imposition of a criminal penalty.

Mr. President, the existing law provides that a political committee must operate in two or more States if it is to come under the required reporting provisions. We have no assurance that the mere filing of the reports will change anything. In fact, I do think it will make changes for the worse; it will cause citizens who should be interested in participating in elections to decline to do so.

The average citizen is very intelligent, but he is also busy. He might be induced to take part, in his precinct or his county, in political activity—for instance, in the raising of funds and in the holding of meetings. But if, in addition, he were required to make Federal reports in regard to those activities, or else take the chance of criminal prosecution, fewer and fewer of the people would take part in such activities.

Certainly the objective of the election laws should be to have more and more citizens participate in the elections and the campaigns; and I think that would be good for the country. I also believe it would be wonderful if more people were to contribute to political campaigns, so as to spread the base, and if more people were to give smaller amounts.

But whenever we add to the reporting requirement—and I may say that the amendment, as modified, relates to the reporting requirement—fewer and fewer people will participate in the elections and in the campaigns; and the tendency of such a provision will be to drive campaign financing underground, instead of placing it out in the open, so more people will take part, and so their neighbors will know what is going on, and so the States will have absolute power, if they wish to exert it, to regulate and to require the making of reports.

On the other hand, if we confuse the picture, we discourage citizens from taking part in campaigns and elections and in financing them; and the effects of such discouragement would be bad.

Mr. President, perhaps this bill will not become law. If we add too many provisions here, the bill will not meet all the objections which will be raised both in this body and in the other one, and it will not be approved in conference, and will not become law. Certainly it will not become law in time to affect very many, if any, of the primaries in the country.

Mr. President, the Senate should reject these amendments. The bill as it stands is a compromise; but it is fair to everyone. It raises the limit on the amounts which can lawfully be spent; and that should be done. After all, in view of the high cost, today, of all things, it is not possible, in conducting a campaign, to remain within the present limits. So that situation leads to the formation of many committees or to practices which are not the best.

Therefore, Mr. President, I hope the Senate will leave the bill as it is, and will pass this needed legislation.

On the other hand, to insist upon adding these extreme amendments, which are of doubtful value, will be to insist upon having no legislation of this sort.

Mr. President, I favor the enactment of legislation in this field. Therefore, I expect to oppose this confusing amendment.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I know that sometimes legislation seems to be delayed because the Congress is persuaded to accept something less than the best or something less than what should be provided. I also recognize the validity of the argument that, under modern conditions, elections are expensive, and that in view of the great increase in the number of radio stations and television stations, considerable amounts of money must be expended in order to conduct a campaign for election to Federal office.

The raising of the limits on the amount of money a candidate may spend is a commendable objective of the bill. But, Mr. President, that, of itself, hardly would entitle the bill to be called a clean elections bill.

If this measure is to be a clean elections bill, it seems to me it should be fortified by means of provisions which would contribute to public knowledge of the sources of the funds employed for the election of candidates.

I suggested to the distinguished Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] that he increase the amount which would be the dividing line between reporting and nonreporting; and I proposed that the amount be increased from $1,000 to $2,500, because I thought the latter figure probably was a little more realistic, and because its use would simplify the situation for a committee which might spend money for the campaigns of several candidates.

But if a committee is going to spend as much as $2,500 in advocacy of the election or nomination of one candidate to Congress—to either the Senate or the House of Representatives—or if a committee is going to attempt to influence the selection of electors for President and Vice President, certainly the people have a right to know who is providing the money for those expenditures. That is all this bill will do, so far as I know.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield to me?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate very much the comments my learned friend has made in regard to the bill.

Does not he agree that instead of driving people out of political activity, the regulation of a multitude of committees formed within a State would tend to bring more people to have an active interest in politics, because then they would know the sources of some of the contributions, and they could judge accordingly; and the people would not feel—as so many do now, as evidenced by the relatively small percentage of the people who vote in our great national elections—a sense of frustration—in other words, that, after all, the Government of the country is in other hands, that someone else is pulling the strings behind the scenes, that contributions are being made for the purpose of influencing the elections, and that the people of the country never know the sources of the contributions, and never know how the committees which make the collections function, or, indeed, never know who the members of the committees are.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. That is my feeling and opinion about the matter. I believe the passage of the bill, with the provisions it contains and the amendments with which it has been modified, will increase the confidence of the public and more people will be willing to engage in politics. They will not have the feeling that perhaps things are being controlled from behind the scenes. The record will be open.

I certainly believe in public participation. I want the public generally, and on a broader scale, to take an active part in elections. If anyone hesitates to have his name included among the list of contributors for the promotion of the candidacy of some candidate for public office, the question must always arise, Why? Why? Why should anyone hesitate to let it be known that he is interested in the candidacy of somebody whom he wants to give some money for that campaign cause?

So I do not believe the objection that it may tend to discourage some contributions is of too much validity, Mr. President, for if someone does not want known his interest in a candidate and the support he is lending to him, then the question must come to mind, Why does he not want it known? What is there about his support that would make it a handicap to know that John Jones or Bill Smith was backing the candidate? If so, is not the public entitled to know about it? It seems to me the public is entitled to know the source of contributions by committees that spend $2,500 on behalf of a Federal candidate.

That is all this proposal does. For a minor or embryonic candidacy, a source might spend $500 or as much as $1,500 or $2,000, and the requirement would not apply to it, but when it gets to the point of spending as much as $2,500 to influence the election of a Federal candidate, then I believe the public is entitled to know the source of the contributions and the chairman or treasurer of the committee that is spending or distributing the funds.

Mr. MORSE. The question is on agreeing to the Hennings amendment, as modified.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on the Hennings amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The vote will be on the Hennings amendment, which is at the desk, identified as "1–13–60–D," as modified. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I announce that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CHAVEZ], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] are absent on official business.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. KERR] are absent because of illness.

The Senator from Florida [Mr. SMATHERS] is absent on official business in Latin America on behalf of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee studying economic conditions.

On this vote, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND] is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE]. If present and voting, the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay," and the Senator from New Jersey would vote "yea."

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH], the Senator from California [Mr. ENGLE], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY], and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] would each vote "yea."

Mr. KUCHEL. I announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DWORSHAK] are necessarily absent.

On this vote, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. CASE] is paired with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. EASTLAND]. If present and voting, the Senator from New Jersey would vote "yea," and the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 37, as follows:

YEAS—53

Aiken	Hartke	Martin
Allott	Hennings	Monroney
Anderson	Humphrey	Morse
Bartlett	Jackson	Moss
Bible	Javits	Mundt
Brunsdale	Johnson, Tex.	Murray
Byrd, W. Va.	Keating	Muskie
Cannon	Kefauver	Neuberger
Carroll	Kennedy	Pastore
Case, S. Dak.	Kuchel	Prouty
Clark	Lausche	Randolph
Cooper	Long, Hawaii	Smith
Dodd	Long, La.	Symington
Douglas	McCarthy	Wiley
Gore	McGee	Williams, Del.
Green	McNamara	Williams, N.J.
Gruening	Magnuson	Young, Ohio
Hart	Mansfield

NAYS—37

Beall	Fong	Robertson
Bennett	Frear	Russell
Bridges	Fulbright	Saltonstall
Bush	Goldwater	Schoeppel
Butler	Hayden	Scott
Byrd, Va.	Hickenlooper	Sparkman
Capehart	Hill	Stennis
Carlson	Holland	Talmadge
Cotton	Hruska	Thurmond
Curtis	Johnston, S.C.	Yarborough
Dirksen	Jordan	Young, N. Dak.
Ellender	McClellan
Ervin	Morton

NOT VOTING—10

Case, N.J.	Eastland	Proxmire
Chavez	Engle	Smathers
Church	Kerr
Dworshak	O'Mahoney

So Mr. HENNINGS' amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It is designated "1–13–60—G."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have the amendment read in full?

Mr. PROUTY. In view of the fact that the amendment has been on the desks of Senators for some time, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 17, strike out lines 8 to 27, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 608. (a) Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes contributions in an aggregate amount in excess of $5,000 during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or election, to or on behalf of any candidate for an elective Federal office with respect to which elections are conducted within the State in which the person making the contribution resides, including the offices of President of the United States and presidential and vice presidential electors, or to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"This subsection shall not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other State or local organization or to similar committees or organizations in the District of Columbia or in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico or in any possession of the United States.

"(b) Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes a contribution in any amount or of any value in connection with any campaign for nomination or election, to or on behalf of any candidate for an elective Federal office with respect to which elections are not conducted within the State in which the person making the contribution resides, or to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any such candidate, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"This subsection shall not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other State or local organization or to similar committees or organizations in the District of Columbia or in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico or in any possession of the United States, if such national committee or State or local committee or other State or local organization is a regularly organized adjunct of a national political party.

"(c) Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes a contribution out of funds made available to him for that purpose by another person in any amount or of any value in connection with any campaign for nomination or election, to or on behalf of any candidate for an elective Federal office (including the offices of President of the United States and presidential and vice presidential electors), or to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate for any such office or the success of any national political party shall, if he does not disclose at the time such contribution is made, the name of the person who made such funds so available to him, be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

"This subsection shall not apply to contributions made by a National, State, or local committee, or other State or local organization or by similar committees or organizations in the District of Columbia or in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico or in any possession of the United States, if such national committee or State or local committee or other State or local organization is a regularly organized adjunct of a national political party."

And on page 17, line 25, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)" and on page 18, line 15, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(e)".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, on this question, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, last night I was very glad to yield to the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] in order that he might offer the amendment which the Senate has just approved, because I knew that that amendment, if adopted, would operate well with the provisions contained in my amendment. In other words, my amendment is fully complementary to the one which the Senate has just approved.

The bill before the Senate is a good bill as far as it goes, but in no sense can it be considered a genuine election reform law.

The committee reported bill does alter obsolete limitations on spending; it tightens up reporting requirements and it improves publicity provisions. However, it does absolutely nothing to effectively curb certain unethical practices of some special interest groups seeking to circumvent regular party channels in their attempts to influence the choice and election of candidates in several States.

While not a cure-all, the amendment I have submitted does offer a realistic method for controlling some of the more flagrant of these unethical and unhealthy practices.

Four years ago, as a Member of the House of Representatives, I introduced a bill with similar objectives. At that time, Members will recall, Congress and the public were aroused over a shocking incident related on this floor.

The bill in its present form, as amended, is a much stronger bill than the bill which first came to the floor.

I think I can also say, without fear of contradiction, that if the amendment I am proposing is adopted we shall have completed a genuine electoral reform measure.

Four years ago a representative of a private interest went into a State not his own and attempted, in a roundabout way, to make a quiet contribution of $2,500 to the forthcoming campaign for reelection of a U.S. Senator from that State. It later developed that the individual attempting to make the donation was acting on behalf of parties financially interested in the outcome of a bill then before Congress.

It is to the everlasting honor and credit of this Senator that he brought this matter so openly to the attention of the American public.

Mr. President, let the integrity of our electoral process become tainted and subject to abuse and the very bedrock of our republican form of government is endangered.

Among our American people honesty of elections is taken for granted. When we learn of an occasional dishonest election we rightfully become incensed. We can attribute this to the probity of our people generally and to the integrity of most of our candidates. It decidedly is not due to Federal laws relating to campaign contributions and expenditures. These are so loosely drawn that if they do not encourage, at least they permit, deception and dishonesty.

It is no news to Members of this body, to representatives of information media, or to the public generally that a good deal of money is required to conduct a political campaign today, and that the cost is becoming increasingly higher. Newspapers, radio and television time, and travel have become campaign necessities and must be paid for.

Unless we are to say that only rich men should become candidates for public office we must recognize the need and make provision for campaign contributions. But the public possesses a genuine concern in the amount of, the source of, the character of, and the circumstances surrounding such contributions.

Most political contributions, I sincerely believe, are made with the honest and aboveboard intention of supporting one of contending philosophies of government, or because of respect and admiration for a particular candidate. We must recognize, however, that some political contributors may have selfish aims; they may expect quid for quo. It is this type of contribution that we must be concerned with and that my amendment seeks to control.

It was the intention of the founders of our Republic and of those who came after them that every Member of Congress should owe his election to the suffrage of his constituents and that he should be answerable only to them and to his conscience for his words and deeds.

Despite this intent, certain influences exist which tend to alter our traditional pattern. Not content with limiting their representation in Congress to Senators and Members of the House from their own State, as intended by the Constitution, some individuals have participated, directly or indirectly, in the nomination and election of candidates in States other than their own.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Would the Senator's amendment reach the situation I shall picture to him, and, if so, how? Suppose a man simply mails his contribution or leaves it on someone's doorstep. Would the Senator's amendment cover that kind of situation?

Mr. PROUTY. I believe that when I have concluded my prepared statement and have read a series of questions and answers, I will have answered the Senator's question to his satisfaction.

Some of these individuals to which I have referred may have been well intentioned and not motivated by selfish interest. Others, however, have had no such high-minded inspiration. Their financial contributions have been made with the hope, if not the understanding, that the candidate would cherish, protect and, if possible, advance their private, special interests.

It is my sincere conviction that citizens of one State should not meddle in the politics of another State. Certainly, they should not be permitted to influence, by contributions, the nomination or election of candidates in several States, for any reason whatsoever.

I am also firmly of the belief that no individual or group should have the right to make political contributions through a middleman. Not only does this conceal the identity of the real contributor, it also affords an opportunity for circumventing the statutory limitations relating to political contributions.

The amendment which I have offered to the bill (S. 2436), the Federal Elections Act of 1959, is not presented as a cure-all. It cannot change the minds and hearts of men with evil intent. It does, however, seek to control, in what I believe is a fair, realistic, and practical manner, the actions of their hands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont will suspend. Once more the Chair would state that the Senator from Vermont is entitled to attention, under the rules. He is deserving of being heard.

Mr. PROUTY. My proposal would prohibit any person from making a political contribution to, or on behalf of, any candidate seeking nomination or election outside the contributor's own State for the office of U.S. Senator or Representative in Congress.

There would be no prohibition, however, against contributing to presidential and vice-presidential candidates, since my proposal specifically permits contributions to, or on behalf of, candidates running in elections which are conducted within the State in which the person making the contribution resides.

Groups formed in one State, which are not affiliated with a national party, would be prohibited by my proposal from making contributions to influence the nomination or election of Senators and Representatives in other States. Of course, there would be no prohibition against activities of a local organized committee in a State making contributions so long as its activities were confined to elections within the State and are in conformity with the provisions of existing law.

National, State, and local committees which are genuine adjuncts of a national political party would be exempt, under my proposal, from the prohibition against interstate political donations. There are several good reasons for this exemption:

In the first place, no national political party organization or any adjunct thereof contributes financially to candidates in State primaries or other State nomination systems. They only contribute toward the election of candidates in several States.

This exemption would result in a more extensive channeling of campaign funds through legitimate political committees; and, under the law, such committees are required to file reports of their contributions and expenditures. Other committees professing to be educational or nonpolitical in character sometimes do not consider themselves so obligated.

Another major feature of my amendment would make it a violation of law for any person to make a political contribution out of funds made available to him for that purpose without disclosing at the time the contribution is made the name of the person or persons who made such funds available.

This "who gave it" provision would be applicable to contributions made to national political parties and genuine adjuncts thereof, but would not apply to contributions made by them.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, before he leaves that paragraph?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I have been listening most attentively to the Senator's explanation of his amendment. I wish to make sure that I understand it. I recall that when Senator Bob Taft was running for reelection, which was before I was a Member of the Senate, as a citizen I was much interested in his campaign, and I remember, poor as I was, I sent him $5 toward his campaign in the State of Ohio, although I was a resident of the State of New Hampshire. If the Senator's amendment were adopted, would it preclude that being done?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator could make the contribution if he made it to an adjunct of a national political organization in Ohio.

Mr. COTTON. An adjunct of a national political party?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. COTTON. This was an election campaign. It was sent, probably, to the treasurer of Senator Taft's own campaign. I had no special interest in any of the other candidates running in Ohio.

Would the Senator's amendment have precluded me if I had been wealthy enough to send Bob Taft $10,000? Could I have sent it to him under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes. I shall come to that a little later through a series of questions and answers, which I believe will bring out those points very clearly. I would much prefer not to yield further at this point until I have had an opportunity to conclude my statement and to read the series of questions and answers.

Mr. COTTON. I shall not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. PROUTY. I am sure I will clarify the point for the Senator.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask just one question on that point. Would the Senator's amendment preclude the possibility of a personal contribution to the Taft-for-Senator campaign in 1944 or 1950—just to use that as an illustration?

Mr. PROUTY. It would preclude the sending of money across State lines for use in a primary campaign. It would prohibit the interstate donation of funds in a primary campaign. Theoretically such a donation could be made if some political adjunct of a national political party or local State committee wished to receive the money and turn it over to the Taft-for-Senator campaign. It could be done on that basis. Obviously political organizations of national parties are not going to contribute financially to primary campaigns.

Mr. BUSH. However, whether it be a primary or an election campaign, after the primary the Senator's amendment would prohibit a gift from out of the State to the Taft-for-Senator campaign committee directly?

Mr. PROUTY. If the Senator will be patient, I will answer all those questions a little later on in some detail. Then the Senator will have a much better understanding of what my amendment proposes to do.

Mr. BUSH. I will not delay the Senator. The Senator had already covered that point, and I merely wished to be sure that I understood the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I shall bring out those points later.

In short, then, my amendment would accomplish two major objectives.

First, it would prohibit individuals and groups in one State from contributing to candidates who are running for the House or Senate in another State. That is a direct contribution. It would not, however, stop an individual or a group in one State from giving to a regular Republican or Democratic committee in another State.

Secondly, it would prohibit a middleman from making a contribution to a candidate for the House and Senate unless the middleman disclosed, at the time the contribution was made, who made the money available to him for the purpose of the donation.

Naturally, my amendment would not require a regular Republican or Democratic Party organization to reveal to a candidate where it got the money it is giving the candidate. Such an administrative task would be well nigh impossible to perform.

Mr. President, inasmuch as I am not a lawyer, and because I do not wish to ask the Senate to rely on my own interpretation of existing election laws, I submitted a series of hypothetical questions to the American Law Division of the Library of Congress. I might say that Mr. Samuel H. Still, who prepared the answers to these hypothetical questions concerning present statutes is a recognized authority in this field.

I shall now read the questions and answers:

Question 1: An individual in State A goes to a Republican town committee in State A and contributes $10,000 to the committee with the understanding that it will be used to further the campaign of Jones for the U.S. Senate in State B.

Question 1(a): Could he give $10,000?

Answer: Yes. By the very terms of section 608 the $5,000 limitation does "not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee or other State or local organization or to similar committees or organizations in the District of Columbia or any territory or possession of the United States." (18 U.S.C., sec. 608(a).) While Assistant Attorney General of the United States, Justice Tom C. Clark, wrote:

"Section 18 (18 U.S.C., sec. 608), though in term limiting to $5,000 the amount any individual may contribute to a candidate or political committee for his nomination and election, in fact restricts only the channels through which such contributions can be made since State and local committees are exempted from the application of the act. (6 Fed. Bar Journal 13 (1944).)"

Question 1(b): Would it be legal for Republican town committee in State A to give to the Jones-for-Senate committee in State B?

Answer: Yes. Section 608(a) does "not apply to contributions made to or by a State or local committee." (18 U.S.C., sec. 608(a).)

Question 1(c): Would it be legal for the Jones-for-Senate committee in State B to use the money thus received?

Answer. Yes. Section 608(a) only applies to contributions and not to expenditures or use of funds. There is no restriction under either the Corrupt Practices Act or the pertinent sections of the Hatch Act on a State or local committee unless the State or local committee is acting as an agent (bona fide) of the candidate. The phrase "indirectly" or "on one's behalf" in a criminal statute must be strictly construed. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin has held that the phrase "on his behalf" as employed in a statute limiting the amount which may be spent by or on behalf of a candidate for public office, and requiring an account of expenditures to be filed, means "by someone who acts for him [the candidate] in the sense that an agent acts for and on behalf of his principal" and if no authority, express or implied, exists, the disbursement is not made on behalf of the person sought to be charged. (State ex rel. La Follette v. Kohler ((1930) 200 Wis. 518, 228 N.W. 895), reported and annotated at 69 A.L.R. 348. The same view was taken by Senator Nye's Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures, 1930–31 (72d Cong., S. Rept. No. 20; CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 75, pp. 977–984).

Question 1(d): Would it be legal for the Jones-for-Senate committee in State B to give the $10,000 received from the Republican town committee in State A directly to Mr. Jones?

Answer. Yes. Under a strict interpretation of the law there would be no violation since State and local committees are exempt from the provisions of section 608(a) limiting contributions. However, since the courts have not construed this section, in order to be safe, most committees, including the political action committees of labor unions, have kept within the $5,000 limitation when making direct contributions to individual candidates for Congress.

Question 2: Would it be legal for an individual to (a) contribute to several different Jones-for-Senate committees and (b) give more than $5,000 to any one or to a combined number of such committees?

Answer. Again it should be pointed out section 608(a) is a criminal statute carrying a penalty of $5,000 or not more than 5 years imprisonment, or both, for a violation. The section by its very terms does not apply to contributions made to or by "a State or local committee or local organization or to similar committees or organizations in the District of Columbia or in any Territory or possession of the United States." Although no lawyer would advise a client to trifle with a criminal statute, yet it is generally believed by most authorities that the prohibitions of section 608(a) are generally directed at personal contributions made directly to candidates or made to the national committees or their adjuncts such as the congressional and senatorial campaign committees and to committees operating in two or more States and do not apply to contributions made to local or State committees. (See hearings on H.R. 1167 and H.R. 433, Subcommittee on Elections, Committee on House Administration, July 19 and August 1, 1957, 85th Cong., p. 112.)

Question 3: Can an adjunct of a national party committee such as the senatorial campaign committee or House congressional campaign committee contribute more than $5,000 to a candidate for the House or Senate?

Answer: Conceivably yes. Section 608(a) is designed to limit to $5,000 individual contributions to such campaign committees but it fails to limit contributions or expenditures made by such committees. The only limitation placed on these committees are $3 million limitations placed on their total contributions received or total expenditures made by section 20 of the Hatch Act, now codified as section 609 of title 18, United States Code.

Question 3(a): Can such an adjunct of a national party contribute more than $5,000 to a Jones-for-Senate committee or Smith-for-House committee rather than to the candidate himself?

Aswer: There is no limitation on the congressional campaign committees except the $3 million calendar year overall limitation on contributions to or expenditures by such committees appearing in section 20 of the Hatch Act, codified as section 609 of title 18, United States Code. Furthermore, section 608(a) specifically exempts contributions to such committees as Jones for Senate committee.

Mr. President, I hope the questions I have just raised and answered will give you a clearer picture of the weaknesses and limitations of existing law.

I turn now to another series of prepared questions and answers which I think will bring sharply to focus the objectives of my amendment.

I read further:

Question. Under existing law, what can an individual do if he wants to influence a senatorial or congressional election outside his own State?

Answer. He can give unlimited amounts of money to further a Jones-for-Senator campaign as long as he makes his contributions to various Jones-for-Senator committees.

Question. Under the Prouty amendment, what can an individual do if he wants to influence the outcome of a congressional or senatorial election in a State other than the one in which he has a legal residence?

Answer. He cannot make contributions directly to Jones or to any Jones-for-Senator committees. He could, however, make contributions to recognized Republican or Democratic Party organizations. This would mean strengthening of major political parties and a channeling of campaign funds through regular committee channels.

Question. What effect does this proposal have on the rights of national, State, or local committees of the Republican and Democratic Parties?

Answer. The amendment takes no rights away from these regular party committees. For example, the Republican National Committee can still make a contribution to the Jones-for-Senator campaign. In fact, the position of these regular party committees from a financial standpoint would be substantially improved because if an individual in State A wanted to promote the candidacy of an individual in State B he would have to make his contribution to a regular party organization and hope that it would go to help the candidate of his choice. Thus, the obligation, if any, of the successful candidate would be to a party and not to an individual or special interest group.

Question. Suppose an organization were formed called The National Group for a More Progressive Congress. Could this national group send money to its local branches which would be used to influence the outcome of a senatorial or congressional election?

Answer. No. Because the national group would be making a contribution to a candidate for an office within a State in which the national group does not reside.

Question. How about the local branch of this "National Group for a More Progressive Congress?"

Answer. It could make contributions to the senatorial campaign being conducted within its State, but not out of funds which came from the national headquarters.

Question. Does this proposal in any way limit the amount of money an individual can give?

Answer. No. It adds no limitation on the amount of money an individual can give. It places restrictions on the individual with respect to whom and where his political contributions are made.

Question. Since the Prouty proposal would allow out-of-State groups or individuals to contribute to senatorial or congressional campaigns only through official party channels, wouldn't this mean that any contributions made to a candidate during a primary election would have to come from the candidate's own State?

Answer. Yes. In the case of primaries, all money used in the primary would have to be contributed to the candidate or his committees from sources within that State. If, for example, Smith, from State A, contributes to the Jones-for-Senator campaign in State B, there would be a violation of the law, punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

Question. Could an individual in State A contribute to a presidential campaign under way in State B?

Answer. Yes. Since the office for the President is "an office with respect to which elections are conducted" within every State, a person could make contributions to presidential campaigns.

Question. In existing law is there any specific prohibition which would prevent A donating to a senatorial candidate without revealing at the time of the donation the fact that B provided the funds for the donation?

Answer. No.

Question. What change would the Prouty amendment make in this situation?

Answer. Under the Prouty proposal, if A did not reveal at the time he gave the money to the senatorial candidate the name of the person who made the funds available to him, he could be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for a question?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. HOLLAND. I call to the attention of the distinguished Senator the fact that in my State there are hundreds—perhaps thousands—of fine people who have their residence in Vermont or other States and live there in the summer, or live there more than half the year, but also have their winter homes in Florida. Is it the intention of the distinguished Senator, by his amendment, to prevent persons in such a situation from showing an interest in Florida by making contributions in the regular, legal way, which must be shown in the way now required by State law as contributions, to the campaign funds of candidates for the U.S. Senate or House of Representatives?

Mr. PROUTY. In my judgment, that is a prerogative and right which belongs exclusively to the citizens of the Senator's great State. I do not believe that anyone outside the State of Florida or the State of Vermont has a right to go into a State not his own to try to influence the citizens or legal voters of that State in their choice of the candidates to represent them in Congress.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the candor of the Senator, but I simply cannot agree with him, because I think a citizen in the situation I have described has a proper and understandable interest in the type of representation which Florida—my State—should have.

One more question: As the Senator from Vermont knows, I have relatives in Virginia and West Virginia. Some of them, for family reasons, have from time to time contributed to my campaign funds, always modestly, and the amounts have always been shown in my campaign contribution reports. Do I understand that such contributions would be precluded under the amendment of the distinguished Senator?

Mr. PROUTY. Such contributions could be made only if they were made through, for example, the Democratic State Committee in the State of Florida. They could not be made directly.

Mr. HOLLAND. These contributions are made for primary races. Of course, party contributions are not made in primary races, because in those races I will be a candidate, as I have always been in the past, against other members of my party. It seems to me that the distinguished Senator by his amendment would preclude the natural expression of interest, concern, and support by the relatives of a candidate in the primary for the Senate or House of Representatives. I do not believe such a provision should be engrafted into Federal law.

Mr. PROUTY. That is not the problem to which my amendment is directed; it is directed toward outside interests, who have no personal concern with what goes on within a State. Such interests may be trying to influence the election within that State of someone who may be susceptible to their wishes and interests after his election.

Mr. HOLLAND. I appreciate the frankness of the distinguished Senator. I am grateful for his allowing me to interrupt him. However, it seems to me that his amendment, cutting squarely across the lines of the natural interest of relatives and the natural interest of people who have part-time homes in their adoptive State, such as is so often the case in my State, and in other States which I see represented in the Chamber, would be entirely unrealistic, so I shall regretfully have to oppose the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Florida that a great many summer visitors come to Vermont, throughout the State; and we like to have them there. But unless they are permanent residents and legal voters, I do not believe it is their right to try to determine the choice of the people of Vermont with respect to their representatives in the House of Representatives or in the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CORTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to have the Senator from Vermont make clear for me, if he can—because it is not clear now—whether his amendment applies only to primaries, or whether it also applies to the general elections.

Mr. PROUTY. Under the provisions of the amendment, money can be sent to a State to be used in a general election; but the money must be contributed to an adjunct, State or local, of a national political organization.

Mr. GOLDWATER. So the amendment would apply to a general election, as well as to a primary, would it?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes. Under the provisions of the amendment, a person outside of a particular State could not contribute directly to the campaign of a candidate in that State; but such a person could contribute to a State committee or to a local committee; and, in turn, that committee could turn over the money to the candidate, if that were wished.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish to ask a practical question in regard to a matter about which I happen to know something, inasmuch as I am the chairman of a campaign committee: Suppose a prospective contributor did not wish to contribute money to a committee, but wished to give the money directly to a person who was running for office; and suppose the prospective contributor refused, in fact, to contribute the money to a committee. In that event, what would be the situation, under this amendment?

Mr. PROUTY. I believe such a person could give the money to the committee, and could request that the money be turned over to the candidate of his choice.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Does the amendment of the Senator from Vermont make clear that that could be done?

Mr. PROUTY. I think it does make that clear.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield further to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HRUSKA in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I also wish to ask a question which goes to the constitutionality of this amendment; and I wonder whether the Senator from Vermont has considered this point: It has long been my understanding that a Senator does not represent a particular State, but, instead, represents the interests of the United States as a whole. If that be true—and according to my reading of the intent of the writers of the Constitution, and according to all I have been taught on that subject, it is true—it is perfectly natural for a resident of Vermont to have an interest in the election of a Senator from the State of Arizona, or vice versa, or to have an interest in the election of a Senator from any other State. I believe that candidates for election to the House of Representatives also would be made subject to the provisions of this measure, because they, too, under the constitutional intent, as I understand it, represent the entire Nation, as well as the people of their particular districts. But I am fearful that if we were to use the approach the Senator from Vermont proposes, we would be treading very dangerously upon the constitutional intent. Will the Senator from Vermont comment on that point?

Mr. PROUTY. Of course, as the Senator from Arizona well knows, I am not a lawyer. However, I anticipated that this question might be raised; so, if the Senator from Arizona will bear with me, I should like to quote the Constitution and a leading authority on this and related points.

First, Mr. President, I wish to call attention to article I, section 4, of the U.S. Constitution, reading as follows:

> The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof—

But there is also the following qualification—

> but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Those words in the Constitution make it perfectly clear that the manner in which elections are conducted is of concern to Congress and may be regulated by Congress.

A comprehensive Federal statute, enacted shortly after the Civil War, outlawed a number of types of fraudulent and corrupt practices. That statute was held invalid in part, as it applied to municipal elections; but it was otherwise considered to be a constitutional exercise of the authority conferred by the Constitution.

Edward Corwin, the constitutional expert, points out that the National Government has a right to regulate primary elections conducted under State law for nomination of Members of Congress, where such primary is made by State law "an integral part of the procedure of choice, or where, in fact, the primary effectively controls the choice."

His viewpoint relies, in part, on the Supreme Court decision in the case of United States v. Classic (313 U.S. 299, 318), to which reference has been made previously during the debate on this bill.

Edward S. Corwin, a noted constitutional authority, who edited for the Library of Congress the annotated version of the Constitution, to which all lawyers refer, indicates in that volume that a State may not add to the qualifications prescribed by the Constitution for Members of the Senate and the House of Representatives. He points out that both the House and the Senate have seated Members who were elected during their terms of office as State judges, despite the provision of State constitutions which purport to bar the election of judges to any office under the State or the United States during such term.

The right to vote for Representatives and U.S. Senators is derived from the Federal Constitution.

Furthermore, it can be said that a Representative or a Senator takes an oath of allegiance, not to his State, but to the United States.

As the Senator from Arizona knows, the opinion I have just read is not my personal opinion; it is the opinion of some noted constitutional authorities.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But I believe my question has not been completely answered. I still cling to what I have long believed to be the intent of the framers of the Constitution—namely, that interest in the U.S. Senate is nationwide, and is not to be confined within the boundaries of any one State.

Because of that long-held belief on my part in regard to the intent of the framers of the Constitution, I have always felt, and I still do, that it is perfectly proper for me—if I wish to do so—to contribute money to the efforts of a candidate for election to the U.S. Senate from any State in the Union.

This point relates to one which previously was raised by my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, when he asked the Senator from Vermont whether, under this amendment, the efforts made for the reelection of the late Senator Bob Taft, in connection with which efforts funds were solicited throughout the Nation, would be permissible.

Mr. PROUTY. Only if the funds were contributed through recognized adjuncts of a national political party.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In that event, the "Bob Taft for Senator" campaign, which certainly had national interest which extended across all State lines, would be prohibited, under the terms of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, would it?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Once again I might remind the Senator from Vermont that—particularly in these days, when many people, in both parties, question whether they owe allegiance to any particular party, but, instead, look upon themselves as independents—we might, as actually is the case, and we find this situation existing in both parties, that find individuals would object to contributing to any party; instead, they would wish to contribute to an individual candidate. Does the Senator from Vermont not feel that is a constitutional right of the people of the country?

Mr. PROUTY. I do not feel that I am the most qualified person to argue what is provided under the Constitution.

However, in reference to the reelection of the late Senator Taft, of Ohio, I may point out that, in that connection, anyone outside of the State of Ohio could, under the provisions of this amendment, have contributed to a State committee or to a local committee, which could have used in behalf of the reelection of Senator Taft the money thus contributed.

In that case, money poured in from many groups all over the country, including labor organizations.

I believe it is the right of the people of Ohio, or any other State, to determine, particularly in the primary elections, whom they want to represent them in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GOLDWATER. At this time I should like to refer to a point the Senator from Vermont raised a little while ago: For instance, if I wished to contribute to the Senator's campaign in Vermont, when the time for his reelection campaign came, could I do so by sending my check to the Vermont Republican organization, but with the specific provision that the money was to be used for the reelection of the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PROUTY. I believe so, provided the Senator from Arizona specified that he wanted the money spent in that manner.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is a very dangerous one, although I do not wish to labor the point.

I completely understand the intentions of the Senator from Vermont, and I believe they are very honorable.

But I believe the amendment impinges on the Constitution; and, if I correctly understand the last remarks the Senator from Vermont made, I think that in many cases the amendment could result in depriving a candidate of funds which justly would be his.

Both of us know that State committees are not always completely friendly to candidates. Therefore, if we deprive a candidate of his normal means of obtaining funds with which to run for election we shall cause great danger, and in speaking on that point I speak from the practical point of view.

Mr. PROUTY. However, I feel certain that the Senator from Arizona will agree that in a general election a Republican State organization always will support the nominee of the Republican Party or the candidate of the Republican Party, regardless of whether the organization supported that candidate in the primary.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Well, I cannot agree 100 percent with that, but I can assure the Senator that this business of raising money for candidates is not the easy thing it is portrayed to be. I have been in this activity for some time, and I must report it is difficult, particularly when we have to go through party channels to get money and both parties have trouble raising money. When certain candidates whose philosophies agree with those of the people, and who are able, are running, persons or groups should be able to give money in any amount to that particular candidate. I think the Senator will find in his own State there is as much money raised by a candidate as is raised by the party itself. I repeat, I think this is a dangerous step to take, although I do not by that statement condemn the Senator from Vermont, because I know his intentions are completely honorable. I wish I could agree with him, but in this case I must disagree.

Mr. PROUTY. I do not feel that if I wished to, and certainly I do not have that desire, I would have or should have the right to go into the State of Arizona, if the Senator from Arizona were engaged in a bitter primary fight, and contribute to his campaign or his opponent's campaign. I think that is a matter to be handled purely within the State, and the voters of Arizona should make that choice, without outside influence. We know that matter has been one of the great difficulties of the past. Outside interests have gone into a State and have tried to nominate candidates of either party not because they were interested in the least with respect to the State in question, but because they were or thought they were going to gain something if those particular candidates were elected. It has happened in the past only too frequently. I am sure no one approves of it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. One more question comes to my mind, because the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND], is presently sitting behind me. The Senator from Vermont will recall that the Senator from South Carolina was elected by a write-in vote. He had no party backing at all. Under the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, the Senator from South Carolina could not have received contributions from the outside and he could not have received contributions from either party, because neither party was backing him. What would the Senator say about a case of that kind?

Mr. PROUTY. That is an intrastate affair. Money could be raised from the local committees.

Mr. GOLDWATER. From citizens in the State.

Mr. PROUTY. From citizens in the State or from local committees.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Certainly, the Senator from South Carolina in this case was not running as a Republican, although I wish he were a Republican. He did not believe in the Democratic Party. He did not believe in the principles of the Democratic Party. He ran in his own right as a candidate. He could then not get money from normal sources. I had a great interest in the Senator's election. I supplied a little bit of money for his campaign. I do not think he ever knew it. I felt it to be in the best interests of the country to have in the Senate a man like the Senator from South Carolina, and I felt it within my constitutional rights to send a very nominal check for his campaign.

I would not want to feel, in any coming election, that as an American citizen, I would be precluded from helping candidates run for office from either party, or from outside of either party, with whose philosophy I agreed. I am afraid this amendment will destroy that right which I feel is mine under the Constitution.

Mr. PROUTY. It would not alter the right insofar as a general election is concerned. It would alter it, for all practical purposes, in a primary campaign.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Now, in a primary campaign, I can see some argument for the amendment, but the Senator from Vermont earlier said that this amendment would apply to general elections, also. I have been trying to get that point clear. Let us assume that a primary is over and Candidate Smith is the nominee of the party; he is in the general election. Does the Senator's amendment apply to the general election?

Mr. PROUTY. It would be possible for the Senator to contribute funds to a candidate in a State other than his own by contributing the funds through the Republican or Democratic political parties or committees. The Senator could not make a direct contribution to the candidate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But I would have to indicate when I made that contribution that my check was for Candidate Smith?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes, if the Senator wanted it used for that specific purpose.

Mr. GOLDWATER. We have to recognize the fact that a party may not want to do that. Would the party be bound to use the check for that purpose?

Mr. PROUTY. No, I do not think the party or committee would have to accept that check for that purpose if it did not want to. I assume that in a general election the Democratic or Republican committees or parties would go all out to elect their candidates.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wish I could agree that the Democratic or Republican Party wholeheartedly back candidates of their party. Unfortunately, they do not always do so.

Mr. PROUTY. They may not be happy with the selection, but, generally speaking, I think the parties are going to support their candidates, when the chips are down, in a general election.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Vermont yield for a statement and perhaps questions?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. I want to say that I appreciate very much the Senator's interest in bringing the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925 up to date by making the ceiling as well as the publicity and reporting provisions more realistic. In the light of the Senator's conscientious desire to contribute to the bill, I have undertaken to analyze his proposal. If I make any misstatements in connection with my understanding of it, I would appreciate my friend from Vermont correcting me.

I would at the outset like to say that I regret the Senator's amendment was not presented a little earlier, so that we might have given it some more study; but may I ask him this question: Suppose in the bill, the Elections Act of 1959—State committees, by which I mean legally constituted committees within the State, within the respective or several political parties, are not required to report—what would the Senator's answer be to the suggestion that, there being no reporting requirements as relating to official State committees for parties, it would open the door to the funneling off of funds not otherwise subject to reporting under amendments previously adopted and under other terms of the bill?

Mr. PROUTY. I will state to the Senator my understanding.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not want to misunderstand the Senator. I want to do everything I can to try to clarify my own understanding of the amendment the Senator has offered.

Mr. PROUTY. I assume that under the Senator's amendment which was agreed to this afternoon such committees would be required to report, generally speaking.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator would say, then, that there would be no real or present danger, under that interpretation, as to any money being channeled in other directions for the benefit of specific candidates, without it being reported?

Mr. PROUTY. I would think not.

Mr. HENNINGS. As I understand the able Senator from Vermont, the amendment would change 18 United States Code 608 as reported in the bill before us, in that it would modify subsection (a) and enact new subsections (b) and (c).

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. It would change subsections (b) and (c) to subsections (d) and (e), respectively. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. Therefore, subsection (a) would reenact the existing provision contained in the present Corrupt Practices Act, on the $5,000 limitation to individual candidates or political committees; is that true?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes, that is correct, so far as intrastate contributions are made.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is aware that we will undertake to raise the limit to $10,000, but the Senator's amendment would contemplate that insofar as these contributions are concerned the amount would be $5,000 and not $10,000; am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. PROUTY. In case the Senator's amendment is adopted, I would have no objection to changing the figure in my amendment to $10,000, so that it would be in accord with his amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator for his clarification.

Now, in my attempt to understand the Senator's amendment and to analyze it, I believe the modification removes all limitations on out-of-State contributions. However, it must be read in conjunction with subsection (b), which makes it a criminal offense to make any direct or indirect contribution in the campaign for nomination or election outside the State of the contributor's residence.

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is the intent of the Senator's amendment, as he contemplates it.

The able Senator from Vermont would also provide that only committees which are committees of the regularly organized national political parties are exempt?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct, so far as subsections (a) and (b) are concerned.

Mr. HENNINGS. If I may detain the Senator a moment or two longer, I should like to understand a bit more about the amendment.

Mr. PROUTY. I wish to correct my last answer. That is correct insofar as subsection (b) is concerned.

Mr. HENNINGS. Insofar as subsection (b) is concerned?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Vermont has made a very able presentation of his case. The Senator is, of course, well aware of the fact that the language makes it a criminal offense to make contributions in any campaign for nomination or election without disclosing the name of the principal, if the contributor acts as an agent, but party committees are exempt from this requirement.

Mr. PROUTY. Are they, under the Senator's amendment which was agreed to earlier?

Mr. HENNINGS. Does the Senator agree on that point, that they are?

Mr. PROUTY. I will say to the Senator that contributions to national committees, for example, would have to be disclosed, but not the sources of contributions made by them.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator.

I will say that the Senator's amendment, in principle, has been the subject of much concern not only to me but also to others who are very much interested in the process in which we are now engaged, in the improving of the election machinery to provide fuller participation and greater publicity and to inhibit certain other excesses in the elective process.

I will say to the Senator from Vermont, as has been set forth, there is a prohibition against contributing across State lines. What would the Senator say as to that being possibly violative of the guarantees of the first amendment? I was absent from the floor for about 5 minutes, because I had to make a telephone call, and I do not know whether the Senator adverted to that or not.

Mr. PROUTY. Well, I think that all centers around the right of the Congress to regulate the election proceedings. I am not qualified to argue a constitutional point of law with the distinguished Senator, because I am not a lawyer.

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe the Senator is very modest in his statement. I do not know exactly what is required to fulfill the capacity of a so-called constitutional lawyer, except that one may so proclaim himself and hope that some may believe he is, after he so advertises.

There is one thing which bothers me about this matter, which has been expressed to me by other Senators, and I think stated on the floor. That is the question of constitutionality, as the proposal relates to the first amendment, since national elections are a matter of principal interest to the citizens of every State, wherever the citizens may be domiciled or, indeed, wherever their places of residence may be. I am sure the Senator is competent enough as a lawyer to be well aware of the distinction between "residence" and "domicile."

Although a person resides in one State he may have exclusive business interests in another State or in several States. Even where there may be no direct economic interest, some relatives or close associates may have their residences in or carry their businesses in other States. As has been suggested, citizens may have residence in one State but also maintain permanent voting residence in another State.

Such citizens might wish to support candidates of their choice by making contributions to the candidates or to the political parties of that State. How would the Senator's amendment relate to that, in the Senator's belief?

Mr. PROUTY. Such persons would have to contribute to a regularly organized adjunct of one of the two national political parties.

Mr. HENNINGS. But they would not be allowed to contribute in any other State? I think that has been firmly and clearly established by the Senator from Vermont. Am I correct in that understanding?

Mr. PROUTY. Well, they can contribute in any State, but only through the regular party channels.

Mr. HENNINGS. Only within the State of residence?

Mr. PROUTY. Oh, no.

Mr. HENNINGS. No?

Mr. PROUTY. No. They can contribute to a Republican or to a Democratic committee in another State. That money would be turned over to the candidate.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sure there is no question about that, and I spoke of it earlier. They may not contribute to an individual candidate?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. In any State except the State where they hold residence?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. I assume the Senator defines "residence" as we generally understand it to be, which is the place to which a person intends to return?

Mr. PROUTY. I would be willing to say "domicile," if that is a more appropriate legal term.

Mr. HENNINGS. "Domicile" and "residence" are distinct.

Mr. PROUTY. Wherever the person lives, or wherever he votes.

Mr. HENNINGS. They are distinct, as the Senator knows.

Mr. PROUTY. I believe that the place where he votes would be the controlling factor.

Mr. HENNINGS. We may reside in Washington as Senators, but our domiciles are in the States whence we come. I am not attempting to draw too fine a distinction.

Mr. PROUTY. I think perhaps the criterion is the place where the person is a legal voter.

Mr. HENNINGS. Wherever the person has a legal residence.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. At the present time the practice of interstate contributions and expenditures is one of the most important ways of financing our elections. I do not know to what extent the Senator has studied the question, but I do him the credit of assuming that he has given it a great deal of serious consideration and thought, because he is of that character and nature.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HENNINGS. It seems to me that it is doubtful, so far as the design is concerned, whether we should exempt from the prohibition only national parties. Such a provision might tend to freeze the existing party organizations and make it difficult for other parties or other party groups or factions to arise within a State. Would that be within the Senator's contemplation?

Mr. PROUTY. In subsection (b) all elements of the party are exempt.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield briefly?

Mr. PROUTY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the Senator's indulgence and patience.

Without subsection (b), the modification of subsection (a) so as to limit to $5,000 contributions to individual candidates or political committees would seem to be without substance.

One thing that disturbs me is that it also runs contrary to a proposed amendment to the bill, which provides for a $10,000 overall limitation. The Senator has already indicated that he would be willing to raise his limitation from $5,000 to $10,000. Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe that at first glance the spirit of the Senator's amendment is to bring into the open the real contributor of political funds. But the thing that bothers me is the handling of the situation by way of a simple amendment, without a thorough study of the problem and its scope, and the effect such a statute might have on the election process.

Unfortunately for all of us, this question was never discussed in the committee. It was never debated; and I fear that grave constitutional questions may be involved. I believe that the right of one to contribute to a campaign in any State of the Union, provided the contribution is reported and is within legal limitations, is a basic right. However, I would not say that I could not be wrong on that point. That is one question that disturbs me very deeply.

I thank the Senator very much for his enlightening statements.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I know the extremely high motives behind the offering of this amendment. I know the character of the Senator from Vermont, and that he offers this amendment in good faith and with a desire to make our election process clean all the way. I have watched with admiration his attitude with reference to the other amendments which we have considered.

I am a little concerned that the amendment the Senator now proposes goes too far. I have a sister in Pennsylvania. If I were in a primary contest or in an election contest in New York, I understand that under the terms of this amendment if she sent me a check for $10 she would be violating a penal provision. Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. KEATING. Does the Senator from Vermont feel that we should exclude all contributions from anyone outside the State or the congressional district where the candidate is running?

Mr. PROUTY. Generally speaking, yes. However, I would be willing to exempt members of one's family, if that is an important consideration.

Mr. KEATING. It might be that some of us might have a friend with $10, who might live in another State and be desirous of contributing to our campaign. Is it the feeling of the Senator from Vermont that there is something inherently wrong in a resident of one State contributing to a campaign in another State?

Mr. PROUTY. I think the definition of a friend could be extended ad infinitum. The expression is more or less meaningless. The Senator knows exactly what I am trying to prevent. Perhaps this amendment goes too far. Frankly, my chief purpose in offering the amendment was to get it on the record, primarily for future study and consideration. I believe we have a real problem when some interest—labor, business, or other interest or group—comes into a State and tries to dominate a primary election or a general election in that State. I think it is not their right, and I am very much opposed to it. Perhaps this amendment goes too far.

Mr. KEATING. I could not agree with the Senator from Vermont more completely about the abuse or possible abuse to which he is directing his amendment. Knowing the character and motives of the Senator from Vermont, it is just the type of thing I would expect from him.

Mr. PROUTY. I appreciate the Senator's statement.

Mr. KEATING. I am concerned about the fact that, as this amendment is worded, it goes too far. I think, with great reluctance, I would have to oppose the Senator's amendment because of that feature, even though I think perhaps we should try to frame some amendment which will effectuate—as the bill does not—the objectives which the Senator from Vermont is so commendably seeking to achieve.

Mr. PROUTY. I thank the Senator very much for expressing that sentiment, and I reiterate that that was my chief purpose in offering the amendment at this time—not in anticipation that it would be approved.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I believe the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has expressed a fear which some of us have, that in some of the applications of this amendment it would make impossible contributions which in themselves would be perfectly innocent. For example, one Senator pointed out that he had a cousin in another State who might want to send him a little contribution in a primary campaign. It seems to me that that in itself would not be objectionable. I believe that the main objective of the Senator, to make it possible for a State to preserve its own voice and select its own candidates, is commendable.

There were some questions directed to the Senator which I thought really were questions with respect to the existing law. Is it not true that a large part of the Senator's amendment is merely reenactment of provisions of the existing law?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Many of the questions directed to the Senator earlier in the colloquy had to do actually with the application of present law, rather than with anything new which the Senator from Vermont was proposing.

Mr. PROUTY. That is absolutely true.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I believe that before the Senator concludes his remarks, it would be desirable if he were to summarize the particular changes which his amendment makes and to point out the parts of the amendment which are existing law.

Mr. PROUTY. I may say that the first subsection is almost all identical with existing law. It applies to intrastate contributions.

Mr. COTTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator for yielding to me. I recall that during the delivery of his very excellent explanation I addressed a few questions to him. He asked me to wait until the end of his prepared remarks. I am glad that he now has very kindly yielded to me, so that I may continue my interrogation very briefly.

I should like to say to the distinguished Senator, my good friend from Vermont, that I endorse 100 percent every kind word and everything that has been said about the motives behind his amendment. We who know him know that when he offers an amendment it is, first, an amendment designed for high purposes and, second, that it is carefully prepared and carefully presented.

However, I cannot refrain from pursuing this matter, particularly in view of the fact that I started my inquiry of the Senator earlier and had to desist. I wish to be perfectly clear in my mind that as an individual, back in the days when Robert Taft was running for the U.S. Senate, and when the eyes of the country were concentrated on the campaign in Ohio, if I had wanted to send $5 to Taft's campaign, the Senator's amendment, if in the law, would have forced me to send my contribution to the Republican State Committee of the State of Ohio.

Mr. PROUTY. Or to a local committee in the State of Ohio if it is an adjunct of a national political party.

Mr. COTTON. Even though I have not the slightest interest who might be running for Governor or who might be running for Representative from a district, or who might be running for a county office, or for mayor of a city—and I might be a Democrat interested in a great Republican, because of his superb citizenship, or a Republican interested in a great Democrat—under the Senator's amendment I would still have to send my money to the Republican or Democratic committee in any other State. Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct.

Mr. COTTON. However, if I happen to be a member of an organization which has a local chapter or a local group within the State of Ohio, for instance, all I would have to do to get my money to them and have them in turn relay it to Senator Taft's campaign committee. Is that correct? Is that what could happen if the Senator's amendment were adopted?

Mr. PROUTY. No.

Mr. COTTON. Why not?

Mr. PROUTY. The Senator, I assume, is referring to a national group.

Mr. COTTON. What I am referring to—and let us be plain about it——

Mr. PROUTY. Assume a national group that does not have a headquarters in Ohio, for instance. If that is the question, under those circumstances the answer is "No."

Mr. COTTON. Does the Senator mean that Local No. 567, AFL–CIO, in Akron, Ohio, could not make a contribution to Senator Taft's campaign if by a stretch of the imagination we could conceive of their wanting to do so?

Mr. PROUTY. Certainly; it being an intrastate group.

Mr. COTTON. They are within the State.

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. COTTON. Under the Senator's amendment no one would go in to find out where they got that money.

Mr. PROUTY. Well, that is perhaps a problem which ought to be met on another basis. However, a local organization, if it is a branch of a national organization, can contribute. On the other hand, the national organization could not send money into Ohio in this instance and give it to a local organization to distribute.

Mr. COTTON. In theory, no. But as a matter of fact, the adoption of the Senator's amendment—and I know what the purpose of the amendment is, and I am thoroughly in accord with its purpose, and I admire the Senator from Vermont greatly for his presentation of it—would mean—and his amendment could well be entitled "An amendment to stifle the American individual"—that John Q. Jones, as an individual, could not openly and frankly give money to help elect a Senator in another State.

Surely the Senator from Vermont is a very practical man and knows that any great national organization which is a composite of local organizations—and I am not trying to identify any particular group, because it could be a labor group, a group of farmers, or a group of manufacturers, or it could be individuals—could channel their contributions into the local chapter within a State and thus into the pockets of those who are waging a campaign for a Senator or other public official in that State. However, a bar would be raised which would make it impossible for an ordinary American individual, because he admires a great Senator in another State and admires his conduct on the floor of the Senate and his stand on certain principles, to write a check and send it to that individual's campaign committee.

If I wanted to help elect my distinguished friend, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], whom I admire so greatly, I would have to contribute to the Democratic State Committee of Missouri. I am not in favor of the Democratic State Committee in Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Missouri could not imagine anything better than the Senator's doing that.

Mr. COTTON. Is my assumption not correct?

Mr. PROUTY. That is correct. I feel, perhaps because I am a States Righter that it is a prerogative which belongs to the people where the Senator is seeking nomination.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator believes that these elections are local elections. Is that correct?

Mr. PROUTY. They are statewide elections. Much as I love and respect the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire, I do not feel that I would have a right to contribute to his primary campaign.

Mr. COTTON. The Senator could not engage in a more worthy activity than to contribute to the campaign of the Senator from New Hampshire. It seems to me to be a tragedy that such a serious bar should preclude his doing so. If it is purely a local election, why should we try to regulate it from Washington? If it is a Federal election, what consistency or constitutionality is there in trying to raise these State lines and trying to set up a barrier, so that simply because I live across the Connecticut River a few miles away from my dear friend from Vermont, whom I admire, I cannot send him a $5 contribution, or, more than that, anything of value?

I know what the Senator is going to say in explanation. I made a speech at the Republican State convention in Vermont during the last campaign, and as a result the Republicans nearly lost Vermont for the first time in history.

Mr. PROUTY. Perhaps if the Senator had not been there we would have lost.

Mr. COTTON. If the speech happened to be of any value, and if it helped—I do not expect the Senator to agree that it was of any help, and I do not know whether it was of any value—I do not know whether I could go into another State to make a speech.

Mr. PROUTY. I am sure we all recognize that that is a little far fetched. The amendment relates solely to financial contributions.

Mr. COTTON. I am not so sure. If I paid my own expenses, which I did, because no Vermonter ever pays a visitor's expenses—or if the Republican National Committee paid my expenses, or if the Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee paid my expenses, I am not sure that it would not be a thing of value, even though it were a poor speech. What I have said is not entirely facetious either, even though the last part may be.

Mr. PROUTY. "Anything of value" is included in many statutes, and it has always been held to be something concrete.

Mr. COTTON. I have just one more question. We all know what the Senator is getting at, and we all know that this deals with a matter of handing money under the table, and sending it into States to affect elections. However, is that not a matter of reporting? Most States have on their statute books corrupt practices acts which take care of such situations.

The unfortunate example, which the Senator cited when he began his speech, of the man who was going around the country attempting to hand Senators $2,500 for their campaigns, was an example of a person who was already probably in violation of the Corrupt Practices Act and of the laws of two-thirds of the States in the Union.

But rather than to raise a barrier between States, so that an American citizen cannot even help someone across a State line, would it not be the proper approach—and I am sure Senators would support this view very fully—to be certain that there must be reporting? Should not the Federal act about which we are speaking—the so-called clean elections law, which has been bruited about so much—be a reporting act?

Mr. PROUTY. I think I may suggest to the Senator that reporting requirements have been in the law for years, and there have been very few convictions, as I recall, for improper activities.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I also address these remarks to the distinguished junior from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON]. I think one of our difficulties is that we forget that a citizen who can well afford to contribute substantial sums of money will be interested in the cause rather than in the candidate. McKinley said, in 1896, before the students in Michigan, that it is not the party which makes the issue; it is the issue which makes the party. A person becomes interested in an issue. Then he sees in the press the names of persons who are candidates for Federal office, who become symbols or examplars of the issue and the cause. That is the thing for which a contribution is made.

Shall we draw arbitrary lines and say that because a person lives in Ohio, he cannot contribute in Indiana, when actually he might have a brother running in Indiana, or a candidate is someone who is very much to his liking, and one who supports with vigor the cause of the free system of this country? I think the proposal is extremely arbitrary. We do not make this sort of provision to apply to any other situation.

I think the whole idea of cleanliness, as the Senator from Nebraska has said, is being carried to a point where it is actually damaging and does not go to the heart of the reason for which contributions are made.

Mr. COTTON. That was the point I was bringing up. I think the Senator from Vermont was very courteous in his response.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. First, if the Senator will indulge me before I ask him a question at the first part of my interruption—and I hope he will not be taken off the floor because of my comment—I should like to say to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. COTTON] that I am certain that whatever the outcome of the election was when he went to the neighboring State and made a speech, the adverse result in the election was not due to his speech. I assure him that we will take a chance on his coming to South Dakota at any time he feels able and free to come out there, and will be confident in our own minds that any contribution he might make in the way of a speech will be helpful to the cause.

Mr. COTTON. I thank the Senator from South Dakota. I may say that the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROUTY] was most kind to me on that visit. What I said about Vermonters paying our expenses over there was facetious, because I had to drive only a few miles across the line. I had a delightful time. The Senator from Vermont has never once reproached me for the apparent results of my visit.

I thank the Senator from South Dakota for his expression of confidence.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. With respect to the amendment and one of the points which has arisen, it is my personal opinion that the Senator from Vermont has performed a most useful service in directing attention to the matter of interstate contributions.

There are certainly at least two classes of contributions: One class would be the contributions described by the Senator from Illinois as coming from someone who has a perfectly good motivation in wanting to support someone who has identified himself with a great cause, and wants to see him nominated and elected.

But there is, of course, the other type of contribution, the kind which is made, or is sought to be made, for the purpose of affecting the result in an election, only as a means to an end of affecting selfishly legislation which might be developed in Congress. The latter type certainly would be condemned by every Member of the Senate.

I am of the opinion that something of the objective which the Senator has sought to accomplish will be accomplished by a provision now written into the bill, making the bill applicable to the primary contests and nominating conventions, as well as to general elections.

Mr. PROUTY. I may say to the Senator from South Dakota that that is very true.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. One thing which the bill does is to make those things which come within its purview subject to reporting. It also requires that the reports be made available, so far as possible, in advance of the election. That is the 10-day provision. It seems to me that the class of contributions which are objectionable, and which would be covered by the Senator's amendment, will to a certain extent be caught by the reporting of contributions, now that such reporting is applicable to the primaries.

As the Senator has said, that contribution could be made in a general election, and be made through the device of giving it to a committee affiliated with the national organization, and earmarked, so to speak, for the particular candidate or candidacy which the contributor wishes to espouse. There, of course, it would be subject to reporting under the provisions of the bill.

But also now, under the provisions of the bill, if it should become law, with the amendment relating to the primaries, the sinister type of contribution would also be subject to reporting in primaries and conventions. To that extent, the objective which the Senator from Vermont seeks will, I think, be accomplished by the amendments already adopted in the bill.

Mr. PROUTY. I think real progress has been made in this direction yesterday and today as a result of the amendments which were added to the bill as it was reported. I think the bill is a reasonably strong one at present. It represents a step forward in our desire for really clean elections.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Contributions to a campaign per se are not objectionable. Everybody recognizes that if a person runs for public office—particularly for Federal office—some funds are required to do so. If we are not to put a bar against a person of limited means running, it must be possible for him to receive contributions. But if the public knows the source and the amount of the contributions, then the public is in a position to judge as to the validity of the motives behind the contributions, and can vote accordingly. That will help in their appraisal of the candidacy.

So I feel that the reporting features of the bill, as they apply to both the primaries or the nominating conventions and the general elections will be very salutary when the bill is enacted. I certainly hope it will be passed by the Senate and approved by the other body and by the President.

Mr. PROUTY. I fully agree with the comments made by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. President, my purpose having been achieved, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from Vermont is withdrawn.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, before the Senator from Vermont yields the floor, will he yield to me?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I feel that our colleague, the distinguished Senator from Vermont, has performed a very useful service in focusing our attention on the abuses which he had in mind in drafting the amendment. I admire and agree with his attitude in withdrawing the amendment, but I think he is entitled to widespread commendation from us for the fine presentation he has made and for the very important and salutary points which he has brought out concerning some of the abuses.

Mr. PROUTY. I sincerely appreciate the remarks of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PROUTY. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I express my appreciation and commendation to the Senator from Vermont for the spirit he has shown in uniting some of us in our common purpose to get a bill. I have the greatest respect for the Senator's philosophy on this subject. I think that at this stage of the proceedings the Senator from Vermont has shown that he can rise to reality, in terms of making possible the enactment of a bill on this subject, and that he can join us in working toward that goal.

I assure him that it will be my wish and my hope to collaborate with him in the future in undertaking to work out a provision similar to his amendment, or at least containing some of the provisions of his amendment, so we may have the benefit of his thought, advice, counsel, industry, and activity.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. President, I appreciate very much those remarks of the Senator from Missouri. I particularly appreciate also his untiring work on the measure to deal with this problem. Certainly he deserves the thanks of all Members of the Senate and of the people of the country as a whole.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is identified as "1–19–60—D." I offer the amendment on behalf of myself, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON].

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLOTT in the chair). The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 19, between lines 7 and 8, it is proposed to insert the following new section:

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

SEC. 305. After the effective date of this Act, such Act of August 2, 1939, as amended, shall not be construed to prevent Federal employees whose legal residence is outside the District of Columbia from taking an active part in political management or in political campaigns in the case of State and local offices.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to allow Federal employees to hold State and local offices and to participate in political activities connected with the election to such offices.

We have before us Senate bill 2436, the purpose of which is to revise the Federal election laws and to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections. This invites us to take another look at the Hatch Act, and to correct some of its now archaic provisions.

The Hatch Act was enacted in 1939—more than 20 years ago. It answered a definite need of the time. However, like some other laws passed in the 1930's, the Hatch Act has become outdated, and in some respects it has become harmful, rather than beneficial.

Twenty years ago, it was impossible to know that millions of people would leave the cities, and would migrate to the suburbs. It was also impossible to know that from this migration would arise hundreds of communities, many of which would achieve the status of municipalities in their own right.

Since it is the nature of the American people to seek self-government, there grew in these communities local civic committees or councils, by means of which the suburban residents sought to exercise self-government. Before long, these communities grew to the point where more formal governments were necessary.

Up to that point, a resident of one of these communities could, without regard to the Hatch Act, serve in the capacity of a local governing official, even though he was a Federal Government employee. However, once the formalities of modern local governments were imposed, the Hatch Act limitations applied. Federal Government employees thus were precluded from taking active parts in the fundamental practice of self-government.

When I propose that Federal Government employees be permitted to hold State or local offices, I have in mind offices which by their nature would not affect the ability of such a person to perform his full-time duties for the Federal Government. It goes without saying that no person can hold two full-time jobs at the same time. Certainly, no Federal Government employee could continue to hold his Federal position while he was serving in a major State or local capacity which would demand the major portion of his time.

The amendment I propose is not intended to scuttle the Hatch Act. Rather, the purpose of the amendment is to bring up to date that which has become outdated. Its purpose is to recognize and reestablish the right of an individual to use his free time to participate with his fellow citizens in the basic functions of government.

The Federal Government employs 2,364,000 civilians. Among them, there are many whose community consciousness and civic abilities and interests in their neighbors and their communities should not be discouraged.

Through the Hatch Act, as it now stands, we have been disfranchising this group completely. Not only is that unfair; it is also contrary to the best interests of good government.

Do we have such an abundance of qualified local officials that we can deny this field of interest to more than 2 million people? I think not, Mr. President.

As a matter of fact, we should do everything possible to encourage the Federal Government employees to accept the responsibilities of citizens of the local level.

It is in this spirit that I propose this amendment to the Hatch Act.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BEALL. Certainly.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think the Senator's amendment is excellent, but I should like to ask several questions about its meaning.

Would the Senator's amendment make it possible for school board members to take active parts in such political management or campaigns?

Mr. BEALL. Yes; because usually the school boards meet in the evenings, not during the day.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. How about State auditors in small towns?

Mr. BEALL. A State auditor usually has a full-time job. I am thinking more of those who serve as city councilmen or in similar positions in small towns—members of groups which meet in the evenings, which meetings do not interfere with the regular daytime duties of those persons.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Under the amendment, would a town treasurer also be permitted to take such an active part?

Mr. BEALL. Yes; because generally his job as town treasurer is a part-time one.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. But the Senator's amendment is not intended, is it, to open the door to active participation by Federal employees in additional full-time jobs?

Mr. BEALL. That is correct.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Let me inquire about the members of State legislatures.

Mr. BEALL. Generally, they obtain leave of absence to attend the sessions of the legislatures; and most of the State legislatures have sessions which last for only 30, 60, or 90 days.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I have in mind a bill which would enable residents of the District of Columbia to vote in connection with the selection of delegates to the national conventions. The first bill on that subject which we passed was vetoed, because of some fear that it would interfere with the operation of the Hatch Act. I would not want such action to occur in connection with this bill.

Mr. BEALL. Does the Senator from South Dakota mean to say that Federal Government employees should not have a right to be elected to serve in State conventions?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. All I know is that the President vetoed the first bill we passed, when we endeavored to provide such an opportunity for the residents of the District of Columbia; and the veto was based on a fear by the President that the bill would interfere with the operation of the Hatch Act.

I would like the pending amendment much better if the Senator from Maryland would strike from it the word "State," in line 7. I think such a modification of the amendment would improve it.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I accept the suggestion; and I modify my amendment accordingly. The modification will thus limit the application of the amendment to counties or municipalities.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; and also to school boards.

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BEALL. I yield.

Mr. NEUBERGER. I should like to ask a similar question. Do I correctly understand that the able author of the amendment has agreed to eliminate from it the word "State," in line 7?

Mr. BEALL. Yes.

Mr. NEUBERGER. In that event, the amendment merely means that Federal employees can participate in campaigns such as those for election to a county court?

Mr. BEALL. To a county council or to be county commissioners.

Mr. NEUBERGER. That is what I meant by using the phrase "county court."

Mr. BEALL. Yes, provided—as I have stated plainly in the course of my remarks—such activity did not interfere with the performance of their regular duties in their regular Federal Government jobs. Of course, most of the county organizations—for instance, the county councils—meet in the evenings.

Mr. NEUBERGER. My question is quite similar to the one the Senator from South Dakota asked: Would not the inclusion of the word "State" legitimatize participation by Federal Government employees in campaigns for the election of State Governors, for example? If so, the amendment would break down the effectiveness of the Hatch Act.

Mr. BEALL. At this point let me say to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] that a moment ago I agreed to eliminate from our amendment the word "State."

Mr. COTTON and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. COTTON. The amendment, as amended, will be restricted to local officers. What is the effect of it in a State in which delegates are elected to a convention to nominate candidates for Governor or U.S. Senator? Can Federal Civil Service employees in such a State be candidates for delegates and serve in a convention and cast their ballots to nominate a Senator of the United States or a Member of the House or some other State officer?

Mr. BEALL. I would not think so, under our understanding.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. As the Senator knows, he was courteous and kind enough to mention this matter to me yesterday and again today. Without in any way wishing to discountenance or disparage the Senator's purposes, it would seem to me, Mr. President, may I say to the junior Senator from Maryland, I cannot see that this proposal is germane or has any place whatsoever in a so-called elections bill. I think it properly would come within the jurisdiction of the committee of which the distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] is chairman, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, which, of course, does have jurisdiction of and which has engaged in a study of the so-called Hatch Act in relation to Federal employees or employees of States, or those whose salaries are derived from Federal contributions, as I recall the two provisions of the Hatch Act.

I think it would be unfortunate if we were to encumber a Federal elections bill with this provision to amend the Hatch Act. I do not know why citizens who live in other States cannot engage in political activities, unless they come within the Hatch Act. It seems to me what we had better set about doing is amend the entire Hatch Act, and not try to take an oblique approach by making this proposal a part of an elections bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from Maryland yield to me?

Mr. BEALL. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I am inclined to share the views of the Senator from Missouri about this not being the proper time or place to deal with this problem. However, I can well understand the motives actuating my distinguished friend from Maryland in offering this proposal, because I am aware of the great interest which he takes in the many Federal employees who reside in the State of Maryland and who might be desirous of participating, and probably are desirous of participating, in only local elections in towns and cities in the State.

Maryland and Virginia have rather peculiar problems that some of the rest of the States do not have, and I commend the Senator from Maryland for bringing this subject before us, because it shows his interest in the many, many thousands of Federal employees who live in his great State.

I desire to address a question to the Senator from Maryland with regard to the merits of the amendment, if it seems prudent to pass on it now. With the word "State" eliminated, the amendment is limited to participation with regard to local offices only. Let us assume a case where the Senator from Maryland was running on the same ticket with a local official in the State of Maryland. Would it not be pretty difficult to separate the activities of a Federal employee in advancing the cause of Mr. X, the local candidate, and the cause of Senator BEALL?

Mr. BEALL. I do not think so. As a matter of fact, he might be interested in it, but he would not himself be a candidate. In most cases in Maryland candidates for judgeship do not actively participate. They go out, but do not make campaign speeches. That practice is characteristic in our State.

Mr. KEATING. I have not framed this idea in any precise language, but I wonder if the Senator from Maryland would be willing to accept a further amendment which would seem to me to pin it down more to a particular contest for a local office, some proviso to the effect that it would apply only where the local office or offices were the only offices under contest in that particular election.

Mr. BEALL. In the territory the Senator is talking about, namely, the State of Maryland, we do not elect municipal officers on the same ballot with State and Federal officers. That is a separate ballot.

Mr. KEATING. In other words, it never happens in Maryland?

Mr. BEALL. In the case of the county council it happens.

Mr. KEATING. What I was getting at is this. I know what the Senator is seeking to achieve, and I am quite sympathetic to letting a man who works in the Interior Department, for example, who wants to run for a school board in Maryland, or who wants to serve on the school board, to do so. It is a commendable objective. I personally think he should be entitled to do that; but I would not want him to be able to participate in a campaign in which a Senator or a Member of the House of Representatives was running at the same time as the local official in whom he was interested was running. I would not want him to be on the ballot at the same time. If some language could be worked out to effectuate that objective, I wonder if it would meet with the approval of the Senator from Maryland. I suppose he would rather see it in writing.

Mr. BEALL. I would rather first see it in writing. I want to thank the Senator from New York for his suggestion, but first I would like to ask the Presiding Officer or Parliamentarian to rule on the question proposed by the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. HENNINGS], as to whether this amendment is germane or not.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, do I correctly understand that the distinguished Senator from Maryland directed a question to me?

Mr. BEALL. I directed a question to the Chair. The Senator from Missouri said that, in his opinion, he did not think this amendment was germane.

Mr. HENNINGS. I would not want to undertake to make such a parliamentary ruling, I may say to my friend. It was not a subcommittee that reported the bill. It is the full Committee on Rules and Administration which undertook to report an elections bill. We have offered certain amendments to a bill which might be called a contributions and reporting bill.

I think, if my good friend would oblige, if the proposal could have some further consideration by an appropriate committee, this amendment never having been suggested heretofore, until the Senator was courteous enough to suggest the matter to me yesterday, we could then go into the matter of the Hatch Act and its application in regular order and to greater effect.

As I read the Senator's amendment—I appreciate the purposes of it and the Senator's interest in it—we are discussing only the District of Columbia. The Hatch Act applies nationwide, in all States of the Union. In my opinion, not as a parliamentary matter but as a matter of relevance, this proposal has no place in a bill relating to the machinery of elections.

Mr. BEALL. We just use the words "District of Columbia." Of course I mean any place in the country. The words "District of Columbia" are used, but the amendment refers to anybody domiciled or living outside the District of Columbia.

Unfortunately the citizens in the District of Columbia do not have the right of the franchise, which I think a great many of us favor giving to them.

Mr. HENNINGS. A great many of us are in favor of that.

I wish the Senator had given us an opportunity to discuss the matter with him before presenting it to the Senate without any committee consideration whatsoever, in the midst of consideration of certain requirements for spending and reporting, and limitations on amounts.

Mr. BEALL. Perhaps the Senator from Missouri remembers that this same provision passed the House of Representatives some 10 or 12 years ago. The then Representative Sasscer and myself sponsored it, and it passed the House but died in this body.

Mr. HENNINGS. It was not at that time a part of any election bill?

Mr. BEALL. No.

Mr. RANDOLPH and other Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, the diligent Senator from Maryland is to be congratulated for seizing upon any opportunity to bring this matter to the attention of his colleagues. Certainly the prohibition against the people living within the District of Columbia, or those who work in the District of Columbia and live in nearby Maryland and Virginia, from participating in local elections is something which deserves the attention of this body.

In the State of West Virginia, in the counties of Morgan, Berkeley, and Jefferson, there are people who commute from those eastern panhandle areas and hold Federal positions in the District of Columbia. Those citizens also have the desire, as expressed by the Senator from Maryland, to be active in local elections, as well as the States mentioned specifically by the sponsors of the proposed legislation, the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD]. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], who is the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, also cosponsors this proposal.

I shall not labor this point, because I know the purpose which motivates my colleague of other days in the House, where we considered this matter, to again bring it to the attention of the Congress. I applaud him for seizing upon this opportunity. It may not be the most appropriate time to bring it to the attention of Senators for inclusion in the pending bill, but the principle is a good one.

Mr. BEALL. I thank the Senator from West Virginia, who is an old friend of mine. I know the Senator has had a very active interest in this matter for many, many years, at least for the 17 years in which I have been in Congress. The Senator has always been very active, both as a former Member and as a former chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, in looking after the interests of and the welfare of this community.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. KEATING and other Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. KEATING. Is it necessary for the Chair to rule on the germaneness of the amendment in order for us to consider it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No, it is not. This is not an appropriation bill, and the Senate is not operating under a unanimous-consent agreement. Therefore, the question of germaneness does not arise.

Mr. KEATING. So we are free to consider the amendment on its merits?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KEATING. I ask the Senator from Maryland to give consideration to this: In the amendment as it now reads, at the very end it states, "In the case of local offices." That is the way it now reads, since the words "State and" have been stricken.

I wonder if the Senator would favorably consider, in place of that language, using the words "solely involving municipal and county offices."

Mr. BEALL. That would be all right. We will accept that amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate that. I think it clarifies the language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator so modify his amendment?

Mr. BEALL. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, I am not insensible to some of the problems which confront the distinguished Senator from Maryland and other Senators who are interested in the local communities near the District of Columbia. I sincerely hope that no action will be taken as to this particular amendment at this time, for the reason that the Civil Service Commission at the present time can exempt areas and can exempt certain employees from operations in this regard. The Civil Service Commission has already done so, in regard to the Hatch Act, in respect to local elections in municipalities and for such offices as membership on the school boards.

In order that there be no question as to what has been done and what can be done I should like to read from pamphlet No. 20, November 1959, U.S. Civil Service Commission, entitled "Political Activity of Federal Officers and Employees," on page 16, under the heading "Exceptions to Hatch Act Restrictions."

The Hatch Act specified two conditions under which political activity on the part of Federal officers and employees is permissible.

(1) Section 18 of the act sets forth an exception relating to elections not specifically identified with National or State issues or political parties.

(2) Section 16 of the act sets forth an exception relating to political campaigns in communities adjacent to the District of Columbia or in communities the majority of whose voters are employees of the Federal Government.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this section of the pamphlet and the listing of the particular areas and the reports and orders of the Commission be printed as a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

V. EXCEPTIONS TO HATCH ACT RESTRICTIONS

The Hatch Act specified two conditions under which political activity on the part of Federal officers and employees is permissible.

(1) Section 18 of the act sets forth an exception relating to elections not specifically identified with National or State issues or political parties.

(2) Section 16 of the act sets forth an exception relating to political campaigns in communities adjacent to the District of Columbia, or in communities the majority of whose voters are employees of the Federal Government.

Both sections are quoted on page 4 of this pamphlet.

SECTION 18

To be permissible under section 18, the activity must be of a strictly local character—completely unrelated to issues and candidates that are identified with National and State political parties.

SECTION 16

For many years prior to enactment of the Hatch Act, Federal employees residing in certain municipalities near the District of Columbia were permitted to be candidates for, and to hold, local office in those municipalities.

The permission was granted either by an individual Executive order or by action of the Commission based on an Executive order, and it remained in full force and effect until the passage of the act of August 2, 1939, which prohibited active participation in political management or in political campaigns, without exception. When this act was amended by the act of July 19, 1940, a new section was added (sec. 16, 54 Stat. 767) whereby the Commission was authorized to promulgate regulations extending the privilege of active participation in local political management and local political campaigns to Federal employees residing in any municipalities or other political subdivisions of the States of Maryland and Virginia in the immediate vicinity of the District of Columbia or in municipalities the majority of whose voters are employed by the Government of the United States.

The Commission has promulgated regulations governing the extension of the privileges set forth in the section quoted above and copies of these regulations are available upon request to the Commission's central office in Washington, D.C. Under these regulations it is necessary that a formal request be received from the representatives of the community involved and that the petitioners furnish certain specified information relative to their community and its elections. In all cases the final decision as to the extension of the privileges of section 16 of any individual municipality depends on the municipality's meeting certain prerequisites that are set forth in the Commission's regulations.

The Commission has extended the privileges allowed by section 16 of the Hatch Act to the following municipalities or political subdivisions by formal action recorded on the dates indicated:

In Maryland: Annapolis, May 16, 1941; Berwyn Heights, June 15, 1944; Bethesda, February 17, 1948; Bladensburg, April 20, 1942; Bowie, April 11, 1952; Brentwood, September 26, 1940; Capitol Heights, November 12, 1940; Cheverly, December 18, 1940; Chevy Chase, sections 1 and 2, March 4, 1941; Chevy Chase, section 3, October 8, 1940; Chevy Chase, section 4, October 2, 1940; Martin's Additions 1, 2, 3, and 4, to Chevy Chase, February 13, 1941; Chevy Chase View, February 26, 1941; College Park, June 13, 1945; Cottage City, January 15, 1941; District Heights, November 2, 1940; Edmonston, October 24, 1940; Fairmont Heights, October 24, 1940; Forest Heights, April 22, 1949; Garrett Park, October 2, 1940; Glenarden, May 21, 1941; Glen Echo, October 22, 1940; Greenbelt, October 4, 1940; Hyattsville, September 20, 1940; Kensington, November 8, 1940; Landover Hills, May 5, 1945; Morningside, May 19, 1949; Mount Rainier, November 22, 1940; North Beach, September 20, 1940; North Brentwood, May 6, 1941; North Chevy Chase, July 22, 1942; Northwest Park, February 17, 1943; Riverdale, September 26, 1940; Rockville, April 15, 1948; Seat Pleasant, August 31, 1942; Somerset, November 23, 1940; Takoma Park, October 22, 1940; University Park, January 18, 1941; Washington Grove, April 5, 1941.

In Virginia: Alexandria, April 15, 1941; Arlington County, September 9, 1940; Clifton, July 14, 1941; Fairfax County, November 10, 1949; town of Fairfax, February 9, 1954; Falls Church, June 6, 1941; Herndon, April 7, 1945; Vienna, March 18, 1946; Portsmouth, February 27, 1958.

Other municipalities: Bremerton, Wash., February 27, 1946; Port Orchard, Wash., February 27, 1946; Elmer City, Wash., October 28, 1947; Anchorage, Alaska, December 29, 1947; Benicia, Calif., February 20, 1948; Warner Robins, Ga., March 19, 1948; Sierra Vista, Ariz., October 5, 1955; New Johnsonville, Tenn., April 26, 1956; Huachuca City, Ariz., April 9, 1959.

The Commission's actions extending the privileges of active participation in local self-government of the above-listed communities to resident Federal officers and employees are subject to the following restrictions:

(1) Federal officers and employees in the exercise of these privileges must not neglect their official duties and must not engage in nonlocal partisan political activities.

(2) Federal officers and employees must not run for local office as candidates representing a political party or become involved in political management in connection with the campaign of a party candidate for office.

(3) Federal officers and employees who are candidates for local elective office must run as independent candidates.

(4) Federal officers and employees elected or appointed to local offices requiring full-time service must resign their positions with the Federal Government. If elected or appointed to offices requiring only part-time service they may accept and hold the same without relinquishing their Federal employment provided the holding of such part-time office does not conflict or interfere with their duties as officers or employees of the Federal Government. The department or independent agency in which Federal officers or employees are employed is the sole judge of whether or not the holding of the local office conflicts or interferes with their official duties as officers or employees of the Federal Government.

(5) The permission granted by the Commission to any particular community may be suspended or withdrawn by the Commission when in its opinion the activities resulting therefrom are or may become detrimental to the public interest or inimical to the proper enforcement of the political-activity law and rules.

Mr. CARLSON. As I stated, Mr. President, I am not insensible to the problem. I sincerely hope that any action taken in this regard will consider the fact that the Civil Service Commission has great authority at the present time. I am sure the Commission will exercise the authority when it is felt it would be in the best interest of the Federal employees.

I urge that no action be taken which might in any way jeopardize our Federal employees. These Federal workers are, after all, an operating agency of our Federal Government when it comes to political activity. We should make sure that no pressure can be placed upon them to require them to get into political campaigns. I think that would be most unfortunate at this time.

I therefore urge the distinguished Senator from our adjoining State of Maryland to withdraw his amendment. I assure him I shall cooperate with him in trying to get additional relief in this field.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator knows of the high regard I have for him in all matters, and particularly with respect to his interest in the District of Columbia.

Do I correctly understand that the amendment would permit every clerk in the post office in Philadelphia to get into Philadelphia municipal politics?

Mr. BEALL. That would not necessarily be true in the big metropolitan centers, where these officers have pretty high salaries. The office of city councilman may be a salaried and full-time position. The amendment would not cover that. The amendment only provides that the person may participate in local politics when it does not interfere with his official duties as an employee of the Federal Government.

Mr. CLARK. What concerns me, I will say frankly to the Senator, is that this would turn the Federal patronage wide open, to get these employees into municipal political affairs, and thus overturn a reform which took us years and years to accomplish. That concerns me very much.

I should be inclined to support an amendment which I think is what my friend has in mind, which would permit a man who works for the Federal Government in the District of Columbia and has a home in Arlington, Va., or in Maryland, and who wants to run for the office of member of a school board, to do so. If he wants to participate in that type of politics outside the District of Columbia, such participation would be all right, but I would not like to see a swarm of Federal employees, who are now properly forbidden by the Hatch Act to stay out of local politics, getting into deciding who was going to be the councilman or the mayor, in Philadelphia, or who was going to occupy any one of those offices. Thank goodness we got the Federal employees out of that years ago.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator from Pennsylvania was in the Chamber when the modification was made in the last two lines of the amendment. The amendment, as modified, now provides for insertion on page 19, between lines 7 and 8, of the following new section:

AMENDMENT OF THE HATCH ACT

SEC. 305. After the effective date of this Act, the Act entitled "An Act to prevent pernicious political activities" approved August 2, 1939, as amended, shall not be construed to prevent Federal employees whose legal residence is outside the District of Columbia from taking an active part in political management or in political campaigns solely involving county, municipal, or other local offices.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I note the presence in the Chamber of both the Senators from New York. I wonder if they would not agree with me that an amendment which would permit all the Federal employees in New York City to enter into the question of who was to be mayor or president of the Borough of Manhattan would be an unfortunate step backward, at a time when we have insulated workers under civil service from participation in local municipal affairs. I may be wrong about this, but I have lived with this problem for a long time.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BEALL. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I am not entirely sure, for example, that the postal workers should not have the privilege of serving on a school board in some town. I have always been quite of the opinion that the Hatch Act might be too rigid with regard to the possibility of Federal employees engaging in certain local political activities. For example, I know that many postal workers are having a hard time making ends meet, under present rates.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. KEATING. Some of them are taking second jobs. If one of them were qualified to serve on a school board, or to serve in some other local office, I am inclined to think that there is not much wrong with letting him do so.

Let me say to my friend from Maryland that I rather think this is a question which should have further study by the committee charged with responsibility in this area, namely, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. I do not believe we should try to arrive at a solution of the problem here, because even though I have made a suggestion for what I feel would be an improvement in the amendment, I am not certain yet in my own mind just where I should land when it comes to the question of a vote.

I think there is merit in what my friend from Pennsylvania has said, but I think we should give some thought to the question of allowing Federal employees to have a little more participation than they have now in local activities. There is nothing wrong about politics. Politics is good, when it is conducted right. Federal employees are greatly restricted in anything they do, and many of them are afraid to say, "I like JOE CLARK," or "I like KEN KEATING," because someone may say, "You are engaging in political activities." I am sympathetic toward what the Senator from Maryland has said, but I think it would be helpful if he would withdraw his amendment so that we may confine our activities here to the piece of legislation which is before us.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, Senators will note that I am listed as one of the cosponsors of this amendment. When it was brought to me by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BEALL] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and they talked with me concerning the situation which we face in the District, Virginia, and Maryland, I sympathized with them very much. So far as I was concerned, being chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, I did not oppose the amendment, and I told them I would go along with it.

I believe that something should be done for the people of the District of Columbia. As Senators know, I have always opposed home rule in the District, but I think the people should have a right to vote if they live in Virginia or Maryland, and they should have the right to participate to a certain extent in local political activities. I believe we shall have to go very carefully into the situation when we consider amending the Hatch Act.

I also believe Federal employees ought to be given more latitude in exercising the rights of citizens of the United States in electing candidates to the Senate and the House, and to other poliical offices.

I believe the Senator from Maryland has agreed to withdraw his amendment, under the circumstances in which we find ourselves.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BEALL. I yield to the minority leader.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I had expressed to the distinguished Senator from Maryland the hope that he would withdraw his amendment, with the understanding, of course, in view of the evident interest, that he might offer it again tomorrow in order to afford Senators an opportunity to puzzle over the question overnight. Other considerations may arise. If that could be done, I certainly would concur that action on the part of my distinguished friend from Maryland.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, I will accept the suggestion offered by the minority leader and withdraw my amendment for the time being, with the understanding that I may have the right to offer it tomorrow, as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The Senator has that right.

The Senator from Maryland has withdrawn his amendment.

The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maryland for his consideration.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to the assistant majority leader.

Mr. MANSFIELD. For the information of Senators, I wonder if it would be possible to conclude very shortly today's discussion on the pending legislation, in order that the Senate may go into executive session to consider nominations, and permit several Senators who have indicated a desire to speak, to do so, during the remainder of the day.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, in reply to my friend, the assistant majority leader, let me say that, as a part of the pending bill, there are several amendments which do nothing more than bring the present Corrupt Practices Act up to date by increasing from $50 to $100 the direct-contribution reporting provision which appears in the existing law. I now ask that that increase be made, and I offer the amendments which I send to the desk. I have nothing further to say about them, except that they also bring the bill into harmony with existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish the amendments to be read?

Mr. HENNINGS. No. I ask that they be printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendments are as follows:

On page 2, in the table of contents after "Sec. 202. Reports by political committees." insert the following:

"Sec. 203. Reports by others than political committees."

Page 2, in the table of contents, beginning with "Sec. 203" renumber the sections through "Sec. 212" to conform to above amendments.

Page 8, between lines 6 and 7, insert the following:

"REPORTS BY OTHERS THAN POLITICAL COMMITTEES

"SEC. 203. Every person (other than those filing reports pursuant to section 202) who makes an expenditure in one or more items aggregating $100 or more within a calendar year, other than by contribution to a political committee, for the purpose of influencing, in two or more States, election of candidates, shall file with the Clerk of the House of Representatives, on a form to be prescribed by him, an itemized detailed report of such expenditures in the same manner as required of the treasurer of a political committee by section 202, and shall file a copy thereof (subject to the provisions of section 207(b)) with the clerk of the United States district court for the district in which such expenditures are made, and in the case of any expenditure in support of a candidate for President, Vice President, or United States Senator, shall file a copy of the report with the Secretary of the Senate."

Page 5, line 20, strike out "206" and insert in lieu thereof "207".

Page 8, line 8, strike out "SEC. 203" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 204".

Page 8, line 13, strike out "206" and insert in lieu thereof "207".

Page 9, line 13, strike out "207" and insert in lieu thereof "208".

Page 10, lines 13 and 14, strike out "candidate or by a treasurer of a political committee" and insert in lieu thereof "candidate, a treasurer of a political committee, or by any other person,".

Page 10, line 17, strike out "206" and insert in lieu thereof "207".

Page 11, line 8, strike out "SEC. 205" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 206".

Page 11, line 22, strike out "SEC. 206" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 207".

Page 12, line 20, strike out "SEC. 207" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 208".

Page 14, line 9, strike out "SEC. 208" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 209".

Page 14, line 16, strike out "SEC. 209" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 210".

Page 14, line 20, strike out "SEC. 210" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 211".

Page 14, line 25, strike out "207" and insert in lieu thereof "208".

Page 15, line 4, strike out "SEC. 211" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 212".

Page 15, line 10, strike out "SEC. 212" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 213".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield the floor?

Mr. HENNINGS. No. I ask for the question.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President——

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the amendments which I have offered are very simple. The present Corrupt Practices Act provides that a $50 direct expenditure made by any person must be reported. We propose to increase the cutoff from $50 to $100, in order to bring the provision more nearly in line with present campaign costs.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. GORE. As I understand, this provision is in the law today.

Mr. HENNINGS. This is in the present law, under which we are theoretically functioning. We propose to increase the amount, and to liberalize the provision so as to bring it into line with modern conditions. We propose to increase the amount from $50 to $100. I do not know why that should cause any debate or discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. Without objection, the amendments will be considered en bloc. The amendments are identified as "1-18-60—A."

The amendments were agreed to en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I ask unanimous consent that a statement on the amendments be printed in the RECORD at this point. It is an explanation of the amendments.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR HENNINGS

Under the existing law, reports must be filed by (1) political committees, (2) candidates for Senator and Representative, and (3) persons other than political committees making expenditures "other than by contribution to a political committee" of $50 or more within a calendar year in order to influence elections of candidates in two or more States.

As we have been discussing the past few days, one of the foundations of the existing law is the principle of disclosure. Reporting is the means chosen to achieve this goal. At the present date, nobody doubts the importance of reports by candidates for congressional office and political committees in order to safeguard the integrity of Federal elections. But equally important is to require reporting from those who do not contribute to political committees but prefer to make expenditures directly in order to promote the cause of candidates of their choice.

This requirement of the existing law by the definition of the term "person" includes any organization or group of persons, as well as individuals. But the duty to report arises only if such persons try to influence Federal elections in two or more States. This provision is not limited to individuals, because the purpose of this legislation is full disclosure and, therefore, it is necessary to require maximum reporting of all direct expenditures. The requirement that persons who are not political committees shall report does not by implication widen the scope of the term "political committee." No State or local committees are involved. At the same time, the existing law considers it of importance to have this category of persons report their activities. Vast amounts of money may be spent by individuals and organizations which do not qualify as political committees to promote the chances of certain candidates. An army of canvassers may be hired to carry out door-to-door campaigns. Radio and television time may be bought, or other types of expenditures made. If this group of persons is not required to report, it would be difficult, probably impossible, to have an idea of the amount of such expenditures.

In this connection, it is my opinion that such activities would not be subject to the limitation of contributions to $5,000 for each candidate as it appears in section 608(a) of title 18 of the United States Code. This is a criminal statute and according to the well-known rule of law must be strictly interpreted. Under this statute, only excessive contributions are punishable whereas in our case, only expenditures are involved. It is for this reason, I believe the existing law has imposed the duty of reporting on persons making direct expenditures. Legally speaking, with respect to reporting, this category of persons is placed in the position of political committees.

The new elections bill while retaining reporting by political committees and candidates, does not require persons making direct expenditures to report. This omission in the new elections bill represents a weakening of disclosure requirements, as compared to those of the existing law. It withdraws from the public eye a wide field of campaign financing. As I have said, we all know that money is spent by individuals and groups of persons in order to promote the cause of candidates directly and not by contributing to political committees. Without the light of publicity upon them, people favoring certain candidates may be tempted to prefer anonymity and to substitute direct expenditures for contributions to political committees.

I believe it is important to retain the provisions of the existing law, requiring persons making direct expenditures to report.

In order to adjust this reporting requirement to the prevailing level of values my amendment raises the cutoff amount of reporting from $50 to $100 during a calendar year and also provides that the filing of reports follow the general scheme of the new bill. Therefore, under this amendment a person making a direct expenditure of $100 or more within a calendar year, other than by contributions to a political committee, in order to influence elections of candidates in two or more States, would have to report such expenditures.

I urge that this amendment be adopted and made part of the Federal Elections Act of 1959.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I offer another amendment. It is a technical amendment. It provides an overall limitation of $10,000. I send it to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, in the table of contents, it is proposed to strike out the heading of section 302 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

OVERALL LIMITATION ON FINANCIAL AID TO CANDIDATES OR POLITICAL COMMITTEES AND PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN PURCHASES

On page 17, strike out lines 4 and 5 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

OVERALL LIMITATION ON FINANCIAL AID TO CANDIDATES OR POLITICAL COMMITTEES AND PROHIBITION OF CERTAIN PURCHASES

On page 17, strike out lines 8 to 24, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 608. (a) Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes contributions or expenditures in an aggregate amount in excess of $10,000 during any calendar year, or in connection with any campaign for nomination or for election, for any or all of the following purposes—

(1) to or on behalf of any candidate or candidates for an elective Federal office or offices, including the offices of President and Vice President of the United States and presidential and vice-presidential electors, or

(2) to or on behalf of any committee or committees or other organizations engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate or candidates for any such office or offices or the success of any national political party, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.

This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to establish an overall limitation on financial aid to candidates and political committees. The existing law contains a limitation. I wish to make it very clear that the limitation provided by present law is $5,000, but such may be contributed to any number of candidates or political committees. The amendment would provide a limitation of $10,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. I should like to ask a question. The most serious trouble in the past with that limitation has been that a wealthy family could give $5,000 in the name of every member of the family. Is that not true?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly right.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Has the Senator done anything to tighten up that matter?

Mr. HENNINGS. We have done everything we could do by adopting amendments relating to the intrastate committees.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Is it not true that we have been getting the reports, but that they are made after the elections, when everything is over?

Mr. HENNINGS. Under the present Corrupt Practices Act that has happened. I think that under the amendments which have been adopted and under the present bill there will be considerable improvement in that respect.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. In the past, is it not true that a very wealthy man could give money to other individuals and they could give it to the committee and in that way put the money into the funds of the committee?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; that has been true.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. How, then, are we going to stop this giving of money to campaigns?

Mr. HENNINGS. We are trying to bring before the people the facts as they relate to the giving and spending of these moneys. The reporting features of the bill, as I have tried to say repeatedly, are the heart and soul of the philosophy and rationale of it. I would suggest to the Senator that at the present time there is a limitation of $5,000. The present law provides that no person shall directly or indirectly make contributions in an amount exceeding $5,000 during any calendar year to or on behalf of any candidate for nomination or election to Federal office, or to or on behalf of any committee furthering or advocating the election of any candidate to Federal office.

The law under which we are presumably now operating provides a $5,000 limitation. We would provide a limitation of $10,000.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. That just gives a wealthy man a chance to give twice as much in the future. That is about all it does.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to my colleague, the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. The explanation which the Senator has made of the amendment is not exactly in accordance with my understanding of it. I could well have a misunderstanding of what it would do. Do I understand that the amendment raises the present limit from $5,000 to $10,000, and nothing more?

Mr. HENNINGS. That is what I have tried to say. The present $5,000 limitation is not an overall limitation.

Mr. KEATING. It is not an overall limitation?

Mr. HENNINGS. It is a limitation, but not an overall limitation. The $10,000 would be an overall limitation.

Mr. KEATING. An overall limitation. So that for the first time we would be enacting an overall limitation on what any one individual could give, and we would make that overall limitation $10,000. Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. I believe that is correct. The Senator has substantially stated the purpose of the amendment, and that in part answers the questions of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. KEATING. I personally support the amendment. I think it is a very important amendment, and it is important that in our deliberations we understand fully that this is quite a departure from anything now in the law. That was the purpose of my question.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad the Senator asked the question. Perhaps I should have taken more time to go into detail and explanation of the amendment.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at this time?

Mr. HENNINGS. Inasmuch as so many Senators have been asking me when we are going to adjourn, because so many of them have commitments for this evening, I must apologize to my colleagues for having perhaps made a rather cursory statement, whereas I had prepared and am prepared now to make a full and complete and detailed statement. I am glad to answer any questions that may be submitted.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. The Senator from Missouri well knows that I voted for one of his amendments on the last yea and nay vote. I am not against all regulation of primary elections. But let me ask the Senator about this amendment. If it were adopted, would the bill not set a limitation of $10,000 on the amount a person could spend in support of his own candidacy?

Mr. HENNINGS. It would not be a limitation upon the candidate himself.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I do not think it would be proper to place a $10,000 limitation upon what a candidate can spend in support of his own candidacy.

Mr. HENNINGS. The provision will not apply to the candidate himself.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Suppose one of us happened to be running against a very wealthy person, and that person was willing to go the limit in paying his expenses to get himself elected. Then suppose a candidate who does not have a large sum of money available has a mother who would be willing to match the amount being spent by the wealthy opponent, or suppose he has a friend who would be willing to act as such a contributor. Do I correctly understand that a person who does not have sufficient money to match his opponent's own contribution would be foreclosed from accepting the contributions of his own mother, and that his mother could be sent to jail for making such a contribution?

Mr. HENNINGS. Under the bill, such a person's mother could establish a number of committees. They could be called the mother-for-son committee or the grandmother's committee or the sewing circle committee. There could be various committees of that type. There would be no limitation upon the amounts they could contribute, except that they would be required to report, which is the heart and soul of this proposal, as I have endeavored to point out before.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Does the Senator's amendment simply require that contributions above $10,000 shall be reported, or does it provide that there is a $10,000 limit on the amount which any person can give to a campaign?

Mr. HENNINGS. There is a $10,000 limit which any one person may give in an election year.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Even if it happens to be the candidate's mother or father?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; the mother or father would be limited, of course, to that extent.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Even though that person himself might have no funds of any significance, but might be running against a very wealthy person?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; I am afraid that is the case.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Does the distinguished Senator not realize that it would be somewhat unfair to say that simply because one man has a large amount of money he is privileged to spend it; but the other man, by virtue of the fact that his mother is still living, and he has not had a chance to inherit some of her fortune, would not have a chance to match the expenditure of his opponent? I hope the Senator will answer that question.

Mr. HENNINGS. I cannot answer all questions. I have undertaken to say to the Senator that there are a good many factors involved. I appreciate the interest and support which the junior Senator from Louisiana has given to at least a part of the bill. But I cannot undertake to offer a solution for all the inequities in life, nor all the disparities, economic and otherwise, which exist in a free society.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. But why create more? That is the point.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not think we are creating more. I think we are taking some of the enormous contributions out of political campaigns and are bringing them into line with what we think should be an emphasis upon the qualifications of the candidate, and not upon the number of interests, and their financial resources, which are supporting him.

We found, for example, in 1956, in the investigation conducted by the distinguished junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], that members of 12 prominent families contributed an over-all total of $1,153,000 to candidates and political committees, and that one family alone gave $248,423. Those contributions were lawful and within the letter of the law as it presently exists. Nevertheless, I may say to the Senator from Louisiana, it must be admitted that the possibility of influencing candidates or the results of elections is clear, in the light of such heavy contributions.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. From one's mother?

Mr. HENNINGS. I know that we often invoke mother and the flag, but I can scarcely see what mother had to do with this matter.

Mr. KUCHEL and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield first to the Senator from California, who I believe was first on his feet.

Mr. KUCHEL. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if he plans to push this amendment to a vote tonight.

Mr. HENNINGS. I had hoped that we might discuss the amendment this evening. However, I would not do so over the opposition of Members of the Senate. I do not view myself as a dictator of what the Senate should do with relation to proceeding or adjourning. I was trying to expedite action on the bill. There are some other amendments which will be offered. I had four amendments of my own, this being the last of them. I have had inquiries from many Senators as to when we might adjourn tonight. I am in no hurry. So far as I am concerned, I can stay until midnight or morning. However, I would not like to subject any Senator to such procedure. I understand the assistant majority leader has indicated that some Senators desire to depart.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think I can give the assurance of the leadership on both sides that it was our hope that the debate on this measure for today could be concluded soon, so as to enable other Senators who have speeches to make, such as the Senator from Oregon, to deliver them before it gets too late.

Mr. HENNINGS. Members of the Senate have been, indeed, very generous to me in my entire time here. I would not undertake to do anything which would not comport with what other Senators may wish to do this evening; nor would I insist upon the further consideration of any amendment tonight. If it seems to be contrary to the will of the Senate, and if there is an indication that not a sufficient number of Senators are available either to develop a quorum or to debate further this amendment, I have no desire to insist upon further debate on the bill this evening.

Mr. KUCHEL. It is not my purpose to delay the Senate; but some Senators have already left with the understanding that there would be no further vote tonight. I apprehend that some Senators will oppose the amendment of the Senator from Missouri. As the acting minority leader, I simply wish to protect their rights to register objections. Under those circumstances, I hope the Senator from Missouri will not push the amendment to a vote tonight.

Mr. HENNINGS. Under those circumstances, I may say to the Senator from California, I would certainly not want to put any Senator, at any time, in a position of disadvantage or make him the victim of any misunderstanding with relation either to having a vote or further debate or discussion.

Mr. KUCHEL. That is a characteristically generous statement on the part of my friend, the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the Senator's bringing the matter to my attention. I wish to conform to the will and the spirit of the Senate on this occasion, as I have tried to do throughout my service in this body.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will listen to this colloquy, I believe he will understand that the pending proposal is merely for an addition to the law, not a raising of the amount. The Senator from Tennessee, I believe, can shed light on the matter, due to the investigations he undertook as chairman of the subcommittee, under the chairmanship of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Montana is eminently correct. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator from Tennessee for that purpose.

Mr. GORE. If I read the amendment aright, it would apply to the person making an expenditure out of his own pocket in support of his own campaign, as well as to the mother, so to speak, who might make an expenditure out of her own purse for the nomination or election of her son. Let me read:

> Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes contributions or expenditures in an aggregate amount in excess of $10,000 during any calendar year * * *.

So it seems to me that it would apply, alike, to the son, to the mother, or to the mother-in-law.

Mr. KUCHEL. What about the wife or the sweetheart?

Mr. HENNINGS. Under present law—if I may answer the question of the Senator from Louisiana—insofar as a friend or other person is concerned, the limitation is $5,000 to the candidate, and no more.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. In view of the fact that other Members wish to delve further into this particular amendment, I suggest—if it will meet with the agreement of the Senate—that we now end our debate of today on the elections bill, and that the Senate now proceed to consider other matters, and thereafter adjourn until tomorrow, when we shall continue the debate on the elections bill.

Mr. GORE. First, Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. GORE. I should like to submit certain amendments, to be printed, lie on the table, and be printed in the RECORD, if I may have unanimous consent for that purpose.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, is that course acceptable to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HENNINGS. Certainly. I may say that the Senator from Tennessee and I have discussed the offering of his amendments, and it was contemplated that they would be offered after the amendment now pending, which is the last of the amendments I had expected to offer, was acted on.

Mr. KUCHEL. Very well.

Mr. HENNINGS. Does the Senator from California wish to ask questions at this time?

Mr. KUCHEL. No; I was merely asking about the procedure, not about the merits of the amendment. But I am sure other members will wish to ask some questions.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understand.

Then, Mr. President, consonant with the understanding with both the majority leader and the minority leader, I now yield the floor.

Mr. GORE. Then, Mr. President, I now submit amendments, intended to be proposed by me, to the pending bill. I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will be received, printed, and lie on the table; and, without objection, the amendments will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendments are as follows:

On page 13, after line 21, insert the following:

"(c) Candidates for election as President and Vice President who are nominees of a political party, in their campaign for election, shall not make expenditures in excess of an amount equal to the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the largest number of voters casting votes for presidential electors in any one of the last three preceding elections. For the purpose of the limitation prescribed in this subsection, there shall be included the expenditures made by or on behalf of either or both candidates.

"(d) A candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President, in his campaign for such nomination, shall not make expenditures in an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the amount prescribed in subsection (c), above."

On page 13, line 22, strike out "(c)" and insert "(e)".

On page 8, line 8, beginning with the comma, strike out down to and including the comma on line 9, page 8.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, has the request of the Senator from Tennessee been agreed to?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, to consider certain nominations on the Executive Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nominations on the Executive Calendar will now be stated.

SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION—NOMINATION PASSED OVER

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Philip McCallum, of Michigan, to be Administrator of the Small Business Administration.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that that nomination go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Raymond A. Hare, of West Virginia, a Foreign Service officer of the class of career minister, to be a Deputy Under Secretary of State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Diplomatic and Foreign Service.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

The legislative clerk proceeded to read two nominations to the Inter-American Development Bank.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that these nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations will be considered en bloc; and, without objection, they are confirmed.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of these nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the President will be notified forthwith.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT UNTIL TOMORROW AT NOON

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that when the Senate concludes its session tonight, it adjourn until tomorrow, at 12 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Montana.

The motion was agreed to.

NEED FOR ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I should like to submit some insertions for the RECORD relating to the current debate with respect to bills which are pending before us to increase the number of judges in the Federal courts. We are especially in need of such action in the southern district of New York.

I have before me a report on the need for six additional judges for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, submitted by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York; the New York County Lawyers Association; the Bronx County Bar Association; the Empire State Chapter of the Federal Bar Association; the Maritime Law Association of the United States; and the New York Patent Law Association. This report is very persuasive and forceful, and shows clearly what the junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and I have been fighting for all these months. That is my reason for taking the time of the Senate at this time. I ask unanimous consent that this report may be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks, together with an editorial entitled, "Justice Versus Politics," published in the New York Times of January 20, 1960. The editorial approves the report, and shows that the southern district has 20 percent of the civil cases in all the Federal courts but only 7 percent of the total number of judges to hear them. We are far behind, and politics should not stand in the way of the administration of justice so urgently needed.

There being no objection, the report and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

REPORT ON THE NEED FOR SIX ADDITIONAL JUDGES FOR THE U.S. DISTRICT COURT FOR THE SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

The bar associations submitting this report are deeply concerned over a threatened breakdown in the administration of justice in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York because of an insufficient number of judges in that court to handle its ever-growing business. Our members, whose practice constitutes the primary work of the court, firmly believe that unless Congress promptly enacts legislation creating six additional judgeships for the southern district of New York, as recommended by the Judicial Conference of the United States, such a breakdown may occur.

While the need for additional judges is a problem which is not confined to the southern district of New York alone, the southern district is unique in terms of the volume and character of the matters that come before it, and should be treated as such. Not only does this court handle a greater volume of business than any other Federal district court, but, situated as it is at the hub of the Nation's largest economic, shipping, and financial center, this court is constantly being called upon to decide matters of vital and unusual importance to the country at large—matters involving more complex and difficult factual and legal problems than those found on the dockets of most other Federal district courts. Such matters, whether disposed of before or after trial, inevitably require more time than the relatively simpler cases that characterize most other Federal dockets.

As of July 1, 1959, out of the Nation's total Federal civil caseload of 56,430[1] cases this district alone had pending before it 10,937 civil cases. But, as indicated above, bare statistical data concerning the number of cases pending does not give the full measure of judicial output because in this caseload there is an unusually large percentage of highly complicated matters which will take far more time to dispose of than the ordinary cases. This load includes:

Thirty-three Government antitrust cases, or over one-third such cases pending in the country; 237 patent suits, constituting almost one-fifth of all such cases in the United States; 2,376 admiralty proceedings (exclusive of Jones Act personal injury cases), representing over two-fifths of all admiralty matters on file in the Federal courts; and 117 private antitrust suits, or about 20 percent of all such litigation in the Federal courts; and approximately 25 Robinson-Patman Act cases.[2]

[1] Unless otherwise noted, all figures are taken from the Annual Report of the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Washington, D.C., September 1959.

Likewise high is the percentage of other cases that involve complex fields of industry, services, and enterprises, ranging from bottled baby foods and bananas to copyright music, watches, radio tubes, computers, television broadcasting, color photography, and prizefight promotion. These suits are of the type referred to colloquially by bench and bar as "the big case." Estimates of trial time required range from several weeks to almost a year per case, and the amounts of damages claimed run in many cases to over a million dollars each.

The implications of this unique type of caseload may be gathered by reference to some examples. In the admiralty field, for instance, the much publicized limitation of liability proceedings affecting the SS Andrea Doria and the MV Stockholm are recorded statistically as only two cases. However, they actually represent a vast number of separate suits, one for each claim, and in these two cases there were approximately 3,500 claims filed, many of which involved settlement of infants' and deceased persons' claims.

The recent Bethlehem-Youngstown steel merger case, a Government antitrust suit tried in the southern district before Judge Edward Weinfeld in 1958, is another typical example. There a motion for summary judgment (see United States v. Bethlehem Steel Corp., 157 F. Supp. 877 for decision) required the court to consider affidavits, exhibits and briefs exceeding 400 pages. Despite complete cooperation on all sides to shorten the trial through pretrial conferences and stipulations (one of which was 600 pages long) the trial record ran to 12,000 pages and required the judge to spend a very substantial part of 6 months in chambers before handing down an 88-page decision (at 168 F. Supp. 576), plus 199 pages of findings of fact and conclusions of law.

The statistics in the Government suit against the investment bankers, United States v. Henry S. Morgan et al., 118 F. Supp. 621 (SDNY 1953), tried before Judge Medina, reveal the true character of the "big case." That case involved 6,848 pages of pretrial depositions, interrogatories, and orders, 10,640 pretrial exhibits, consisting of 43,252 pages, 196 pretrial and interim motions, briefs and memorandums, plus 376 separate charts and tables prepared by the parties, totaling 3,846 pages; 309 courtroom days of trial, plus 25 days of off-the-record conferences between court and counsel; 23,962 printed pages of trial transcript; 4,469 trial exhibits totaling 20,474 pages plus 2,967 pages marked for identification; and 417 pages devoted to the court's opinion.

Yet the Morgan case would be counted as but one case in statistical records.

In his Field Study of the Operations of the U.S. courts—report to Senate Appropriations Committee, April 1959, Mr. Paul J. Cotter, stated that "the problem of the complicated case exists to a high degree" in this district, and that it has the largest number of "long and complicated cases" in the country. Such litigation demands much more of a judge's time and intellect than the hours spent on the trial itself. Before trial the parties usually present difficult factual and legal questions by way of a series of motions accompanied by voluminous papers and briefs which must be studied for a considerable length of time in chambers before they can intelligently be decided. During trial many more hours must be spent analyzing minutes and exhibits and preparing jury charges; and in nonjury cases (which are customary in the complicated patent and admiralty proceedings, and in many antitrust suits) the judge must after the trial study the exhibits, transcript and briefs before drafting and filing his findings, conclusions, and opinion.

In addition to the many protracted cases on its civil docket, the southern district of New York has also been the venue for an unusually large number of so-called big criminal cases, such as the recently concluded Apalachin trial and the Genovese narcotics case which was tried in April 1959. It should be noted that the southern district handles approximately 1,100 criminal prosecutions annually, which cannot be deferred, since the Constitution guarantees the accused a prompt disposition; and that this consumes the full time of four judges, making them unavailable for civil cases.

To handle this enormous and complex case load, which in sheer numbers constitutes 20 percent of the civil cases pending in all the Federal district courts, Congress has allocated to the southern district of New York only 18 judges, or 7 percent of the total number of Federal district judges in the country. According to the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts, Warren Olney, III, "No district is as undermanned as the southern district of New York.

The 10,937 pending cases in the southern district breaks down to an average of 608 cases pending per judge. There are twelve Federal districts, including the southern district of New York, which have five or more judges. All of these districts are located in metropolitan areas and handle approximately 45 percent of all new civil cases filed in the 86 districts having purely Federal jurisdiction.[3] The average case load pending before each judge in these 12 districts was 321 cases as of June 30, 1959. In other words, each of the judges in the southern district of New York has on the average almost twice the number of cases pending before him as the judges of these other metropolitan districts. The situation as of June 30, 1958 was much the same: At that time, in the same twelve metropolitan districts, the average number of cases pending per judge was 336, while in the southern district of New York the average case load per judge was 578. And the average caseload of the judges in all 86 districts having exclusive Federal jurisdiction was 249 and 270 in those years.

Of course, if this unduly large number of cases pending per judge in the southern district of New York could be attributed to inefficiency or a lack of industriousness on the part of its judges, the creation of additional judgeships obviously would not be the solution to the problem. But the record establishes conclusively that this is not the case. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959, the judges in the southern district of New York on the average disposed of 334 cases per judge, as compared to an average of 253 cases per judge in the 12 metropolitan districts described above. A comparison for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, likewise reveals that the southern district disposed of a substantially greater number of cases per judge than the average of the other metropolitan districts. The average number of cases disposed of per judge for all 86 districts having exclusive Federal jurisdiction was even lower. In 1959 the figure was 236 cases disposed of per judge, and in 1958 the average number of cases disposed of per judge was 231.

Yet, despite the fact that through a prodigious effort the judges in the southern district of New York disposed of a much higher than average number of cases in both 1958 and 1959, their caseload continues to swell. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, 6,732[4] new cases were filed in the southern district and 4,896[4] cases were disposed of. Last year 6,549 new cases were filed and a total of 6,011 cases disposed of. Thus, from July 1, 1957, to June 30, 1959, the backlog of pending cases has increased by 2,374 cases in this district even though its judges are working harder than ever. Any further efforts to increase the output per judge pose the risk that judges will be forced unconsciously to sacrifice the quality of justice expected of them in an effort to keep up with the increasing workload. There is a limit to the burden that can be handled efficiently, even by the most conscientious judge. If he exceeds that limit his very attempt to keep up with the excessive burden is self-defeating since mental exhaustion will undoubtedly have an adverse effect upon all of his work, not just the excess.

The steady increase in this district's backlog does not completely reflect the seriousness of the situation. With an inadequate number of judges to handle the entire caseload before it, there is a natural tendency on the part of the court to dispose of the shorter cases first and defer the more complicated and protracted ones, since trial of these cases would consume months of the time of the judges involved and result in a sharp increase in the number of cases forming the backlog. This tendency to handle the shorter cases first, however, increases the hard core of the protracted and complicated cases, especially when one realizes that from 2 to 3 percent of the current filings, or approximately 150 new cases each year are of the complicated and protracted type. Recently Chief Judge Ryan has assigned four or five complicated and protracted cases, apiece, for all purposes, to each of the 18 judges and we may therefore expect that when trial of some of these cases is commenced in 1960 the delay in handling of regular run of the mill cases will be increased.

Nor have efforts on the part of Congress to stem the engulfing tide of new cases being brought in the Federal courts met with success in the southern district of New York. When Congress passed the Jurisdictional Act of July 25, 1958, which raised the minimum jurisdictional amount from $3,000 to $10,000 in diversity cases, it was anticipated that this would result in a sharp decrease in the number of such cases being brought in the Federal courts, because, of the 67,115 cases filed during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1958, throughout the United States, 25,709 were diversity cases. From the standpoint of the country as a whole, the statute had its desired effect since there was an overall decline of 32.6 percent in the number of such cases filed in the fiscal year 1959. Unfortunately, this decline occurred in districts other than the southern district of New York. In this district, while the number of private civil cases filed in the fiscal year 1959 declined slightly from the previous year (5,388 filed in 1959 as compared to 5,764 filed in 1958), the total number of civil cases commenced in the southern district for 1959 remained substantially the same as it was in 1958, viz, 6,549 as compared with 6,727.[5] Furthermore, an examination of the docket in the southern district

[2] Estimated by Chief Judge Sylvester J. Ryan.

[3] These are Massachusetts, the eastern and southern districts of New York, New Jersey, the eastern and western districts of Pennsylvania, the southern district of Florida, the eastern district of Michigan, the northern district of Ohio, and the northern district of Illinois, and the northern and southern districts of California.

[4] Field Study of the Operations of U.S. Courts—Report to Senate Appropriations Committee, April 1959, prepared by Paul S. Cotter.

[5] 365 civil cases per judge were filed in the southern district in the fiscal year 1959 as compared with an average of 238 such cases per judge in the 12 largest Federal districts in the country (including the southern district of New York).

for the first 4 months of the current fiscal year (1959–60) reveals that 2,357 new civil cases have been filed, or an average of approximately 600 suits per month, which would mean that we may expect the total for the current year to exceed 7,100 new civil actions.

Thus, while the number of civil actions being commenced in most other districts is on the decline, the number in the southern district of New York is still increasing despite the new act. It should also be noted that the great majority of cases pending in the southern district consist principally of private civil suits rather than suits by or against the Government, a fact of considerable significance in assessing the court's workload, since it is generally accepted that "private civil cases * * * take much more time of the judges than Government cases." [6]

Other new Federal legislation enacted by Congress at its last session may also lead to additional litigation in the Southern District of New York. One example of this legislation is the Labor-Management Report and Disclosure Act of 1959 (the so-called Landrum-Griffin bill) enacted in September 1959 (Public Law 86–257) which establishes new controls affecting labor unions and their relationships with union members. Both labor and management representatives have predicted that this act will lead to a flood of litigation by individual union members and employees seeking to enforce rights accorded them under the law. The southern district of New York, which is the situs of the headquarters of many important unions will undoubtedly be invoked in such cases. We may further anticipate that future sessions of Congress will pass additional legislation in other fields that will likewise add to this important court's burden.

What has been the result thus far of this tremendous caseload in the southern district? The median interval between issue and trial in this district during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959 was 19.1 months as distinguished from an average median interval of 10.3 months in the 86 districts having exclusive Federal jurisdiction. And the time between the filing of a complaint and trial was 26.7 months in the southern district as compared with 15.3 months in these same 86 districts during that same period.

The delay of over 26 months between filing and trial in the southern district causes hardships to litigants and brings the court into disrepute in the eyes of the public. In patent infringement cases, for example, this inordinate delay has serious consequences for it has encouraged willful and wanton infringement of important patents toward the end of their term. Infringers, secure in the knowledge that if suit is brought in the Southern District of New York no determination of the issues involved is probable until after the expiration date of the patent, have deliberately embarked on infringement activities toward the end of the term of many patents, thus foreshortening the effective term of such patents by several years.

In areas of industry engaged in highly competitive research, patented inventions frequently become obsolete in a matter of years; and in these areas the value of a patent is seriously reduced if speedy relief against infringers is not available, and absent value in the patent, the incentive for invention and development of new products disappears.

But the problem in the Southern District of New York is far more serious than one of delay alone. If the present rate of filings continues without abatement, or increases as the first four months of 1959–1960 indicate will be the case, and the court is given no relief in the form of new judges, we face a deterioration in the very quality of justice that this distinguished court will be able to dispense in the future. Because it is inevitable that when the caseload on the individual judges becomes too heavy, not only does court congestion occur, but the quality of the justice which is dispensed must ultimately be adversely affected.

We believe that this problem cannot be met by measures short of the enactment of legislation creating six additional judgeships. The court has welcomed any reasonable alternative suggestions including the use of visiting judges from other districts and the adoption of various procedural reforms calculated to increase the court's work product. But past experience has shown that the services of visiting judges, although welcomed with open arms, have limited utility since their help is of a temporary and transitory nature and they cannot therefore be assigned to deal with the court's No. 1 problem which is the extraordinary number of complicated and protracted cases pending on its calendar. These judges invariably return after a few weeks to their respective home districts which are often hundreds or thousands of miles from New York. To ask them to continue to handle a matter after they have returned to their home districts would not only be unfair to them and to the lawyers and litigants involved, but would also be impractical.

With respect to procedural reforms, efforts are continually being made toward improving the court's efficiency. These include studies presently under way, of measures designed to eliminate waste of time on the part of the court and counsel in the hearing and disposition of motions, and of possible revisions in the court's pretrial procedures. Even with such improvements, however, the court could never expect to increase its already prodigious work product to a point where it could keep abreast of the annual intake of new cases, much less to dispose of the huge backlog of pending litigation before it.

After reviewing the manner in which the present 18 judges are assigned, we are convinced that a minimum of 6 additional judgeships is required to enable the court to keep up with the current annual inflow of civil and criminal business. Any plan for assignments of the 24 judges would still necessitate continuation of the services of retired senior and visiting judges who would be utilized on shorter trials in order to enable a portion of the regularly assigned judges to handle the many complicated and protracted cases instituted in this district. Adequate space and facilities are available to accommodate the six additional judges recommended.

On behalf of our members we urge Congress as strongly as we can to enact promptly legislation creating six additional judgeships for the southern district of New York before the problem has grown to such gargantuan proportions that the damage will be irreparable.

DECEMBER 31, 1959.

[6] Quarterly Report of the Director of the Administrative Office of the U.S. Courts for the Third Quarter of the Fiscal Year ending June 30, 1959, p. 8, table C–1; testimony of Warren Olney III, Director, Administrative Office, U.S. Courts, Jan. 26, 1959, Hearings before the Subcommittee of the House of Appropriations, 86th Cong., 1st sess., p. 56.

JUSTICE VERSUS POLITICS

The city bar association's report on the need for six additional Federal judgeships in this southern district of New York raises a clearcut issue of justice versus politics. That it exists at all is a disgrace, made worse as the situation grows increasingly acute. The bar association has done a conspicuous service, to the public and to frustrated litigants, in its able presentation of the case for more judges—one which we hope will have a massive impact on Congress, where responsibility for the present situation squarely rests.

So remiss has Congress been in meeting the demands of swift justice in this district that the parties in civil actions now have to wait more than 2 years before their cases come to trial. As the report has pointed out, the delay causes hardships to litigants and brings the court into disrepute; in patent cases it has encouraged willful and wanton infringement. The outstanding cause for this deplorable situation is the failure of Congress to create enough judgeships, as the years have gone by, to keep up with the increase in cases that the court has had to handle.

The flood of cases has risen no less than 36 percent in the last 5 years, with the same number of judges to carry the load. And their burden is greater than that which judges in other districts have to bear. The southern district has 20 percent of the civil cases in all the Federal courts, but only 7 percent of the total number of judges to hear them. No wonder the New York court has failed by 2,374 to keep up in decisions with the new cases filed in the past 2 years.

While the situation is more acute here than elsewhere it is urgent everywhere. For the past 5 years the Judicial Conference of the United States has been urging Congress to create more judgeships—raising the number as conditions have grown steadily worse. But no action at all has been taken. Now a bill for 45 more places on the Federal bench is gathering dust in congressional committee rooms. Reason: the politics of possible appointments. And this in spite of the fact that President Eisenhower has pledged to appoint to new places an equal number of Democrats and Republicans qualified for the judgeships.

Could it be that leaders of the Democratic majority hope a Democratic President, bound by no such pledge, will be elected next year, or that some fear that President Eisenhower might not appoint the right kind of Democrats? Anyway, the delay is inexcusable.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I am very happy that my colleague has called our attention again to this crying need. A bill has been reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary which would at least help somewhat with the problem. I reiterate my hope that the leadership of the Senate will schedule the bill for early consideration. The need is very urgent.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague.

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. The Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] will remember that at our last meeting of the Committee on the Judiciary this matter was taken up and discussed. At that time it was brought out that I had reported the bill from the committee. I said it was not all that we would like to do, and that it was more or less a compromise bill. The whole committee understood at that time that we hoped to get the bill under consideration at an early date.

Mr. KEATING. I am well aware of the fact that the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, as chairman of the subcommittee which deals with these matters, has been helpful in reporting the bill which is now on the calendar. He recognizes, as well as the rest of us, that it does not fully solve the problem. I do hope the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, who is chairman of one of the important committees of the Senate, and whose relationship to the leadership is of the highest, and who has great persuasive powers in this body, will use his powers of persuasion with the majority leader and with the assistant majority leader and the policy committee of the Democratic Party in the Senate, to get the bill before us so that we can vote on it. I feel sure that it will receive widespread support, if only we can get it to the floor and let the Senate work its will.

Mr. JAVITS. I do not wish to delay a vote on the pending amendment. My colleague from New York and I have made our case, and it is made very eloquently in the inserts that I have submitted for the RECORD. It is a matter of utmost statesmanship that this be done. It is one of the urgent needs of the country. The people feel it very keenly, whether they are litigants or prospective litigants. I join with my colleague in the expectation that we shall have action on the bill.

FEDERAL CONTROLS OVER STATE VOTING REGISTRATION MACHINERY AND CIVIL RIGHTS LEGISLATION

Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina. Mr. President, there is now under way a great deal of study in an effort to find ways and means for the Federal Government to intervene in the election powers of the various States. Those who promote such intervention also seek to force undesirable civil rights legislation upon the people of the various States.

At the present time the Senate Committee on Rules and Administration is holding hearings on proposed legislation to enact a Federal registration program. For some days there has been on the floor of the Senate, debate on a so-called Federal clean elections bill. In the Judiciary Committee and elsewhere there are rumblings about civil rights legislation in nearly every field one could imagine.

All this talk about civil rights and Federal controls over elections and registration machinery is political vote baiting and, in actuality, has no place in the Congress of the United States. The control of elections or of the social habits of the people, or of the conduct of public schools has always been reserved, by the Constitution of the United States, to the local and the State governments.

The Senate has no more right to tell people in Alaska or California or Maine what to do in their elections than do those States have a right to tell the U.S. Senate how it shall conduct its business.

It cannot be emphasized too strongly that we should stick to our business in the U.S. Senate, and should not delve into the business of the local or the State governments.

The Federal Government—whether the executive branch, the judicial branch, or either House of the legislative branch—has no business butting into State primary elections or State general elections. As I understand, there is no such thing as a Federal election; all elections are State elections. The Constitution of the United States provides that the people in every State shall have the right to elect. But the Constitution leaves to the States the right to control the elections.

When a President of the United States is elected, the people of each State vote to elect the delegates of their choice, who then decide upon who will be the President and the Vice President. This is done through State elections, not a national election.

The Constitution of the United States expressly reserves to the States the power and right to control elections. Within my lifetime, U.S. Senators from South Carolina and Senators from many other States, for example, were elected by the general assemblies of the various States, not by popular vote. The States have always decided election matters and registration matters; and any attempt by the U.S. Senate, or the House of Representatives, or any other Federal body or agency to change this rule would be an attempt to change the Constitution of the United States.

While on the subject of Federal Government intervention in State affairs and the general field of civil rights, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate an editorial entitled "Terror In New York," from the News and Courier, of Charleston, S.C., dated January 18, 1960. I commend this editorial for reading by all Senators; and with particular emphasis do I recommend a reading of a letter to the editor, published in the same issue of this newspaper, and upon which the editorial was based. The letter to the editor, written by a New York resident, is supported by a news item entitled "Women In Panic—Attack Victims Tell of Terror." The editorial, the letter to the editor, and the article from the New York Journal-American, as referred to in an editor's note, all emphasize that those who cry loudest for civil rights action have not yet learned to control the problems of their own communities.

The strongest proponents for Federal intervention in State registration and voting matters and for interfering in State matters, through civil-rights legislation, come from the large cities where the greatest racial problems exist and where there are more local civil-rights statutes on the books than anywhere else in the Nation.

I hope the Members of the Senate will think more than twice before they vote for legislation that attempts to interfere with the rights of States covering elections, registration programs, and other matters.

I, for one, stand ready, as a South Carolinian, to defend the civil rights of citizens in South Carolina as quickly as anyone else in this Nation. But I do not have a right to tell the people of New York what to do in this or in any other field; and the people of New York or any other State have no right to tell the people of South Carolina or any other State, what to do, regardless of the attempts that are made directly or indirectly through the Congress, the President of the United States, or elsewhere in the Federal Government.

I stand ready to defend the voting rights of every citizen in South Carolina; and I stand equally prepared to defend the rights of South Carolinians, New Yorkers, Californians, and the people of all other States to control their own voting machinery.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorial and the other two items to which I referred, from the News and Courier, be printed in the body of the RECORD, following my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial, letter, and editor's note were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, Jan. 18, 1960]

TERROR IN NEW YORK

Not long ago a local reader accused us of exaggerating crime conditions in New York, where the list of attacks, especially on women, is constantly growing. Elsewhere on this page today appears a letter from a woman who says that nobody feels safe in the metropolis and that we have not misrepresented conditions.

Neither correspondent, of course, sets up to be an authority on these conditions. Both speak from personal observations.

Our comments are based on constant reading of newspapers, magazines, and official reports, and on conversations with informed persons in different parts of the country. Out of all this we have gathered an impression of virtual jungles in several cities of the North and West.

Much of this wave of violence is attributed to Negroes. For this reason we have related the outbreak of disorder to racial conditions.

Some observers believe that incoming migrants, both from the Southern States and from Puerto Rico, have set up new tensions that lead to crime. Our purpose in focusing attention on these disturbing conditions is to show that racial problems are more acute in the North than in the South, which is the target of hostile propaganda.

We are well aware that the South has too much crime, but in our judgment it is better controlled today than in northern cities where terror stalks citizens, principally women. Even the paper curtain press now is taking notice.

[From the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, Jan. 19, 1960]

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR—WOMEN IN PANIC

BAY SHORE, N.Y.

To the News and Courier:

A letter, saying that the News and Courier exaggerates crime in New York, written by Chalmers S. Murray, has been forwarded to me and I can assure Mr. Murray that the conditions he mentions are not exaggerated but are even worse than is recorded in newspapers. No one is safe anywhere here and all are afraid.

I've lived in New York for many years, and know Charleston well and know of conditions there too, but at present things here are almost out of control, so please don't underestimate.

ADELE GARFIELD.

(EDITOR'S NOTE.—Enclosed with the foregoing letter was a news item from the New York Journal-American captioned "Women in Panic—Attack Victims Tell of Terror." The item says: "Fear is gripping the women of New York today. Their terror comes with the gray of dusk as muggers and rapists roam the streets. Only yesterday a subway change agent was added to the mounting list of assaults on women. What is happening in our town? To get at the facts, the New York Journal-American sent out a team of reporters to observe at first hand the march of fear. This is the first of a series revealing why the women of New York City are now 'Women in Panic.'" The letter from Mr. Chalmers S. Murray of Edisto Island said that he had not been molested in numerous visits to New York, and that the News and Courier was exaggerating the dangers.)

NEWSPAPER STRIKE IN PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I entered into an understanding with the leadership of the Senate and with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] that I would forgo making the speech I am about to make until after the debate for today on the clean elections bill was held, because again, as has always been my practice, I desired to cooperate with the leadership and the Senator in charge of any bill in expediting debate on that bill—particularly when the speech I make tonight is a speech not only for the RECORD, but one that needs to be read and studied by Members of the Senate, and needs to have adequate consideration given to its very serious import and the serious labor relations problem that it raises.

Mr. President, I propose to discuss for a few minutes the newspaper strike which has been raging in the city of Portland, Oreg., for the past 11 weeks. In all my years in the State of Oregon, through such labor strife as we have had from time to time, including some serious strikes on occasions on the waterfront, I have never witnessed such vicious antilabor employer conduct as I have witnessed on the part of the publishers and editors of the Portland Journal and the Oregonian in connection with this newspaper strike.

By way of an introduction to my speech, Mr. President, I think it is particularly appropriate that I read at this time a very short television speech I prepared for release in the State of Oregon on the strike. It reads as follows:

Fellow Oregonians, on this telecast, I am pleased to respond to the invitation of the Portland newspaper strike committee to give my views and suggestions on the union-busting controversy that is raging in Portland between the Newhouse newspaper chain dynasty and free workers in our city.

I have refrained from making a statement until I received this invitation from the Portland newspaper strike committee, because I am well aware of the very deep political hatred for me held by the publishers and the editors of both the Portland Journal and the Oregonian. However, this controversy has now reached the point where the public interest has become paramount. What I say on this telecast may not be acceptable in all details to either the newspapers or the strikers. But I want to point out that we have now reached the point where the public interest must be given first consideration.

Some weeks ago Governor Hatfield and Senator NEUBERGER made a very fine statement and proposal when they suggested that a factfinding board be appointed to find out what the facts are in regard to this controversy.

As some of our religious leaders in Portland, such as Dr. Steiner, have pointed out, the public is bound to get only biased and slanted news from one of the participants in this controversy, namely, the newspaper publishers themselves. It is about time that we have the facts presented to the public, and in view of the fact that the newspapers have turned down Governor Hatfield and Senator NEUBERGER's suggestion, I want to add a suggestion to what Hatfield and NEUBERGER have already proposed.

I would like to point out that the best labor law on the statute books today is undoubtedly the Railway Labor Act of 1926; it provides for the appointment when there is a deadlock reached of an emergency board, and that emergency board has the duty of finding the facts and making recommendations for the solution of the dispute.

Now the Railway Labor Act is not a compulsory arbitration act. It does not require either party to be bound by the recommendations of the emergency board.

But what has happened in practice? After the emergency board has made its recommendations for a fair solution of a dispute, then the general public becomes the final arbitrator. What we need in this case are recommendations from an impartial fact-finding board with power to recommend, that will give the public the facts and give the public proposals for a fair settlement of the dispute. As in most of the railway disputes, I am satisfied that if we followed this procedure, the public, as the final arbitrator, would bring great pressure to bear on both the publishers and the workers to accept such a fair settlement.

Now who should make this kind of a fact-finding recommendation proposal? Well, I would like to suggest that such a fact-finding recommending board be headed by the dean of the School of Journalism of the University of Oregon, and that perhaps seven other schools of journalism across this country be asked to name someone from their faculty to sit on such a board, put all their names in a hat and draw out three or five depending upon the number that would be most acceptable to the parties.

Now that certainly would give you an impartial board. That would give you a board that understands the newspaper industry, and that would give you a board of fair-minded men who would put the public interest into this dispute where it belongs.

Let us take a look at some of the issues involved in it. I think it is a sad thing that these newspapers have brought into our State, a State with high labor standards, a State that believes in good wages for our workers, known professional strikebreakers. There is no doubt about this antiunion busting activity on the part of the publishers of the Journal and the Oregonian. It is an old pattern and technique by the Newhouse newspaper chain dynasty. We need to keep in mind the fact that Samuel Newhouse is not really a newspaperman. He is basically a financier; he is not interested—it is demonstrated in his operations in other States—he is not interested in newspapers; he is interested in what newspapers can make for him by way of profit.

And I think it is a sad thing that the journalistic profession in our State has reached the low that Newhouse has brought to it in the State of Oregon. But those are facts that need to be brought out by an impartial board. Let Newhouse come on in and defend his practices in St. Louis and his practices in some eastern States.

Let us take a moment on this matter of strike insurance. It needs to be pointed out, of course, that publishers couldn't even get their insurance policies registered in the State of New York, because the officials of the State of New York found that this practice is against sound public policy. There is no doubt as to what it is; it is one of the union-busting techniques that combinations of newspaper employers think that they can develop in order to break the newspaper unions. So they had to go to Canada to get a foreign company to give them this kind of insurance.

But I want the people of Oregon to remember that these so-called strikers, who are just as locked out as they are striking, are your neighbors. They send their children to the same schools that your children go to. They go to the same churches. They are men and women who are deserving of the freedom that has been built up over the years in connection with the right of free men and women to collectively bargain for wages, hours, and conditions of employment. The people of Oregon are entitled to know what the facts are in regard to this dispute.

But there is one issue that I want to comment on very briefly, because I think it is very unfortunate that the publishers of the Journal and the Oregonian are guilty of such deception as they have been guilty of in the propaganda against the neewspapermen and women who are on strike in their plants.

They would have you believe that these newspaper workers of theirs are bound contractually to go through a picket line and scab on their fellow workers. It so happens that on March 2, 1939, when I was arbitrating maritime disputes on the west coast, I handed down the first decision in American labor arbitration law, that at least was known at that time, on a very important legal principle that I want to briefly discuss, because it gives the lie to the argument of the editors and publishers of the Oregonian and the Journal.

The case I decided was really based, as far as my decision was concerned, on some great language written by Justice Louis Brandeis back in 1910 before he went to the U.S. Supreme Court and while he was active in the field of labor relations. This case, March 2, 1939, that I decided involved a strike of the so-called clerks and checkers union at Encinal Terminal in the San Francisco Bay. As a result of the strike, not a ship was moving in San Francisco Bay. Why? Because the longshoremen refused to go through the checkers and clerks picket line; a picket line that was stretched in a good-faith labor dispute at Encinal Terminal. The ship owners took the position that under the contract with the Longshoremen they were bound to perform the work as ordered by the employer. After taking long, voluminous testimony on this matter, I handed down a decision on March 2, 1939, which has become a classic in American labor arbitration law, has been followed by many arbitrators since, and has never been upset by the courts. In that decision, and I read from it, I said:

"In the absence of an express agreement that the longshoremen would pass through the picket line of another union on strike, it is to be implied that both parties to the agreement of October 1, 1938, knew or should have known that the longshoremen would not pass through such a picket line. There are certain basic tenets of unionism, a knowledge of which can be reasonably charged to all employers. As pointed out by counsel for the union at the hearing, one of the cardinal principles of unionism is that a union will not permit itself to be used as the means of breaking the strength of another union which at the time is out on strike. The sanctity of picket lines is basic in the teaching and practice of American unionism.

"The arbitrator is compelled by the record in this case, and by a careful analysis of the agreement, to accept the view that the Waterfront Employers Association knew, or should have known, when they entered into the agreement of October 1, 1938, that if a strike situation involving such facts as existed at the Encinal Terminal on February 18, 1939, should arise, the longshoremen, under the agreement, would not be expected or required to go through the picket line."

I say most respectfully that the publishers and editors of the Portland Journal and the Oregonian knew, or should have known, when they entered into collective bargaining agreements with these newspaper unions that no self-respecting union man or woman is going to scab on a sister union by walking through a good-faith picket line. There is no question about the fact that the stereotypers went out in a good-faith strike over wages, hours, and conditions of employment. No one can expect self-respecting union men or women to scab on the stereotypers union.

So we must face up to the fact that what really is involved basically in this controversy is another attempt on the Newhouse dynasty to set up an open shop in the newspapers of Portland; to subject workers in this great journalistic profession to all the harassment that goes along with an open shop; to the lowering of wages and hours and conditions of employment.

Now it does not follow, may I say, that they are not some merits on the employers side on some of these issues. I have never known a major labor dispute yet that was all one way, but what we need now is to get a relaxation of tension; to set up a tribunal where the rules of reason will prevail and where both sides can come in before an impartial board, present the facts, let that board present the facts and its report to the public with the recommendations as to how the dispute ought to be settled—recommendations not binding upon either side as it is not binding the railroad industry. But my prediction is that if a board really conducts an impartial judicial hearing on this matter, and makes recommendations documented to the evidence presented to the board, the public will back up the board. Both the publishers and the union will recognize that it is in the public interest to voluntarily accept the recommendations of the board.

The time has come for industrial statesmanship on the part of both sides in this controversy and it is the recommendation that I make to both sides.

Mr. President, I have read this brief telecast speech as an introduction to the comments which I shall now make, which will not in themselves take very long, either. I think that short telecast speech summarizes pretty well the operative fact situation which has the city of Portland, Oreg.—and, in fact, our whole State—very much concerned not only about what has happened to good labor relations in the newspaper industry, but also with respect to the effect of the strike on labor relations in other industries.

If the Newhouse dynasty succeeds in breaking these newspaper unions in Portland, it will be but encouragement and inducement for other antilabor employers in our State—and we have our fair share—to try to undercut and destroy unions in their plants, and, second, to set up an open-shop movement in the State of Oregon. So I wish to make some additional comments in regard to this very sad situation.

This labor dispute, as I have said, involves Portland's two daily newspapers, the Oregonian and the Journal. Pitted against each other in this long drawn-out controversy are two contrasting economic groups.

On the one hand we have the employees, who with their families are local residents. They are our neighbors. They attend our churches. They go to our schools. They are employees who possess special skills in the typographical field, many of them having devoted most of their lives to those jobs. They are in Oregon today, as they will be when the dispute is finally settled.

On the other hand we have the Oregonian and the Journal, a daily newspaper monopoly of Portland, whose editorial policies and practices are almost indistinguishable. These papers are in effect one side of the coin. There are no daily newspaper opponents in Portland. This monopoly is dominated by the Oregonian, a member of the financial empire of the Newhouse chain of eastern newspapers and television stations. This monopoly is aided and abetted by mercenaries, imported strikebreakers, hired from the far corners of the Nation, who perform the work of professional strikebreakers. These mercenaries are paid handsomely to take over the jobs of responsible local residents.

In fact, Mr. President, these mercenaries are being put up, for the most part in one or two hotels in Portland, where all their expenses are paid and where they live in concert, Mr. President, in this nefarious occupation of theirs, the occupation of professional strikebreakers.

It is interesting to note that almost immediately after the strike broke out early in November the publishers installed strikebreakers imported from other States, some from as far away as Florida, Oklahoma, Louisiana, Ohio, and Massachusetts. Many are known to be professional strikebreakers.

Toward the end of my speech I shall ask permission to have printed in the RECORD certain documentation with regard to these strikebreakers, and certain documentation in regard to a professional business organization, surprisingly enough, Mr. President, which exists in this country to supply newspapers with traveling strikebreakers.

There is much evidence and documentation, which I shall later point out, that many months ago some of the strikebreakers in other parts of the country, in conversation, said to people from Oregon who were visiting in the parts of the country where the strikebreakers were at that time, that they expected to be in Portland in a matter of a few months.

There is much evidence that here again, as Newhouse has done elsewhere, there has been a longtime, thorough preparation of the economic warfare that he is conducting against the free men and women who belong to the newspaper unions in Portland.

As I intended to say later—I might as well say it now—I think the Portland case gives us the pilot case which calls upon the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare to proceed with an investigation of antiunion practices on the part of certain newspaper publishers. That involves the question of hiring professional strikebreakers, the question of transporting them, paying their expenses, and housing them in the area of the struck newspaper, and the question of strike insurance, about which I shall speak a little later in this speech tonight.

In my judgment these matters call for a thorough investigation by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare; and in due course of time I shall submit a resolution calling for such an investigation. It is not intended to be an investigation limited to the Portland situation, but the Portland situation will be but an example of the need for a thorough nationwide investigation as to what certain antilabor newspaper publishers in this country are up to.

I believe that here, too, the public needs the facts. I am perfectly willing to rely on the final judgment of fairness on the part of the public as the final arbiter in regard to these newspaper publisher practices.

I wish to stress that this is a typical technique and strategy used by the Newhouse empire when it sets out to try to break a newspaper union.

In all good humor I should point out that the Oregonian and the Journal have not been friendly to me since 1952. They have been sticking their poisonous editorial pens into my blood for some years now, and writing uncomplimentary editorials and attacks upon me. Because I feel those newspapers would not welcome any suggestions, I have not publicly expressed an opinion on the newspaper strike until today. I did not want in any way to follow a course of action which anyone could interpret as one which might in the slightest degree make a bad situation worse for the free men and women in the newspaper industry who are out on strike.

However, when the strike committee of the strikers asked me to prepare a television speech on this subject, I agreed to break my silence; and although I have not been making any public statements in regard to the Portland newspaper strike situation, I have been keeping myself thoroughly informed, and in some instances have given my advice and judgment in respect to some of the issues involved.

I would have the people of Oregon and Members of the Senate keep in mind the account of the views I offer on the floor of the Senate tonight concerning the strike, and my suggestions concerning action which might lead to a fair settlement of the dispute.

By and large, the people of Oregon have been given a partisan report as to the merits of the positions taken by the opposing parties. That has been true because practically the only media of newspaper information available to the people of Oregon have been, of course, the newspapers of these publishers, whose employees are out on strike.

It is very interesting to know what has happened. When the strike started the Portland Journal and the Oregonian joined forces. The Journal moved its operations over to the Oregonian building, and they are publishing a joint newspaper.

There are many rumors with respect to which I do not know the facts, as to what the business strategy is in regard to this remarkable merger of the two antiunion newspapers. The Journal publishers continue to deny that they plan to sell out to the Newhouse empire. However, the rumor persists that that is the business strategy of the Newhouse empire in their disputes elsewhere in the Nation, as they have worked to the end of merging, gobbling up, and buying out newspapers which have found themselves in a weakened economic position.

It is interesting to note that it is the Oregonian, owned by the Newhouse empire, which has the strike insurance, which involves one of the very controversial issues which stirred up so much bitter resentment in my State, because more and more people are beginning to recognize the union "busting" purpose of the so-called strike insurance policy. I shall come to that subject later.

I point out that the people of my State have not had access to a full discussion of the pros and cons of this controversy, because they have no newspaper of general circulation to go to, other than the two struck newspapers. The publishers are putting out a joint newspaper. We can take judicial notice of the fact that we have only to read the issues of that newspaper to see that we obtain, from the accounts of the strike in the newspaper of the publishers of the struck plant, a biased and slanted account. Therefore, to a great extent, the people of my State have had to rely upon the views expressed on the pages of the struck newspaper.

An outstanding religious leader of Portland, Dr. Richard M. Steiner, of Portland's First Unitarian Church, stated it very well when he said that, in his opinion, to a large degree, the public has had to rely "upon rumors and upon the biased statements printed by the party that has control of the main avenue of information."

Later I shall ask consent to place in the RECORD some statements which have been published by other religious leaders in my State, who likewise have deplored the fact that the people of my State have not had access to the newspaper media of information which would guarantee to them unbiased accounts of the issues involved in the strike.

It should be stressed again and again that those who are on strike and those who are observing the picket lines at the Oregonian and the Journal are only asking that the traditional practices of collective bargaining be followed by the newspapers.

The empty words of the Oregonian and the Journal fail to fill the void caused by their unwillingness to cooperate with anyone in the interest of bringing this dispute to a conclusion. They have declined to meet with the Governor of Oregon. They have declined the offer of assistance by Oregon's clergy. In my judgment they have failed to use reasonable efforts at the bargaining table to bring about a fair settlement with their employees.

As I said in my brief telecast speech, which I have already read into the RECORD, Governor Hatfield, of my State, and Senator NEUBERGER, my colleague in the Senate, some weeks ago made the recommendation publicly that the parties to the dispute ought to agree to have a factfinding board appointed and have that board or the parties make a report of the facts to the people of Oregon.

It was a very fair and sensible proposal, but it was the newspapers who rejected it. The unions made clear that they would accept the Hatfield-Neuberger proposal. As Senators will see from the material that I shall insert in the RECORD later, it was the position of the newspapers that they saw no reason for accepting the proposal, because it would only bring the dispute into the arena of politics.

Mr. President, it should be brought into the arena of politics, in the high sense of the term of politics. It was in that sense that Governor Hatfield and Senator NEUBERGER made their suggestion. As I have said earlier tonight, the matter now is imbued and filled with the public interest. When the public interest becomes involved in any economic struggle, the officials of government representing a free people have a duty to step in and make proposals for a settlement of the dispute in a way which will protect the public interest and, by protecting the public interest, be fair to the disputants.

At the time they made their proposal, the proposal of Governor Hatfield and Senator NEUBERGER would have accomplished that purpose. Although I happened to be in South America at the time their proposal was made, had I been in the country I would not have hesitated, if asked, to endorse it.

Mr. President, in this case I believe we have gone beyond the stage at which factfinding alone will suffice. I believe we have reached the stage in this dispute where the public interest is so affected that the public is entitled to have the recommendations of fair, impartial, judicial, and competent men as to how they think the dispute on the merits ought to be settled, in fairness to all three parties to the dispute, namely, the newspaper management, the employees, and the public. It is such a proposal that I recommend today. In my judgment, the record of the case shows that the newspaper publishers have failed to use reasonable efforts at the bargaining table to bring about a fair settlement with their employees.

I have arbitrated many major labor cases in my professional career, over a good many years. Although it is important to make one's final judgment based entirely upon the record of evidence which is before him, it is perfectly obvious, as we read what has happened thus far procedurally on the part of the newspaper owners in this case, that they have not participated in good-faith bargaining. The evidence of the strategy that they have used from session to session convinces me that their desire has not been to bargain collectively with the employees but to put the employees in a position whereby they will be compelled to surrender to the employer's terms and demands. No wonder there has been stirred up among the newspaper workers in Portland the attitude "We will dig in for as long as necessary to protect the precious rights for which labor has sacrificed so much over the years to win for itself."

I wish to say that if the employers in this country decide to adopt the tactics being used by the Newhouse empire in the Portland newspaper strike, the country can get ready for militancy on the part of free men and women in the American labor movement the like of which we have not known for some decades. Free men and women in the American labor movement cannot sacrifice these precious rights which are so deeply imbedded now in the whole collective bargaining fabric of American industrial relations.

That is why I am making a plea for a relaxation of tensions, for a recognition on the part of those in the controversy that we have reached a point now where the rules of reason will have to be applied. If they are going to be applied, we will have to bring in a third party in the form of an impartial board to sit in judgment and recommend to the parties and to the public what would be a commonsense solution, issue-by-issue, of this very difficult controversy.

Of course the attitude and practices of the Newhouse empire in its antiunion drive in Portland is not only bad, but it has created a very sad situation. However, that is not surprising if one takes the time to study the tactics and practices of the Newhouse newspaper chain in other parts of the country prior to the strike in Portland.

After all, what can be expected of newspapers that resort to the unscrupulous 19th century practice of importing hired professional strikebreakers to resolve disputes? This conduct is generally shunned by most employers of our day. We can say with pride that that is the case. Therefore I am particularly disappointed that in the year 1960 we would have a newspaper publisher, the head of a great newspaper chain and a great economic empire, resorting to the tactic of importing strikebreakers, which is a tactic that most people, I believe, thought was rapidly disappearing from the whole scene of industrial disputes in our country.

But there it is, rearing its ugly head in the largest city of my State. I rise on the floor of the Senate to protest it. I rise on the floor of the Senate to plead through this speech with the people of the State of Oregon to make clear that there is no place in Oregon for a return to the strike-busting tactics adopted by antiunion employers in the 1880's, 1890's, and early 1900's, who took the stiff-necked position that they would kill the union rather than bargain with it in good faith and agree to reasonable terms of hours, wages, and conditions of employment.

That these newspapers have warped my words in the past and have presented half truths about me is not too surprising, because that is their political stock in trade. But now they are blasting their employees of many years and at the same time are wrapping a cloak of alleged goodness around hired strike breakers. Their regular employees on strike or observing the picket lines are fighting for what they believe is right and in the best interests of the working people and trade union members of Portland and Oregon in general.

The publishers are simply running true to form. They have fought liberal thought. Now they turn their wrath on their employees who want only the time-honored processes of collective bargaining observed so that their position may be considered by management and a settlement finally reached.

The Portland newspaper monopoly has recently been issuing sanctimonious editorials alleging a breach of contracts by the various typographical unions. But these editorials fail to point out some significant facts.

The Stereotypers' Union contract had terminated before its members went out on strike; the Printers' Union contract had expired on September 15, the Photoengravers' Union members worked for 2 days until the contract expired on November 15, then they respected the picket line.

The Newspaper Guild contract does not have a no-strike clause and nothing in the contract requires the union to go through a picket line; some members of the Newspaper Guild returned to work, others have not.

The Pressmen's Union contract expired December 31, 1959, and prior to that time the international officers of the union ordered the members to fulfill the union's contract with the publishers, thereby demonstrating the international union's responsibility.

By secret ballot local members of the Pressmen's Union voted 108 to 1 to go out on strike and on January 1 took strike action; the Paper Handlers voted 22 to 0 to strike.

The International Typographical Union had no contract, but held 13 meetings with the publishers prior to the time of the strike, without making progress; the stereotypers met with the publishers 18 times prior to the strike without being able to resolve the dispute.

The Portland newspaper monopoly, like all backward-looking employers, relied heavily upon legalisms in dealing labor relations. Employers of this type refuse to recognize the facts of life in these relationships and proceed unrealistically to ignore the fact that no self-respecting member of a union wants to cross the picket line of a sister union when a labor dispute is in progress.

If the strike should succeed, the next logical step, of course, would be the operation of nonunion papers. That is really what the Newhouse newspaper chain is seeking. I am particularly concerned over the fact that the Federal law now on the books does not effectively prohibit the importation of strikebreakers as now practiced by the Oregonian and Journal. At my request the Library of Congress supplied a brief memorandum on this subject, and I ask unanimous consent that the memorandum and the text of the Byrnes Act be inserted at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the memorandum and act were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DECEMBER 22, 1959.

To: The Honorable WAYNE MORSE.
From: Economics Division.
Subject: The Byrnes Act.

The Byrnes Act prohibits not only the transportation of persons to obstruct or interfere with peaceful picketing but applies also to the transportation of persons with the intent to employ them to obstruct or interfere with the right of employees to organize collectively for bargaining purposes. Because this law has been invoked infrequently, there are no recorded court decisions which would show just how far the law goes in restricting management's right to replace strikers with new employees brought in from other States. (BNA Labor Policy and Practices. Labor Relations, 60: 482.)

TRANSPORTATION OF STRIKEBREAKERS (BYRNES ACT)

(Act of June 24, 1936, 49 Stat. 1899, Public Law 776, ch. 746, 74th Cong., 2d sess., as last amended by act of May 24, 1949, ch. 139, sec. 30, 63 Stat. 94, 18 U.S.C., ch. 57, sec. 1231.)

An act making it a felony to transport in interstate or foreign commerce persons to be employed to obstruct or interfere with the right of peaceful picketing during labor controversies.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whoever willfully transports in interstate or foreign commerce any person who is employed or is to be employed for the purpose of obstructing or interfering by force or threats with (1) peaceful picketing by employees during any labor controversy affecting wages, hours, or conditions of labor, or (2) the exercise by employees of any of the rights of self-organization or collective bargaining; or

Whoever is knowingly transported in or travels in interstate or foreign commerce for any of the purposes enumerated in this section—

Shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned not more than 2 years, or both.

This section shall not apply to common carriers.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I think it is fair to charge employers with the knowledge of the fact that union men and women by the thousands will always insist upon acting in their individual capacity if there is an attempt made, even by the union itself, to force them across a legitimate picket line. This is a very deep-seated conviction on the part of a union member. It is something which is charged with great emotionalism and deep feeling. There is hardly anything which can raise the blood pressure of a good union man or woman quicker than the suggestion by a brother union member that he has become a scab by crossing a picket line.

My colleagues in the Senate have heard me plead over the years from the floor, as we have discussed labor legislation, about this matter. I have tried to point out that this happens to be one of the facts of life in connection with the union movement. The history of the American labor movement has too many crosses which are revered by union men and women; crosses symbolizing the lives of union men and women who have been willing to sacrifice their lives, in the earlier days of militant struggle, to gain the right to join a union and to insist upon the requirement of having an employer bargain collectively over wages, hours, and conditions of employment. The literature in this field is voluminous.

In 1960, the Newhouse empire is not going to turn back the clock, and the combination of antiunion employers in this country is not going to turn it back, because free men and women in a free society will not allow it.

It is a sad thing that the great State of Oregon, with its wonderful record over the years, of fair labor conditions, high wages, and a high standard of living for our workers, is confronted with this termite attempt on the part of the Newhouse empire to undermine the citadel and temple of freedom represented by free collective bargaining in the State of Oregon.

It will continue to be my plea and my prayer that reason will come to prevail in this economic crisis in my State. Both sides will recognize now that eventually this strike has to be settled; that eventually it will be settled; and that when it is settled, undoubtedly it will be settled, in part, because an aroused and enlightened public opinion makes clear to all concerned in the struggle, and to the officials of government, that a fair settlement must be provided and carried out. If eventually—can we not ask the question again?—why not now? Why let this waste, why let this suffering, why let this ill feeling which is building up and mounting day by day, continue?

To the end of trying to provide a common sense suggestion for a fair way out for all concerned, I offer the suggestion that the deans or members of the faculties of three or five or seven schools of journalism in this country be accepted by the parties to the dispute as a fact-finding board having the authority to make recommendations for the settlement of the strike, with the clear understanding, just as under the Railway Labor Act of 1926, that the recommendations are not to be binding upon the parties. If the suggestion of having this done by the deans of the schools of journalism is objectionable for some reason or is rejected by one or both of the parties for a good reason of which I am not aware, I am not married to that particular personnel arrangement.

What is wrong with asking some recognized, impartial agency or individual to appoint a fact-finding, recommending board? So far as I am concerned, when I was on the War Labor Board and had an opportunity to observe the policies followed by the U.S. Mediation and Conciliation Service in those rare instances in which they appointed arbitrators, they did a remarkably fair job in the selection of impartial men.

I call upon them to do it. I call upon the Governor of the State to do it.

I recognize that judges are rather hesitant to serve on boards of arbitration; they hesitate because they believe that if they were to serve on such boards, then some how or other, in some way or other, they might be looked upon as bringing the strict judicial approach into nonjudicial controversies. However, there are instances in which the parties to such disputes have agreed to have a judicial officer serve on a board to make findings of fact and recommendations; and that possibility should be considered in this instance.

Mr. President, there are available to the parties to this dispute, many sources for the selection of impartial persons to serve on a board to take testimony, study the case, and make findings of fact, recommendations, and a report. I suggest that consideration be given to including on such a board members of schools of journalism, because I believe that such persons know the newspaper industry and are thoroughly familiar with the problems which confront newspaper publishers and workers. It seems to me that from the standpoint of experience, members of schools of journalism are very well qualified to serve on boards to make such findings of fact, recommendations, and reports.

But certainly there can be no excuse for rejection of my suggestion by either party to the dispute, on the ground that it would be difficult to obtain impartial members. In our free society we have not reached the point where it is impossible to find a procedure which any fair-minded person will regard as a reasonable one for the selection of other fair-minded persons to serve on a board to judge the facts in connection with such a dispute.

It is too bad that the newspaper industry, which is the beneficiary of the precious trust which accompanies the rights under the freedom-of-the-press clause of the Constitution—and they are constitutional rights, not privileges—should betray its trust in the way the Newhouse empire has been doing in connection with its union-breaking campaign in Portland, Oreg.

Mr. President, I believe all Members of the Senate know that if any proposal to infringe upon freedom of the press in the Nation were made, I would be in the forefront of those who would defend and insist upon protecting the right of the newspapers to have full enjoyment of freedom of the press.

But, Mr. President, other freedoms are precious, too. Among them is the right of union members to enjoy free collective bargaining. I need not tell the Senate or the people of Oregon that if there ever came a time when that freedom was infringed upon or was placed under destructive restrictions, we would then begin to lose a large part of our freedoms.

It has often been stated—but the statement still needs to be repeated—that when freedom in any country begins to wane, its wane usually begins with an attack on labor. In any country in which attempts to destroy freedom are made, the first ones are usually attempts to destroy the freedom of the workers.

Mr. President, I do not say there is any danger of a loss of freedom in our Nation as a whole. But I say we must be constantly vigilant and on guard against any attempt, at any time, in any segment of the body politic, to impair the full enjoyment of the rights of free men and women. In my judgment, those rights are being impaired in the Portland newspaper strike.

I believe we now need a procedure which will bring a return to reason in this situation; and for that purpose I have this evening offered my proposal.

Mr. President, I am about to request unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, various editorials and articles which bear upon the Portland newspaper strike. I have selected them from the voluminous material with regard to the strike which has come to my office. In selecting them, I have been motivated by a desire to present material on both sides of the controversy.

In this material will be found editorials, from the Oregonian-Journal, in which all sides of the controversy are set forth; also an article which sets forth in full the statements made by the members of a television panel, in the course of a broadcast in Portland, presenting the workers' side of the controversy. In the same article the editors of the Oregonian-Journal have set forth their rebuttal to the contentions made by the panelists on the program.

I believe it important that all Members of the Senate read this material, in order to ascertain the contentions of the parties to the controversy. After Senators complete their reading of this material, I am perfectly willing to rest my case on their judgment of it.

I urge that this material be read by all Senators, not because I shall ask the Senate to intervene in the Portland newspaper strike, but because this material discloses, in connection with the strike, a pattern of activity by some newspaper publishers which, in my judgment, calls for an investigation by the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of certain antilabor tactics, policies, and strategies by some newspaper editors.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, a number of newspaper articles and editorials which I believe present a fair synopsis of the employer contentions in the Portland newspaper dispute.

There being no objection, the editorials and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregon Journal, Nov. 25, 1959]

SO OUR READERS MAY KNOW

Fifty-odd employees of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal represented by Stereotypers' Union No. 48 commenced a strike against the two newspaper companies at 5 a.m., November 10, 1959. Approximately 850 employees represented by other unions refused to cross the picket line of the Stereotypers' Union. The unions representing the 850 employees, with the sole exception of Multnomah Typographical Union No. 58, had valid existing contracts with the newspaper companies when the strike commenced. Not a single contract with the newspaper companies held by any union gave the union or the employees it represented the right to refuse to cross the stereotypers' picket line or the right to refuse to perform the work for which they had been employed. In every case the sanctity of contract was ignored. The employees and their unions flouted their contracts and violated their terms.

To avoid a strike the companies during the week preceding the strike in the presence of Federal Mediator Elmer Williams:

1. Offered to let an impartial arbitrator establish the number of men to be employed on new machinery during the life of the contract if the union raised a grievance over the number of men assigned to work on the machine by management. This offer was rejected by Stereotypers' Union No. 48 and by its international union.

2. Offered to submit all matters of difference over the terms of a new contract to final and binding impartial arbitration. This offer was rejected by Stereotypers' Union No. 48 and its international union.

3. Invited, in fact especially requested, the president of the international union to come to Portland and negotiate with the companies after he and his executive board had told the local union they could not agree to avoid a strike by arbitrating the terms of a new contract.

This request made upon the International Stereotyper Union President James Sampson through the local union was rejected and Stereotypers Union No. 48 continued to insist that (a) four men be employed on a one-man machine, (b) foremen must be union members, and (c) the companies recognize their right of substitution, even though it meant payment of time and one-half for a full shift to a replacement employee.

When the companies on November 9, 1959, received word that the stereotypers would commence a strike on November 10, 1959, at 5 a.m. they—

1. Through department heads and supervisors instructed all employees to report for work as usual at their regular starting times on November 10, 1959, even though they might have to cross a picket line.

2. Through proper union officials of each group of employees requested that the employees be told by their union they should honor their union's contract with the companies and report for work as usual even though they might have to cross a picket line.

When the pickets went on at 5 a.m. on November 10, 1959:

1. Employees represented by the Portland Newspaper Guild who ordinarily commence work at 5 a.m. at the Oregon Journal refused to cross the picket line.

2. As time went by employees of the Journal represented by the Typographical Union, Pressmen's Union, Mailers Union, Machinists Union, and Paper Handlers Union also refused to cross the picket line.

3. Employees represented by these same unions scheduled to report later in the morning at the Oregonian also refused to cross the picket line.

4. All entrances at the Journal were open to employees who wished to report for work until 12 noon on November 10, 1959. After that hour, only the main entrance remained open.

5. All regular entrances and employee entrances remained open at the Oregonian throughout the day November 10, 1959.

At mid-morning November 10, 1959, the managements of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal, recognizing that production necessity would permit operation in only one plant, agreed to produce a joint paper in the Oregonian plant using supervisory personnel and loyal employees of the advertising and circulation departments of both papers who agreed to help with the production effort. Approximately 750 loyal employees remain at work with the two newspapers.

At about 2 p.m. on November 10, 1959, the managements of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal agreed to continue temporarily a joint publication in the Oregonian plant until such a time as production in their separate plants could be effectively resumed.

To carry out this agreement, immediate steps were taken to make individual offers of full-time permanent employment with the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal as separate newspapers to trained production personnel. This offer was made throughout the United States. The response to the offer has been and continues to be heavy.

Offers of permanent employment to perforator operator trainees and other mechanical trainees have been made and continue to be made in the help wanted classified columns of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal.

Joint production will be continued until separate production by the Journal can be effectively resumed in the Journal plant.

Our readers must know that—

1. The stereotypers struck despite means of peaceful settlement offered by the companies.

2. Employees represented by other unions refused to cross stereotypers' picket lines even though they were requested and instructed to report to work by the companies.

3. Union and employees alike flouted contracts and made mockery of contracts negotiated in good faith through collective bargaining.

4. The Journal has joined hands with the Oregonian as a production necessity. It is an independent home-owned corporation and intends to return to separate production in the Journal plant when the production problems for the opera'ion of the two plants have been solved.

SO OUR READERS MAY KNOW—No. 2

As the Portland newspaper strike enters its third week, union propagandists are redoubling their efforts to confuse the public and compound the difficulties of settlement. This fanatical campaign of self-justification is being conducted not only on behalf of the stereotypers who struck the papers in the face of the publishers' offer to arbitrate. It is being conducted also in defense of those other unions whose members rushed into the streets—and into the picket lines—most in flagrant violation of their contracts, all in complete disregard of the publishers' offer of continued work for those who would stay on the job and honor their contracts or would bargain for new contracts in the normal manner.

The stereotypers are represented in this campaign by the unions as having been pushed into the strike by a management demand to dictate the manning of a new machine. The truth is that management was willing to negotiate and even arbitrate the number of men to be employed on the MAN plate caster after the machine had been given a fair trial in production.

It was the Stereotypers Union that insisted that its antiquated make-work rules should govern the manning of the machine for an indefinite period. The manufacturer has stated that the new machine calls for only one man. The union's offer to "negotiate after the machine was installed" meant, simply, that the companies would be required to operate the machine with four men. This represented no savings at all over manning on present machines. Worse than mere featherbedding, this union position was tantamount to a demand that the publishers agree not to install the new machine, since its only value is as a labor-saving device. The local union's claim that the companies have rejected the traditional method for determining the number of men to be employed on stereotyping equipment, namely through negotiation between the American Newspaper Publishers Association and the International Stereotypers' Union is based on a false premise. George N. Dale, for 17 years head of the ANPA labor office in Chicago, categorically denies that any such negotiations have ever taken place or are now contemplated between the employers' national trade association and the international union.

But the manning of the MAN machine was only 1 issue, not 1 out of 3 but 1 out of 20 or more issues, which the union left unbargained or half bargained on the table when its members hurried out to call the strike.

The unlimited right of lay-off, virtually unknown outside the printing trades and not permitted in many printing trades contracts, had been discussed and an impasse had been reached because of the union's refusal to consider any practical solution to the companies' problem of resultant overtime. The union's promise of a straight-time substitute for a regular employee laying off for his own convenience was an empty gesture. It could only result, in most cases, in the companies incurring overtime at the end of the week when the companies needed extra help at straight-time rates.

The publishers and the union bargained and deadlocked over a contract requirement, believed by the companies to be illegal under recent decisions of the National Labor Relations Board, under which the foreman must become a member of the union and take an oath to enforce certain unlawful closed-shop rules laid down by the international. The companies did not say that foremen might not voluntarily join the union.

Hardly considered at the end of the 18 bargaining sessions were the usual union demands on wages, hours, and fringe benefits. The companies had made it clear, however, both to the stereotypers and to the typographical union, that they had no objection to, and in fact favored, a health and welfare program or other union elected fringes. For 4 years, the companies have proposed that the union take health and welfare contributions out of their negotiated wage-cost package, thereby giving themselves a tax advantage. Most unions rejected this. The stereotypers and typographers specifically demanded and obtained a cash settlement instead. The publishers renewed their proposal this year.

Why, then, did the strike occur November 10? The conclusion is inescapable that the stereotypers, who boasted across the bargaining table that they had obtained "100 percent support" from the other unions, contracts or no contracts, hoped, intended, and confidently expected to shut down the two Portland newspapers at the onset of the pre-Christmas advertising and shopping season so that they might force their demands upon a prostrate Oregonian and Oregon Journal—economic consequences to the community notwithstanding.

So the stereotypers did strike in accordance with their timetable, when it would hurt the newspapers the most, and the other unions went out with the stereotypers, most in cynic disregard for their contract commitments. But part of the plan failed. The Oregonian and the Oregon Journal did not capitulate or lie down and die as metropolitan newspapers are expected to do when confronted with a plantwide strike.

These two competing newspapers joined forces temporarily to publish jointly under a combined masthead and thus to maintain service as best they could to readers and advertisers in Portland and the Pacific Northwest. That service is improving and will continue to improve no matter how long the strike lasts. The Journal will resume publication in its own plant when the production problems for a two-plant operation are solved.

Meanwhile—back at the bargaining table—the negotiators will try to unscramble the omelet of old issues and new problems raised by the strike itself. With all the broken contracts lying around, the question will arise how any agreement can be signed with these unions and be worth the paper it is written on. In fact, this basic question of union integrity and the sanctity of contracts now becomes the major problem—a problem which goes to the very foundation of the collective bargaining relationship.

In the stereotypers' strike and the walkout of the unions, Humpty-Dumpty had a great fall. It remains to be seen whether Humpty-Dumpty can be put back together again.

INTERUNION'S BLUEPRINT FOR ACTION

The following is a complete text of a TV program broadcast over KGW–TV on Friday night, December 11:

"ANNOUNCER. Views expressed on the following program are not necessarily those of KGW–TV or the Pioneer Broadcasting Co. The Portland interunion strike committee presents 'A Blueprint for Action,' another report to the people bringing you the big story of the Portland newspaper strike. Here now is James T. Marr, executive secretary of the Oregon AFL–CIO.

"Mr. MARR. Tonight the talk on interunion newspaper strike committee presents 'A Blueprint for Action.' In our prior programs we have given a factual picture of the demands of management and the conciliatory attitude of the unions involved. We have presented a panel of responsible business, professional, and trade union representatives who have spoken in favor of the position taken by the unions. Last week we told the story of the strike directly from the mouths of those most closely involved in the strike-lockout—the strikers and their families—of those who are suffering not only economic hardship but also the anguish brought about by threatening telephone calls demanding that they give up their union activity or else. And we do not accuse the newspaper managements for being responsible for the threatening phone calls. We should not be fooled for 1 minute. The Portland public is being shortchanged by the struck newspapers. For the hybrid newspaper that is being published behind curtained windows is charging double rates for classified advertising for a reduced circulation. The same newspaper, representing itself to be a joint venture publication incorporating both the Oregonian and the Journal, is being written by only a small fraction of the number of the normal news staff. A hundred and forty newsmen and photographers, members of the Portland Newspaper Guild, are respecting the picket line. The working press is not working. Management is filling the news columns with wire-service reports and an occasional local story. The unions do not believe that newspaper management has bargained in good faith and feel that newspaper management has failed to keep faith with the reading public by endeavoring to publish some kind of a paper in order to try to maintain their display advertising accounts, while at the same time they are probably receiving substantial strike insurance. It is interesting to note that the largest local advertising in the struck newspaper is the largest non-union department store in Portland. A blueprint for action must be based on fact. To clearly determine the facts we have asked Keith Burns, deputy district attorney for Multnomah County, to examine representatives of the striking Stereotypers Union and members of the other unions involved in this dispute. Mr. Burns.

"KEITH BURNS. There are many questions—burning questions—in the minds of the public regarding the current newspaper strike. As we are not in any way connected with the strike or the unions involved, I hope that I will be able to ask of those present some of the very questions that you as members of the public may have in mind. Mr. Cotner, it is my understanding that you are a member of the scale or negotiating committee of Stereotypers' Local 48, and that you have been present during the meetings of your union with the management of Portland's daily newspaper. Tell me, Mr. Cotner, what in your judgment, is responsible for the failure of management and the union to get together on the matter of this new machine that has become such an issue in this strike?

"TED COTNER. Mr. Burns, throughout the more than 20 bargaining sessions that we've had with management, the question of the number of men required to operate this machine and the method of which their manning will be determined has been a continuing stumbling block. Our union has made many concessions to management in respect to our position in regarding this machine. Our present position, which seems reasonable to me and which I feel certain the public will feel is reasonable, is simply this: First of all, this MAN machine, which is manufactured in Germany, is not installed in the Oregonian. Actually, the management of the Oregonian has only stated that they intend to buy such a machine sometime in the future. Now, it is my understanding that if the company laid the cash on the line tomorrow, it would be at least a year before this machine could be delivered. However, during the negotiations and in the interest of settling this strike, the union has offered to operate the machine with the X number of men—in other words, the number found to be necessary to operate the machine for the life of any contract arrived through these current negotiations without any work stoppage or strike at the time the new machine is introduced. We ask that the union, in conjunction with management, shall determine the number of men required to operate the machine safely and to the best interests of the company in terms of production. The company has said "No" to this and insists that the manning of this machine be left entirely up to its foreman as concerning the number of employees to operate it safely.

"KEITH BURNS. Briefly, then, you have said that the union will man the machine when and if it is installed with X number of men. You ask that management and the union jointly determine the number of stereotypers necessary to do the job safely and quickly.

"Mr. COTNER. Yes; that is our position.

"Mr. BURNS. And management has said "No" to this—that it wants the right to determine the number of men required to operate the machine.

"Also with us this evening is Perry Badgley, international representative of the Stereotypers Union. Mr. Badgley has also been present at some of the more recent negotiating sessions. Mr. Badgley, what are your impressions of negotiations to date?

"PERRY BADGLEY. Well, Mr. Burns, I can say, without any hesitation, that during the 15 years that I have been active in negotiations in behalf of our international union, I have never run into a situation of the nature to be found here in Portland. Time and time again during these negotiations sessions the union has been willing to make concessions to management. Each time concessions are made, which we feel should result in bringing the parties closer together, management still will not agree with our proposal which we feel to be reasonable. Never have we gotten down to the bedrock consideration of the union's proposals. It is obvious to me that the problems that have been presented by management are not the real problems at all. They serve only as a guide to hide the real intent and purpose of the strike. To me the most damning proposal to come out of the negotiations are the demand of management that they want us to take into our union the imported strikebreakers who are now operating the machines that our members, many of whom are long-time residents of Portland, operated before the strike Management now asks that these imported strikebreakers be given priority of employment over those regular employees who were forced out on strike by what we believe to be unreasonable demands of management. The MAN machine, the foreman clause, and that of the right of substitution have been used by management as a smokescreen issue behind which they can hide their intent to establish a nonunion operation for their publications. This position taken by the company that strikebreakers be given job priority over their other employees now on strike should serve as a cue to the minds of the public when they consider who is right and who is wrong in this current strike situation. For if its demand for the vicious undercutting of their own employees is indicative of the frame of mind of newspaper management, this serves only to show them in their true light.

"Mr. BURNS. Mr. Cotner, Mr. Badgley has mentioned the foreman clause issue. Can you tell us briefly what is involved in this disputed issue?

"Mr. COTNER. To make what has been a rather long story throughout these negotiations somewhat shorter, I will tell you of the exact position of the stereotype union on this issue and this position again has been arrived at on the part of the union as a matter of a concession to the demands of management in the interest of bringing this strike to a conclusion. We ask, simply, that the matter of whether or not a foreman be a member of the union be left entirely up to the individual foreman. This is all we are asking. To this management says "No." They have contended that it is illegal for foremen to belong to the union. We contend that it is legal. In recent weeks the Federal circuit court of appeals has upheld our convictions.

"Mr. BURNS. Mr. Cotner, why has this matter become an issue? Why do you feel that a foreman should have a right to belong to the union?

"Mr. COTNER. Well first of all, it is important to understand that a foreman in our trade is a working foreman. He works right along with the journeymen on the job. These foremen have come up through the ranks, first as an apprentice, then as a journeyman, later as an assistant foreman and then the foreman, all of which, incidentally, are covered by the contract. Union membership in a craft union is a valuable possession of the member. He has worked at the trade for years to become proficient in his job and become a recognized journeyman. We ask only that the right of self-determination be left up to the individual when he becomes a foreman. We ask only that he be given the right to continue his association and membership in an organization representing his trade if this be his choice.

"Mr. BURNS. Mr. Badgley, when you spoke before you mentioned another issue, the right of substitution. Can you explain briefly what is the area of disagreement in this matter?

"Mr. BADGLEY. Well, the matter of the right of substitution can be stated very simply. The union asks that, if it is necessary for a stereotyper to take time off from his job to attend to personal business, that the union be given the right to furnish in his place a fully qualified stereotyper who will work at the straight-time rate. Management states that such substitutions result in occasion where a time-and-a-half rate must be hired. They also demand that an employee must go to his foreman and his right to time off will be determined completely on the say-so of the foreman. We contend that if a man, for instance, wants to take time off because of a death in his family, and the union is willing to supply a qualified journeyman stereotyper in his place at the straight-time rate, that he should be entitled to do so without having to give an accounting to his foreman exactly why it is he needs the time to attend to his personal business. We feel that if a substitute can be supplied the company at no additional expense to the company, that the matter of the right of substitution fails to stand up as an issue to be opposed by management in this strike situation.

"Mr. BURNS. It seems to me that you have both answered the questions fairly regarding where the union stands on this issue. I know by your comment, and it is apparent from your tone of voice, that it is your feeling that the union has reached the end of the road in terms of concessions to newspaper management as regards the matters at issue. As a local union representative, Mr. Cotner, can you tell me how your membership now feels about this matter?

"Mr. COTNER. My union is 100 percent behind their negotiating committee and their officers. The apparent hope on the part of newspaper management that our members will pick up and drift away is totally unrealistic. We are prepared to wait out the time that it requires the Oregonian and Journal to learn that it is just too expensive to continue operations with hired outside strikebreakers, and all the costs connected with maintaining this type of struck operation. We appreciate the tremendous public support that has been given our cause in terms of newspaper cancellations on the part of the thousands of individuals. Our participation in this and the television programs that have preceded it, I feel, have been crystal clear evidence of our complete willingness to let the public know what has led to the strike, what the current strike developments are and, still more important, that we are going to stand our ground against imported strikebreakers, telephone threats—and, again we do not accuse management of these threats—and our belief that management has failed to bargain in good faith, and management's failure even to meet with the Governor of Oregon to discuss the settlement of this dispute. We are determined that when this strike is settled the Portland daily newspapers will continue to be manned by union employees paid a fair living wage and contributing their part to the social and civic betterment of our community. We ask only that the public be aware of the fact, and being aware of the fact, join us in our fight against those concepts of newspaper management that have resulted in the importation of strikebreakers and the continuance of management's attitude alien to the long-established practice of bargaining collectively with their employees.

"Mr. BURNS. It is my understanding that the reporters and photographers regularly employed by Portland's two daily newspapers are respecting the stereotypers' picket line. We have with us this evening Mr. Charles Dale, international representative of the Newspaper Guild who is in Portland representing the Newspaper Guild during the current stereotypers' strike. Mr. Dale, the guild members are the regular news gatherers for the Oregonian and the Journal and perhaps those who by virtue of their work are close to the pulse beat of our community. How do they feel about this strike?

"CHARLES DALE. Well, on the eve of the Portland stereotypers' strike, the Portland Newspaper Guild met and for over 2 hours debated all aspects of the crisis. Then in secret ballot they voted overwhelmingly to honor the stereotyper picket line. The decision came despite the fact that the guild has a contract in existence with both dailies, a contract that will not expire until next June. The guild's action was not taken lightly. Since the strike began, guild members have been honoring the picket line as a matter of survival, for this strike did not come as any great surprise. Evidence is shown that the Portland newspaper unions would have been facing a strike sooner or later. It was nearly the guild in October, stereotypers last month and this, it could have been the printers or the mailers or the pressmen or perhaps the guild next June. I do not believe this strike could have been avoided, even if the union had wanted to concede all of the conditions demanded by the publishers, even if the unions had been willing to give up all of the traditional contract clauses. I believe this.

"Mr. BURNS. This seem to me like a statement that could be enlarged upon. Exactly why do you feel that the strike could not have been avoided?

"Mr. DALE. Well it appears to me there has been a great deal of a high degree of planning for the strike by management prior to the time the strike actually began. Witness the influx of professional strikebreakers within hours after the stereotypers' picket line first went up in the early morning hours of November 10. That very afternoon a paper came out, a makeshift product to be sure, but a paper just the same. Next day and in the days that followed the quality of the paper improved as more and more strikebreakers arrived from all over the country. By this time last week, guild members, reporters, and editors had uncovered upward of 70 strikebreakers. If any have left recently is unknown. But certainly more are arriving all the time. This, despite the resentment Portland residents feel against such tactics, despite the feeling that the clock in labor-management relations has been turned back decades by the actions of the two daily newspapers. Strikebreakers are new in the Northwest, but professional strikebreakers are not new to the American Newspaper Guild. They are even more familiar to the International Typographical Union, the pressmen, the stereotypers, and the mailers, for repeatedly in the East and in the South we have found ourselves faced with the same problem, professional strikebreakers brought in not only to run the paper after the strike begins but even before negotiations have deadlocked. They are brought in and kept as standbys in hotel rooms and serve as a constant threat to the negotiating union. They are a continual menace to collective bargaining in good faith. You know it is sometimes very difficult to convince people of this fact—strikebreakers are a menace to the living standards of the entire community. Let them break down the unions in the newspaper business. Let them make it possible for the two publishers to operate without union contracts and before long the temptation of low wage rates, of no contracts, will be too great for even some of the best employers, and in will come more strikebreakers and down will go the living standards. Here in Portland the guild has collected evidence of a parade of the hardest and most experienced strikebreakers. We have the McCoy leadership. Leo McCoy, of Oklahoma City or Galveston, Tex. He is a veteran of strikebreaking operations, Las Vegas, Kennewick, Oklahoma City, Galveston, and Ypsilanti, Mich., are among his shadowy assignments. Then there is L. B. Maxwell, born December 22, 1927, a veteran of the Monroe, La., strike, a member of the notorious strikebreaking crew of Bloor Schleppey and Shirley Klein. A lack of time prohibits me giving details of other strikebreakers known to be working on the two struck dailies. Of course, they are being ably assisted by local residents who have been attracted to the papers by promises of high hourly rates, incentive bonuses, and so forth. Hardened strikebreakers, schooled in the art of killing unions and stealing jobs, are no longer a source of surprise to international union employees. We have become accustomed to their faces. One thing that never fails to surprise us, however, is the reaction of the local people who, seeing the possibility of a fast buck by scabbing reach out and grab it. That newspapers, which in most communities stand as a symbol of freedom and justice, should stoop to the tactics now being practiced by the Oregonian and the Journal, is in my judgment, deplorable. Many members of the general public have made their feelings known by refusing to accept into their homes newspapers which are responsible for bringing into Portland such an undesirable element as professional strikebreakers.

"Mr. BURNS. Thank you, Mr. Dale. Now I would like to ask Mr. Chet Rookledge, a lifelong printer, who I understand has watched the growth and development of free collective bargaining over a period of 40 years how he feels the current strike situation compares with labor-management disputes in the newspaper field in past years. Mr. Rookledge, how do you feel about the position taken by management in the current strike?

"CHET ROOKLEDGE. Before I get into the direct question of the strike, Keith, I feel it is important to point out that through the years past, by means of good faith collective bargaining, certain rights have accrued to the union worker. I have been a union worker at my trade of printer since 1916. I am proud of my craft. It is an old and established one. Our international membership is over 100,000. We were one of the six founders of the American Federation of Labor. As for myself I will be 63 years of age this coming January. My race is nearly run. But for the younger members of my union, and all other organized working people in this community of ours the struggle now going on between newspaper management on one hand and the union employees on the other has an ugly, disturbing undertone in the avowed intent of management to publish by the use of imported strikebreakers. The pattern to this person seems clear. Break one link of solidarity and you break all. Nonunionize a major industry in an economic area and soon it spreads throughout the web of all industry, soon very soon, you have lowered living standards and a breakdown of the civic health of the community follows. Witness the nonunion Southern States. The city of Portland has had its labor disputes, some short, some long. In my industry, newspaper publishing, this is the first time locally that avowed imported strikebreakers have been used by the management to continue their operations when faced with a labor dispute. We ask the question. Why? Is this the Portland that you and I know? The responsibility for a condition like this must be laid at the door of a complete breakdown in bargaining by management. This is not the Portland way. We all know the effects of a malignant growth upon human body. By surgery we cut it out. In the case of the newspaper strike, there has been imposed by management a malignant growth of nonunionism on the economic body of this area. How do we rectify and correct this malignancy? We cut this growth out by the economic reprisal of permanently stopping our subscriptions to these struck newspapers and by asking our friends and business associates not to advertise in this combined attempt at a metropolitan newspaper that is being published at the Oregonian plant by nonunion personnel. There are other good newspapers in the immediate area to which you can subscribe. They are all published by union craftsmen, under union contracts, arrived at in good faith bargaining, and include the Vancouver Columbian, the Oregon City Enterprise, the Oregon Labor Press, and Monroe Sweetland's weekly Milwaukie Review. My friends, this is the blueprint. By firm positive action on the part of the citizens of this area as individuals and collectively, this malignancy on the economic body of the area can be removed. I wish to point out that this TV program has provided a means to the Portland interunion strike committee to bring to you the honest and confirmed facts concerning the threats to the wives and children, as well as the workers, on strike at Portland's two daily newspapers. It is important to note in this connection that were imported strikebreakers being used in any other labor dispute in this area, other than by the newspapers themselves, these acts of intimidation and violence would be front-page news.

"Mr. BURNS. It would appear to me that the union representatives here this evening have answered my questions concerning the basic issues involved in the current strike situation fully and completely. I can only wonder if the management of Portland's two daily newspapers would have submitted to the same examination. Here now to summarize this evening's program and to present the union's blueprint for action is James T. Marr, executive secretary of the Oregon AFL–CIO.

"Mr. MARR. You have heard representatives of the Stereotypers' Union now on strike tell of their many concessions to management during the course of their negotiations. You have heard them state their feelings of utter frustration when after over 20 meetings with management each forward step taken by the union is blocked by new and in the end unreasonable demands made on the part of the newspapers. The final insult by management is the demand that the imported strikebreakers be given priority over the employees now on strike. Charles Dale, the international representative of the Newspaper Guild, has presented detailed and factual information concerning the use of strikebreakers on the part of the struck publications. These professional strikebreakers are alien to Oregon, both in terms of their regular residence and their philosophy. That the owners and management of Portland's two daily newspapers should resort to such tactics is not to be condoned by the public. The public unquestionably feels that the newspapers have a moral public responsibility just as they have to their own employees. Newspapers traditionally pride themselves on complete and factual reporting and independent editorial policy. It is by these means that they are known to be one of the foremost architects of public opinion. Let us hope and pray that it is not their desire to mold a public in their own image today.

"Why, we ask, when news concerns the newspapers, does it cease to be news. Why do we have to depend upon television, radio, and our own labor press to bring the facts concerning the strike to the people of Portland?

"We know that it has not only been since the strike that the Oregonian has drawn a paper curtain over its pressroom windows to hide out what goes on inside from public view. Is it possible that they feel that, by drawing a news curtain over their bargaining methods and their importation of strikebreakers, those issues which could be damaging to the newspapers in the eyes of the public will simply disappear.

"Certainly, as far as their coverage of the strike is concerned, it is safe to say that the joint-venture newspaper being published by nonunion employees is presenting the public with only half of the news.

"Nor can it be said that they have done any better editorially. Time and time again on these telecasts, the question of strike insurance being held by one or both publications has been raised. At no time to date has the hybrid newspaper in either of its editorial columns denied this fact. Could it be that this is an instance where silence is literally golden? Contrary to the position taken by the struck newspapers, the unions involved have taken you behind the scenes in the Portland newspaper strike. They have purchased this television program and three others in order to present the facts concerning the current status of negotiations. They have presented a member of the clergy, a past president of the Portland League of Women Voters, and a businessman on one of their programs to assess the public's point of view toward the strike. The unions have hired neither a private police force nor the likes of strikebreakers to maintain their position. They have only suggested, if you believe the position of the newspapers to be wrong, that you cancel your subscriptions. A blueprint for action on behalf of the public in support of their friends and neighbors who are on strike at the Journal and the Oregonian can only be drawn in the area of economic reprisal. It must be remembered that to buy the paper is to also buy the principles currently being sponsored by the paper. The nickels, dimes, and dollars spent on subscriptions go into the pockets of imported strikebreakers. By the same token, to advertise in the struck publication also provides aid and comfort to an enterprise that has brought in not only alien employees but alien ideas into the country."

AND THE TRUTH

In adjacent columns is the complete text of a television program, "A Blueprint for Action," broadcast over KGW–TV Friday night under sponsorship of a Portland interunion strike committee. It is not normal procedure for Portland newspapers to publish complete texts of TV programs, not even when the broadcasts are by persons as important as the President of the United States.

However, in view of the wide interest in the Portland newspaper strike, in view of the seriousness and the falsity of many of the charges contained in the broadcast, and in view of the fact that, after three such programs, the Portland's interunion strike committee has finally touched upon some of the issues, the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal make this exception.

What are the false ideas the strike committee is seeking to sell the public? Here they are, and here are the facts:

HOW ABOUT THE STRIKEBREAKERS

The broadcast repeatedly referred to imported strikebreakers, implying the Journal and the Oregonian are being printed by outside people of inferior moral or social status.

The truth is that the vast majority of those engaged in publishing the joint newspaper are Oregon citizens of long standing. All are good people, most of them married, a large percentage owning their own homes and paying Oregon taxes.

In connection with so-called strikebreakers, Charles Dale, an international representative of the Newspaper Guild, charged a high degree of planning for the strike by management prior to the time the strike actually began.

The truth is there was no such planning. Pickets appeared before the doors of the struck plants at 5 a.m. on November 10. It was not until 2 p.m. that afternoon that the first telephone call for outside assistance was made.

Dale further charged that they are being ably assisted by local residents who have been attracted to the papers by promises of high hourly rates, incentive bonuses, and so forth.

The truth is that local residents have been attracted in large numbers by the very high pay rates of those who abandoned their jobs and by nothing more—no incentive bonuses and no "and so forth." In one department alone, 100 percent of the employees who walked off their jobs have been replaced—and 100 percent by local residents. Many others are being hired in other departments to meet production requirements, most of them Oregon citizens.

Dale expressed outrage that the Portland papers "should stoop to the tactics now being practiced by the Oregonian and The Journal." He said it is, in his judgment, "deplorable."

What are these deplorable tactics? Simply the continuance of operation, a decision on the part of management to preserve its business and to continue to serve its readers, its advertisers, and the community as a whole. The alternative: shut down the plants. Thus the newspapers had two choices—operate, or cut off from employment 750 loyal employees and 400 loyal independent contractors who were eager to continue work. Is it really "deplorable" not to throw 1,150 loyal people out of work merely to improve the bargaining position of a group of about 50 other workers?

Such a shutdown occurred when another local of this same Stereotypers Union struck the San Jose newspaper earlier this year. It was shut down for more than 100 days—and scores of employees were thrown out of work. The Portland papers chose to operate.

HOW ABOUT UNION CONCESSIONS?

Repeatedly throughout the program, union spokesmen talked about "concessions" the stereotypers made to management. But what were the concessions? They weren't spelled out. Why? Because the fact is there were no concessions. None. Here are some of the issues where concessions might have been made but were not:

Foreman: Ted Cotner of the stereotypers' negotiating committee said: "We ask simply that the matter of whether or not a foreman be a member of the union be left entirely up to the individual foreman"

This is a bald untruth. The publisher's original proposal provided—and still provides—that the matter of the foreman becoming or not becoming a member of the union be left to the decision of the foreman. The real issue is the union's insistence—illegally—that the foreman be compelled to join the union.

Substitution: The union considers it unholy that "an employee must go to his foreman and his right to time off will be determined completely on the say-so of the foreman."

The truth is there is no inherent right to take time off at will. Stereotypers talk about replacing themselves whenever they want time off by straight time workers, but what they fail to add is that this reduces the labor pool so that labor shifts must be filled by time and a half workers. During the deer season—a time of greatest need because of pre-Christmas work volume—men have laid of in droves, forcing the newspapers to pay for their hunting pleasures at time and a half.

The MAN machine: When the strike started, the stereotypers were saying it took four men to man this machine. In the broadcast, they said it takes X number of men, the X to be determined jointly.

Obviously, this would leave the union with the veto power still to insist upon four men when the time comes for the machine to be operated. Actually, the machine was designed to be operated by only one man. Management's choice: retain the power of determining the number of men or turn that power over to the union in the form of a veto.

WHAT'S THIS ABOUT A LOCKOUT?

There has been much talk on the part of the printers and mailers, both members of the International Typographical Union, of their having been locked out.

This is the most utter nonsense to evolve out of the whole strike situation. The truth is that both printers and the mailers, as well as all other unions (many of whom have violated their word and their contracts) were invited to continue working and, indeed, were directed by their supervisors to do so. The mailers had a valid, existing contract, but refused to honor it and continue to work. Is this a lockout?

Consider, too, this inconsistency. In Portland, the printers and mailers charge they have been locked out because they refuse, of their own volition, to cross a picket line. At the same time, in New York City, another local of this same mailers union has pressed to arbitration a demand that New York newspapers pay mailers wages during the strike prior to last Christmas. Why? Because the paper did not publish. The New York mailers' claim is that the newspapers failed to live up to their contract because they did not operate during the strike; although they—the mailers—were ready then to cross the picket line to work.

MUCH ADO ABOUT STRIKE INSURANCE

James T. Marr, executive secretary of the Oregon AFL–CIO, again brought up "the question of strike insurance being held by one or both publication."

What is this evil thing called strike insurance? Well, the unions certainly should know. Their strike insurance, called defense funds, runs into millions of dollars. These millions, collected on a national basis from as many as 100,000 members or more—as in the case of the printers, for instance—can be focused with tremendous economic force upon the papers in a single community.

In the small city of Pasco, Wash., for example, the International Typographical Union poured in more than $1,178,000 to underwrite the losses of the Columbia Basin News, a paper born as a daily after the strike began, to enter into competition with the struck paper. This was in addition to untold thousands of dollars paid in strike benefits for 9 years, all in an economic war against the Tri-City Herald, which the union had struck.

SOME MISCELLANEOUS UNION LOOSE TALK

Perry Badgley: "To me the most damning proposal to come out of the negotiations are the demand of management was [sic] that they want us to take into our union the imported strikebreakers who are now operating the machines that our members, many of whom are longtime residents of Portland, operated before the strike. Management now asks that these imported strikebreakers be given priority of employment over those regular employees who were forced out on strike by what we believe to be unreasonable demands of management."

The facts: There has been no proposal by management that the union take into its membership anyone it has employed since the beginning of the strike. The people who have been employed have been employed permanently to replace the individuals on strike or individuals who abandoned their jobs. The truth is that management has insisted that no one employed since the strike began shall be forced to join any union.

AND SOME MORE MISCELLANY

James T. Marr referred in the TV program to a "paper curtain" drawn over the "Oregonian's pressroom windows to hide out what goes on inside from public view."

These are, in fact, not paper curtains, but sturdy plywood shields to protect the pressrooms from possible sabotage of the kind that has occurred elsewhere in newspaper strikes.

Charles Dale brazenly confessed that guild members walked off their jobs by official union vote, breaching a contract which would have been in effect until June of 1960. His exact words: "The decision came despite the fact that the guild has a contract in existence with both dailies, a contract that will not expire until next June."

James T. Marr again: "The unions have hired neither a private police force or the likes of strikebreakers to maintain their position."

The facts: The only instance of violence to occur since the beginning of the strike was a physical attack by three union members upon a loyal Journal worker. Two of these union members were found guilty in court and were subjected to fines. The third still is being sought under a John Doe warrant.

[From the Oregonian-Journal, Jan. 8, 1960]

PAPERS RAP ULTIMATUM OF STRIKERS

High officials of international newspaper unions Thursday, at conclusion of summit meetings in Portland, issued a statement in which they charged that "the publishers have chosen" to make the Portland newspaper strike "an all-out-fight" and said: "We must meet this challenge."

Publishers of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal replied that the union statement "is a fair sample of negotiation by ultimatum." They asserted that "until there is a sincere desire by the union to negotiate—not dictate—a settlement" there will be no progress toward peace in the strike.

The complete text of the statements follows:

THE UNIONS

"We are united on a negotiating program with the publishers of Portland's strike-bound newspapers. The decision for common action by all newspaper unions was forced upon us by the blatant union-busting techniques employed by the publishers.

"The international unions cannot afford and do not intend to permit their local unions to be destroyed by a giant newspaper chain and its Portland satellite. The labor movement of Portland and the entire State of Oregon cannot afford to permit this return to labor's dark ages.

"Since the strike began on November 10, management has consistently raised its demands on the unions instead of seeking a peaceful and honorable solution at the bargaining table or through mediation efforts of Governor Hatfield or a factfinding committee. Chief of these new and outrageous demands is a management proposal that the stereotypers take a 12½-percent hourly pay cut despite the constantly increasing cost of living.

"The publishers have chosen to make this an all-out fight. We must meet their challenge. We pledge the utmost support of the international unions to assure that this union-busting venture by the publishers is not successful.

"Contracts of all of the mechanical craft unions have now expired. We reaffirm our decision that no union will return to work at the two newspapers until settlements are reached will all of the unions with expired contracts. Striking employees will return to work without fear of reprisal or discrimination. The unions agree that all contracts must have a common expiration date. All contracts must contain a clause allowing all unions to respect picket lines at the newspaper plants.

"The publishers are publicly tied in a common front against unions, and have consistently rejected all union offers to negotiate separate contracts with the Oregon Journal and the Oregonian. This stone wall of publisher opposition has today created the most significant and far-reaching team effort by international newspaper unions in the history of the American newspaper industry."

THE PUBLISHERS

"New roadblocks to peaceful settlement of Portland's newspaper strike have been raised by the statement of the united union committee. It has reaffirmed and now made common cause of a series of demands presented by the Stereotypers Union at the first bargaining session that followed the strike.

"It is a fair sample of negotiation by ultimatum which has marked the sorry course of the union's procedures through 18 bargaining sessions that preceded the strike and the 7 that have followed it.

"The adamant attitude revealed by the unions places on the public record absolute proof of the conspiracy that existed among the unions and the Guild. This conspiracy impaired negotiations, brought rejection of the publishers' offer to arbitrate unresolved issues and now bars the solution of strike problems.

"Among the demands that carry the odor of conspiracy are:

"That settlements must be reached with all unions as a prior condition of the return to work by any union.

"That all contracts must have a common expiration date.

"That all contracts contain a clause allowing any union to respect the picket line of another union.

"Settlement with all 15 unions at once presents an almost unsurmountable barrier. That should be amply evident. Problems vary widely from craft to craft. The demand for a common expiration date is a tacit admission that the then existing contracts did not permit members of these crafts to walk out at will. It substantiates the publishers' position that this action was in violation of moral and legal obligations under those contracts.

"The demand for a clause to legalize the respecting of another union's picket line likewise demonstrates that no such authority existed under old contracts. It validates the publishers' claim that such action was in violation of moral and legal obligations under the contracts.

"The fact that they are now demanding these provisions demonstrates conclusively a belated recognition of the impropriety of their previous action.

"Inference that the publishers' had attempted to reduce the take-home pay of stereotypers by demands since the strike is deceitful. The companies had stated merely that the 40-hour week, common to all industry, would be appropriate in the post strike period. The weekly wage would remain exactly the same.

"Other accusations are the usual abusive attacks to which the public has become accustomed. They have no validity, even to the charge that the newspapers had refused to negotiate separately. Joint negotiation has been the historic procedure, approved for more than 50 years both by unions and newspapers. All negotiations have been handled by representatives of both the Oregonian and Oregon Journal—and will continue to be.

"Until there is a sincere desire by the unions to negotiate—not dictate—a settlement, no progress will be made in bringing peace to the newspaper strike front in this city."

RETURNING NEWSPAPER WORKERS REPLY TO CHARGES OF "DEFIANCE" BY GUILD

Eighteen members of the Portland Newspaper Guild who have returned to work on the Oregonian-Oregon Journal Thursday signed the letter answering charges made by the guild and demanding their expulsion.

Signers of the reply included Jessie B. Williams, Harold Hughes, Rolla J. Crick, Gerry Pratt, W. L. Hunter, Les T. Ordeman, David Falconer, Ruth Needoba, Arnold Marks, Lawrence Barber, Watford Reed, Beth Fagan, Max Wauchope, Phyllis Lauritz, Florence H. Harris, Herb Alden, Jack Ostergren, and Walter Hilbruner.

STATEMENT MADE

Their reply follows:

"PORTLAND NEWSPAPER GUILD
TRIAL BOARD.

"The undersigned wish to reply to charges raised by individuals of the Portland Newspaper Guild. Members of the group which received identical letters feel that a single reply is proper, even though their decisions to return to work were individual rather than a collective action. This reply does not mean that certain signers may not appear to present additional argument on the merits of their own cases, although this letter for a majority of the accused guildsmen will stand in lieu of any personal testimony before the trial board.

"This consensus was obtained from the undersigned:

"1. The Guild, in voting to observe the stereotypers' picket lines and by subsequent actions in supporting the strike when the Guild had no dispute with management, violated its contract and put in jeopardy gains made in that contract over the past 20 years. Guildsmen who returned to work felt they could not in good faith continue a dishonest action even though it was led by the Guild's officers and supported by a majority of the membership.

"The Guild's officers must recall that during negotiations in recent years the Guild has sought to have included in the contract a clause giving the Portland unit the right to refrain from crossing a picket line. Such a clause has been denied by management and does not now appear in the contract.

"The numerous and insistent demands by various Guild negotiating teams that such a clause be placed in the contract is proof that the negotiators of the contract did not feel the Guild had a right to observe picket lines during the life of the contract.

"2. The Federal law clearly states that union members have a right to assist or refrain from assisting any union: That it is an unfair labor practice for a union to coerce or restrain union members from these rights which are paramount to any phrases in the guild constitution or bylaws. Thus, coercing members with these charges is an unfair labor practice.

"We refer the Guild trial board to section 8(b)(1) of the amended (1959) version of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, commonly called the Taft-Hartley law and the Landrum-Griffin Act. This section makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of rights guaranteed in section 7, which is entitled 'Rights of Employees.' This section which was in the old Taft-Hartley law and is repeated in the Landrum-Griffin Act says employees 'shall have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8(a)(3).'

"As you know, the Guild has a maintenance of membership dues agreement, it has no requirement forcing an employee to join a union, and it cannot, without engaging in unfair labor practices, cause discrimination against an employee except for failure to tender periodic dues.

"3. It is obvious the phrase 'working for or in a shop which is on strike' does not define 'strike,' and that the phrase is meaningless, since past practices of the Guild have found its members working inside scores of plants where one or more crafts are on strike. If this phrase has any legal standing at all (what about contracts with nonstrike clauses?) it must refer to actions in which the Guild itself is on strike.

"During the 1949 strike of Portland web pressmen, various Guildsmen worked inside picket lines, even when the papers were not publishing and virtually no jobs were available at the newspapers.

"In the Portland situation, we have one craft demanding its members take individual actions vis-a-vis the stereotyper strike and another craft (Guild) demanding its members take action as a unit. Both these demands are legalistic efforts to thwart contracts signed in good faith. These tactics are expedient devices to lend legal color to a shameful action against a management with which the Guild had no dispute. They are the methods of an international bent on finding a way, a loophole, to impose its will on the local unit which bargained in good faith. These methods resulted in the Guild losing its local autonomy when its membership was told by an international vice president that its charter would be lifted if the members voted to return to work.

"4. The charge of failing to follow the vote of a majority of the Guild is prima facie spurious in light of the previously cited Federal law which has been upheld in court tests. We need not lecture good Guildsmen about the rights of individuals in a democratic society, rights protected by the law and the courts.

"The Guild is not a court, nor is it a legislative body. It is ironical that in seeking to impose fines, penalties, public reprimands or admonishments upon members attempting to live up to a contract, the Guild is proposing actions it would consider disgraceful if proposed by an employer of either of the two newspapers."

The Guild's notification of action proposed to be taken against the members who returned to work follows:

"DECEMBER 29, 1959.

"We, the undersigned, hereby accuse (name of member) of failing to honor a majority decision of his fellow members of the Portland Newspaper Guild in having crossed a picket line established by Stereotypers Local 48, and further charge him with 'working for or in a shop which is on strike' in defiance of article XII, section I, subsection E of the constitution of the American Newspaper Guild. We seek relief from further association with this member and ask for his dishonorable expulsion from the American Newspaper Guild and all of its affiliates, including the Portland Newspaper Guild, as provided in the 'procedures and trials' section of the article XII of the constitution of the American Newspaper Guild.

"TED WAGONER.
"WAYNE A. SCOTT.

"Under the provisions of article XII, ANG constitution, you have 10 days in which to file an answer with two copies to the above charges with the secretary-treasurer. You will then be given 10 days notice of a hearing before the trial panel of the Portland Newspaper Guild conducted under provisions of the ANG constitution.

"J. LYNN WYKOFF,
"Secretary-Treasurer."

[From the Oregon Journal, Jan. 11, 1960]

NEW TRY MADE TO DRAW GOVERNOR INTO WALKOUT

The president of the Stereotypers' Union renewed a suggestion Monday that the managements of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal accept mediation of factfinding of Gov. Mark O. Hatfield or Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER in the strike which was called against the two papers November 10.

Publishers of the Oregonian and Journal said they found nothing new in the proposal and commented it appeared to be "an effort to project this dispute into the political arena."

Harley V. Flesvig, stereotyper president, made the suggestion following settlement of the steel strike with the aid of Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON and the Secretary of Labor.

Gov. Hatfield said:

"I have given no special consideration to it (the Portland newspaper strike) in the light of today's development. But I have been thinking about it right along. I am still hopeful we can get them together on a factfinding commission. That is the approach I would like to make and I am working toward that end."

The statements:

Harley V. Flesvig, stereoptyper president, said:

"The steel strike was settled today after both management and labor accepted voluntarily the terms of an agreement offered by Labor Secretary James Mitchell and Vice President RICHARD M. NIXON.

"In the 8-week-old newspaper strike, Governor Hatfield some time ago offered to help negotiate the dispute. Our union immediately accepted this proposal. The newspaper management rejected it.

"Shortly after that, Senator NEUBERGER suggested that Governor Hatfield appoint a factfinding committee to aid on clarifying the issues. Again our union readily agreed to this proposal. Management flatly turned it down.

"If the assistance of outside, impartial persons brought an end to the 8-month-old steel strike, why couldn't such help do the same in this situation?

"We sincerely hope that newspaper management will reconsider its earlier rejections of the proposals."

The publishers said:

"1. There is no reason to believe either the Governor, through mediation, or a factfinding committee could be any more effective in jarring the union loose from its untenable positions than has the Federal Mediation Service.

"2. The stereotypers have already elected to place factfinding in the hands of the National Labor Relations Board by filing unfair labor practice charges against the newspapers.

"3. The steel strike and the newspaper strike are vastly different. A steel shutdown affected virtually the entire national economy. By contrast, we are not shut down. We are publishing. Our readers, our advertisers and the interests of the Commonwealth are being served. Any adverse economic consequences have been largely obviated.

"4. The proposal appears, as before, an effort to project this dispute into the political arena. We do not believe that political intervention, at union behest, is indicated, nor do we believe it would be helpful."

THAT OUR READERS MAY KNOW—IS CONTRACT WITH UNION "WORTH DAMN"?—THE SANCTITY OF CONTRACTS—PART 2

The typographical unions built their strength, through the years, on the faithful observance of contracts. The unions would battle for wages and conditions but, once a contract was signed by a local and "underwritten" by the international, it was observed—and no monkey business.

Many a local has been ordered back to work by the international when it broke its contract. Sometimes the international sent in crews when outlaw locals refused to honor their word. And, historically, all crafts have crossed the picket lines of other crafts to carry out their contracts.

What has happened to the men of honor in these unions? In this dispute, by contrast with the past, we find international officers inciting locals to dishonor their contracts.

The other day a "summit" conference released an astonishing statement to the effect that union contracts had now ended, all but the Guild's. They were now free to take joint action as they desired. Further, they were going to demand a contract clause permitting them to observe picket lines of each other. This was an admission, on the face of it, that they had been violating their contracts for 7 weeks or so.

Is this just the position of "unenlightened employers?"

Suppose we quote from the "laws" of the International Typographical Union, largest of the craft unions. The laws are supposed to govern all members, including the mailers, a subordinate union which had a valid contract at the time of the strike. We quote from article VII, page 32:

"Subordinate unions of the International Typographical Union have a long and honorable history of compliance and fulfillment of all contract commitments. It is required that where contract commitments have been made such commitments are paramount and must be honored by the local unions parties thereto, as a matter of union policy only, subject to the limitations stated in the approval clause of such agreements without any assumption of liability thereunder by the International Typographical Union. This obligations cannot be considered to be mitigated or absolved because of picket lines established without authority provided in the local contract."

Leaders of other crafts have stood honorably, in the past, for observance of contracts. As late as September 1956, Frank R. Adams, first vice president of the International Stereotypers Union, told the union convention in Seattle:

No local had a right to disregard a contract in order to honor the picket line of another union.

Such action would be a contract violation and subject the union to suit.

No strike or "lockout" benefits would be paid by the international.

"A labor contract, which has been approved by the local and duly signed by its elected representatives and authorized representatives of a company, is just as sacred and binding as any other contract. It has been negotiated for the mutual protection of both parties."

This was no employer speaking. This was a labor leader, a vice president of the Stereotypers Union, the very same union that incited other locals to violate contracts with the Oregonian and Journal.

Recently a labor lawyer told a Portland businessman, who had contracts with a group of unions, that his agreements were worthless.

"Everyone knows," he said, cynically, "that contracts are binding on corporations. So far as the unions are concerned, they are not worth a damn."

It is the view of the publishers that a contract binding on management alone is no contract. Here is a central issue in this strike—the honorable observance of contracts. Let union apologists come down off their absurd propaganda fantasies and answer the simple question:

"Is the contract with a union worth a damn?"

Mr. MORSE. Next, Mr. President, in fairness, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, representative newspaper articles and editorials which set forth the position of the employees who are involved in the Portland newspaper dispute.

There being no objection, the editorials and articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oregon Labor Press, Nov. 20, 1959]

STRIKEBREAKERS IMPORTED—OREGONIAN LION SAYS HE WON'T EAT THE LAMB

The strike of the Stereotypers' Union against Portland's two daily newspapers quickened in tempo this week with these major developments:

1. A charge by Edward J. Whelan, executive secretary of the Multnomah County Labor Council, that the strike was deliberately incited by the management of the Oregonian as part of a plot to give Samuel Newhouse, wealthy New York publisher, complete control of public communications in Portland.

2. A demand by Whelan for a congressional investigation of this potential newspaper monopoly.

3. An unprecedented importation into Portland of strikebreakers from the anti-union Deep South and other sections of the country to enable Newhouse and the Journal to publish a combined paper in the Oregonian building.

4. A stepping up of picket line activity with members of the Typographical and Mailers' Unions joining the Stereotypers in picketing the two newspaper plants.

5. A request by Whelan for an investigation of the strikebreaker situation by the State legislature's interim committee on labor-management relations.

6. The refusal of the Engravers' Union to cross the picket line, thus providing a solid front of all of Portland's newspaper unions in support of the Stereotypers.

Whelan's charges that the strike was deliberately incited by the Oregonian management were made in an address to the labor council Monday night.

Whelan's statement was called false and libelous by the publishers of the two newspapers, who attempted to stop the Oregon Labor Press from publishing the Whelan charges.

Whelan said:

"The Stereotypers and other newspaper unions were deliberately pushed into this strike to help the Oregonian carry out a plot to take over the Oregon Journal."

Whelan pointed out that Newhouse—who has a long record of anti-union activity—is the sole owner of the Oregonian, half-owner of KOIN-TV in Portland and head man of a nationwide empire of newspapers and TV stations.

"Newhouse would like to buy the Journal, print both newspapers in one building, and set up a complete newspaper monopoly in Oregon's largest city," Whelan continued.

"A newspaper monopoly in Portland would give the absentee owner Newhouse and his hand-picked local managers complete political domination of the State of Oregon—for the Oregonian and the Journal are the only two newspapers with statewide circulation."

Whelan said the matter of newspaper monopoly is "so serious that I am demanding a congressional investigation, and am sending copies of these remarks to the members of Oregon's delegation in Congress."

Whelan quoted a Journal executive as saying after the strike started:

"This strike situation means the windup of the Journal and the windup of me. The Oregonian is going to take us over when this strike is done."

Whelan also said that the Oregonian carries strike insurance, but the Journal does not, and the Oregonian has been making "substantial profits, but the Journal has recently been in financial difficulties."

As far as the differences between the unions and the newspapers are concerned, they "could be settled in half an hour—just as they were peacefully settled in Seattle and Tacoma a few days ago," Whelan declared. "But the Oregonian doesn't want to settle—not until it gets its hands on the Journal and transforms Portland into a monopoly newspaper town.

"Oregonians had better wake up. The hours of honest competition among newspapers may be fast running out."

In an effort to stop the Oregon Labor Press from publishing Whelan's statement, the publishers of the Oregonian and Oregon Journal telephoned Labor Press Editor Jim Goodsell at 12:45 p.m., Tuesday.

Oregonian publisher M. J. Frey and Journal publisher William W. Knight said they were calling from Frey's office in the Oregonian Building. They warned that the Labor Press would face possible libel action if it published Whelan's charges.

Frey said: "Whelan's statement is libelous, malicious, and entirely false. We absolutely deny it. It is a false statement."

Knight said: "The statement is false, malicious, libelous, and without any basis of fact."

Goodsell commented: "The lion and the lamb have now denied that the lamb will be eaten."

Publisher Frey is an employee of the Oregonian's absentee owner, Samuel I. Newhouse, of New York.

Publisher Knight is one of three trustees of the Jackson estate, any two of whom could sell the Journal. The other trustees are David L. Davies, Portland attorney, and the U.S. National Bank.

Ted Cotner, chairman of the stereotypers' negotiating committee, also warned the labor council of the vicious situation that would result if Portland were to become a one-newspaper town.

"You would have one-sided news coverage and advertising rates would go up," Cotner said.

The Stereotyper spokesman said his union feels "this is a planned strike, formulated over a year ago to make this a one-newspaper town."

"Time and again," he said, "we offered to negotiate separately with the Journal because we feel the need for a hometown paper. But we were turned down flatly on that."

Speaking for the Typographical Union, Chet Rooklidge told the labor council of the frustrating, futile efforts his union had made since September 15 in trying to reach an agreement on terms of a new contract with the Journal and the Oregonian.

He said the management representatives at the bargaining table wanted to "talk about everything from pressmen, stereotypers, mailers, and Mrs. Fogarty's cat—but we couldn't pin a tail on the cat."

"It's hard to negotiate a contract when, by the admission of the people on the other side, their counterproposal is written 5 or 6 months before you ever sit down to negotiate."

The decision of the engravers to respect the stereotypers' picket line brings to 10 the number of unions whose members are supporting the strike. They are the Typographical, Web Pressmen, Mailers, Photoengravers, Newspaper Guild (reporters, photographers, some editors, artists, and some circulation office employees), Electrical Workers, Machinists, Teamsters, Building Service Employees, and Operating Engineers.

An estimated 750 union employees of both newspapers are out of work as a result of the strike, with their jobs being taken over by scabs, many of them from as far away as Florida.

Meanwhile, Federal Mediator Elmer Williams continued efforts to try to settle the strike. In a Tuesday session conducted by Williams, the publishers made a counterproposal which Cotner said indicated they "apparently are trying to widen the breach in this dispute rather than trying to bring us closer together and reach a peaceful settlement."

The counterproposal made by management would have required the Stereotypers to work 5 hours longer a week at no raise in wages. They also wanted a no-strike clause in the contract and an agreement by the union to pay for any financial damages to the companies if the union violated this clause.

The publishers also asked for elimination of union security, an issue which Cotner said was agreed to between the parties before the strike.

STRIKEBREAKERS

The use of imported professional strikebreakers—one of them armed with rifles and shotguns—spurred mounting indignation of Portlanders this week against the tactics of the Oregonian and the Journal in their efforts to break the strike of the Stereotypers' Union.

For the first time in Portland's newspaper history, the two dailies are bringing in nonunion workers from other States—some from as far away as Florida—to publish a combined scab paper in the Oregonian Building.

The situation brought a request from State Representative Edward J. Whelan, who is secretary of the Multnomah County Labor Council, for a special investigation by the legislature's interim committee on labor-management relations.

It also prompted a prediction by a Republican legislator that the next legislative session will consider seriously making such activity by employers illegal.

"This is the kind of thing you might expect in the Deep South, which is notoriously anti-union, but it's not what we expect to see happen here in Oregon," he said.

And the Stereotypers' Union, through its attorney, Don Richardson, has asked the U.S. district attorney to examine the possibility that a Federal law may have been violated by bringing in strikebreakers from other States.

Whelan, in his telegram to Senator Harry Boivin, chairman of the legislative interim committee on labor-management relations, asserted that the importation of strikebreakers is having a detrimental effect on efforts to obtain a speedy settlement of the strike.

"There is a gap in Oregon labor law with respect to the detrimental effect the importation of strikebreakers has on a labor dispute," said Whelan.

"Calling the committee into session to examine the role of strikebreakers in the Portland newspaper strike would give committee members a first-hand view of the situation. It would be of immeasurable help in implementing Oregon law at the next legislature to prohibit the importation of strikebreakers in future labor disputes in the State."

Whelan urged Senator Boivin to "call the committee into session in Portland as soon as possible."

The incident of the armed strikebreaker was reported by Portland police. The scab, imported to work at the Oregonian during the strike, was spotted by police checking into a downtown hotel with several rifles and shotguns.

The publishers of the combined Oregonian-Journal admitted in a published statement that the man's actions were "potentially provocative" in view of the strike and added that "he was no longer employed."

The stereotypers said that the imported scabs manning the presses and setting type for the Oregonian-Journal had been flown into Portland from Iowa, Texas, Louisiana, Florida, and Nevada. They are paid a minimum of $200 a week plus expenses.

"This is the way Portland publishers seek to break a strike of local employees who have lived in the city for many years," said the stereotypers in a printed bulletin.

"The tactic is seen as a turn-back-the-clock move to the dark ages of labor-management history—a chapter foreign to Portland labor relations," the bulletin added.

"FEATHERBEDDING" IS NOT NEWSPAPER STRIKE ISSUE

Can the truth ever catch up with false propaganda?

That is the burning question in the Portland newspaper strike.

The public has been convinced that "featherbedding" is the key issue in the strike.

They have been told by the publishers that one small union—the Stereotypers—is fighting against labor-saving machinery and insisting on unreasonable "make work" rules.

This stubborn stand, the publishers claim, is the reason why the stereotypers have gone out on strike and why 750 other newspaper union men and women have left their jobs in sympathy.

Don't you believe it.

The fact is that this strike was deliberately provoked by the Oregonian—not by the union—and "featherbedding" is an issue trumped up by management.

Read these facts and judge for yourself:

1. In 18 negotiating sessions, the stereotypers offered one compromise after another. The newspapers flatly turned them down.

2. The publishers refused to discuss wages, hours or any other basic issue. First, they insisted the union must agree in advance on all details of operating an unknown, unseen, unordered, untried, untested, German-made machine which the Oregonian said it plans to buy.

The German-made machine is new and completely unknown. It is not in use on any newspaper in North America.

It is dangerous because it operates with molten metal, under high pressure, at temperatures over 600 degrees.

The Oregonian has not ordered or bought the machine; the newspaper merely says it intends to buy one. The Journal has no interest in the machine at all.

More than a year will go by before the machine can possibly be delivered.

Yet the publishers refused to bargain on any other issue unless the Stereotypers Union would agree (sight unseen) to one-man operation of the machine—when and if it is delivered.

This was an ultimatum that no union could possibly accept—and the publishers knew it.

3. The stereotypers tried desperately to compromise, and to continue the process of collective bargaining. They did not want to strike.

They offered to reopen their contract when the German machine is delivered, and to decide then with the Oregonian how many men can safely operate the machine. The publishers refused.

The union offered two other compromises, both of them fair and reasonable. Again the publishers refused.

4. The Oregonian and Journal demanded that working foremen be removed from union membership. These foreman don't sit at a desk and give orders. They work side by side with the other stereotypers. They now belong to the union; they have always belonged to the union, and they want to belong to the union.

5. The publishers demanded that the stereotypers work 2½ hours longer each week for the same pay.

6. The publishers were just as stubborn and unreasonable in 13 negotiating sessions with another union, the Typographical Union, whose contract expired September 15.

"They were deliberately stalling and goading us with their demands," a Typographical delegate told the County Labor Council this week.

"We are sure that the Typographical Union would have been forced to strike if the stereotypers had not gone out first," he declared, "and nobody has claimed that the Typos were making any so-called featherbedding demands."

"Featherbedding" is a red herring in the newspaper strike. Three very significant facts will tell you the real reason for the strike:

The Oregonian carries strike insurance. The Journal does not.

The Oregonian raised the strike-provoking issue of the German machine. The Journal has no interest in the machine.

The Oregonian has been making big profits. The Journal has been in financial difficulties.

We believe that the Oregonian and its absentee owner, Samuel Newhouse of New York, have two purposes in this strike: To break the unions and to break the Journal.

That would give Newhouse and his imported strikebreakers a complete monopoly in the city of Portland, Oreg.

TO BREAK NEWSPAPER STRIKES: ARMED STRIKEBREAKERS IMPORTED

Men armed with rifles and shotguns walked into a downtown Portland hotel Sunday morning and registered as "guests."

Who are these men? They are professional strikebreakers. Others without arms have been flown to Portland in the past week from Iowa, Texas, Louisiana, Florida and Nevada.

The hybrid The Oregonian and Oregon Journal said Monday:

"Management, supervisory and other available personnel" are putting out the newspaper.

"Other available personnel" are professional strikebreakers. They are paid a minimum of $200 weekly plus all expenses.

This is the way Portland publishers seek to break a legitimate strike of local employees who have lived in the city for many years. These strikers for years have patronized local firms and contributed to United Good Neighbors and other community charities and activities.

Strikebreakers don't spend their money in Portland. They take it to Iowa, Florida, Texas, Louisiana, and Nevada.

Some Portland firms are canceling their advertising during the strike. They are using direct mail, radio, and television. They are doing this in protest to the tactics of the newspaper industry.

Monday 360 members of the locked-out Printers' and Mailers' Unions joined the stereotypers' picket line to demonstrate their faith in the stereotypers' cause and their indignation at the cold-blooded tactics of their former bosses and "friends."

The importing of strikebreakers who live in luxury hotels and receive in pay and expenses more than twice the income of union workers is being subsidized in part by doubled advertising rates and doubled paper prices. The tactic is seen as a turn-back-the-clock move to the dark ages of labor-management history—a chapter foreign to Portland labor relations. Peace has prevailed in the news industry of Portland—no strikes—for the past 10 years. And never before have professional strikebreakers been used in the City of Roses.

The strikebreakers in their hotel lobbies openly boast of year-round employment in the art of breaking strikes, an art in which all earnings are cream because all living expenses are paid and are also deducted as a business expense. This makes Uncle Sam an unwitting partner.

The Oregonian-Oregon Journal boasts of press runs of 500,000 copies. But this is not paid circulation. Many copies are being scattered away as thousands of union families in Oregon and southwest Washington cancel their subscriptions. This throwaway distribution in some cases is littering lawns and causing economic hardship to carrier boys.

The men from out of State who walked into a downtown hotel carried four guns—two .22 rifles, a Savage shotgun, and a home-remodeled 410 shotgun. They were sealed in the hotel safe and reported to the police. The men said they came to Portland to work for the Oregonian.

Meantime unions instructed their pickets to patrol peacefully in the American tradition of fair play.

Union investigators are convinced the callous tactics of the two newspapers are being directed personally by S. I. Newhouse, absentee owner of the Oregonian. He is a man who has spent perhaps no more than a day or two in Portland since buying the newspaper on the telephone 9 years ago.

The use of strikebreakers has so shamed the local publishers that the sea-green windows designed by Pierto Belluschi in the Oregonian pressroom have been boarded up so that the public cannot see what is going on.

[From the Guild Reporter, Washington, D.C., Nov. 27, 1959]

ARMED SCAB CREW HITS COAST NEWSPAPER STRIKE

PORTLAND, OREG.—A stream of professional strikebreakers from other States, imported by the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal, has helped swing public opinion behind striking stereotypers at the two papers.

The quick appearance of the scabs, some of them bearing arms, also backed up the union's contention that the strike was deliberately provoked by management as a union-busting effort.

Representatives of the two papers later told a Guild committee that henceforth they planned to operate as open shops in all departments.

The Stereotypers Union struck at 5 a.m., Tuesday, November 5, after 18 fruitless negotiating sessions. Guild members, printers, mailers, pressmen, and other crafts refused to cross the picket lines placed around the two newspaper plants. In the confusion of the first week, photoengravers continued to work, except for 1 day, until Saturday, when they joined officially in support of the strike.

Printers and mailers, members of the International Typographical Union, joined the picket line on the grounds that they were locked out when they found scabs had taken over their positions on the first morning of the strike.

They said they found the doors locked and guarded.

On the eve of the walkout, the Portland Guild voted 68 to 30 not to cross the stereotypers' picket lines. Only a few circulation clerks among the 165 members of the local failed to abide by the decision.

With the help of scabs, nonunion personnel, and supervisors, managements of the two papers have combined to issue a hybrid daily under the flags of both the Oregonian and the Journal, hitherto supposedly fierce competitors. The paper is being published from the plant of the Oregonian, owned by S. I. Newhouse.

The move led the Multnomah County (Portland) Central Labor Council to call for a congressional inquiry into report that Newhouse and his Oregonian are maneuvering to take over the Journal.

It was the Oregonian's bargaining tactics that brought on the strike. The Newhouse interests insisted that the stereotypers agree in advance that only one man would be required to operate a new platecasting machine of German origin. The Oregonian management said it intends to acquire one of the machines, not yet in use in this country.

Wages never were discussed in negotiations after management stalled bargaining and refused to budge on the manning issue. By the time Federal mediators entered the talks, the papers also were insisting, among other things, on the removal of foremen from contract coverage, an increase in the workweek from 35 hours to 40 hours, and a no-strike clause for the duration of any contract.

In their propaganda campaign among readers, the two papers have pictured the stereotypers as a featherbedding union which demands the use of four men to operate a one-man machine.

The union, however, has offered to bypass the manning issue and proceed to other questions, with the contract to be reopenable on manning when and if the German machine is ever purchased.

Another investigation, by a State legislative subcommittee on labor-management relations, has been demanded by Ed Whelan, executive secretary of the Central Labor Council. Whelan, a member of the legislature himself, has urged the subcommittee to gather material to strengthen Oregon laws pertaining to the importation of out-of-State strikebreakers.

The unions also have asked the U.S. district attorney here to investigate the interstate traffic of armed strikebreakers to determine if there have been violations of Federal regulations.

The arms of two of the scabs—two rifles, a shotgun, and a sawed-off shotgun—were confiscated by police, who were alerted by a desk clerk when the men attempted to check into a hotel with the guns. They had come here from Reno.

The Oregonian management at first denied it had brought the men to Portland, but later changed the denial to a statement that the two men were "no longer employed." The pair hurriedly left town, but dozens of others have remained, drawing a minimum of $200 a week and expenses at Portland hotels. Some of them have been sleeping in the Oregonian building.

It was learned, too, that the papers had been training advertising and business office personnel in advance of the strike to operate mechanical equipment.

Strike strategy is in the hands of a steering committee representing all unions. ANG International Representative Charles Dale, who has been here to aid the local guild since the first morning of the strike, has been named chairman of the coordinating body. Staff representatives of all other affected unions also are on hand. ANG Executive Vice President William J. Farson flew here last weekend to confer with local Guild leaders and officials of other unions and to attend a membership meeting.

The Portland Guild, which represents 96 percent of reporters, desk editors, and photographers in the newsroom of both dailies, has set up headquarters for the duration of the strike in a vacant store on Broadway in downstown Portland. Committees have been organized to seek temporary employment for Guild members and their families, to administer strike benefits, to aid families with financial difficulties, and to help the strike steering committee.

Guild members have been particularly active in publicity work in behalf of the unions involved. They have kept radio, television and other media on top of strike developments and informed of the strikers' story. They have also prepared and distributed 75,000 copies of one handbill and 100,000 copies of another, with more in the works.

Most Guildsmen have been carying out committee assignments in addition to other employment they have found since the strike started. Some of the more able-bodied male members have been working on the Portland docks through the cooperation of the Longshoremen's Union. Others have found temporary jobs in offices and stores around the city. Some have landed with public relations firms, and a few are working for local radio and TV stations, which have stepped up their news coverage.

Also easing the financial burden is the steady flow of contributions from other Guild locals. Seattle, San Francisco-Oakland and Los Angeles sent $100 contributions on th basis of wire service reports of the strike before any appeal for aid was issued from Portland.

The hybrid Oregonian-Journal has been a source of both amusement and irritation.

One page of the strikebreaker contained a story which started in column five and broke back, Chinese-style, through columns four, three, two, and one. Television schedules were unchanged from the previous week. Classified advertising, pasted up and photographed from electric typewriter copy, was nearly illegible. A fullpage display ad for Portland's leading department store promoted a new lightweight, portable typewriter weighing only 86 pounds.

The executives and other amateurs producing the makeshift sheet also were having circulation problems, largely as a result of snowballing subscription cancellations. Thousands of residents who canceled subscriptions continued to receive the combined daily. Thousands of others who didn't cancel weren't getting the paper. Distribution appeared to be on a throwaway basis.

There has been no comment yet from advertisers on the plans of the papers, reported in Editor & Publisher, for double billing of space in the hybrid paper. Said the Editor & Publisher story:

"Advertisers in the current issues will be billed by both newspapers at each advertiser's contract rate. An advertiser with a contract at only one of the papers will be billed by both at that contract rate."

The first few days of the strike were bitterly cold for Portland, but the weather has since moderated and pickets now face only the usual Oregon rain. Guild members have been on duty on the lines daily, with stereotypers and printers, to observe the comings and goings of strikebreakers and keep the membership informed of general activity.

[From the Oregon Labor Press, Dec. 4, 1959]

STRIKEBREAKERS ARE HERE—HIRED PROFESSIONALS PRINTING OREGOURNAL

Professional strikebreakers are working in Portland.

Names and hometowns of more than 70 of them are published on this page.

Most of them come from the Deep South and Southwest.

They are imported by the Oregonian and Oregon Journal to take the jobs of the striking members of the Stereotypers Union. They have also taken the jobs of printers, engravers, pressmen, mailers and paperhandlers who are honoring the stereotypers' picket lines.

Elimination of the unions from the mechanical departments of the Oregonian and Journal is the motive of the Portland publishers.

Strike insurance, which can pay the Portland publishers up to $500,000 over an 8-week period, provides the financial backing.

Provoke a strike, collect the strike insurance and call in a flying squad of professional strikebreakers. This is the pattern being followed by publishers all over the country. If the unions are divided and the general public misled, then the union-busting publisher is successful.

Who are the strikebreakers? Where did they come from? What is the role of the American Newspaper Publishers Association? Was this strike deliberately provoked by the publishers?

Here are some of the answers:

L. R. McCoy of Oklahoma City or Galveston, Tex., was sent here by the Southern Newspaper Publishers Association (an affiliate of the American Newspaper Publishers Association) to ride herd on the strikebreakers. He is staying at the Benson Hotel. He is a veteran strikebreaker. He has worked on similar strikebreaking jobs in Las Vegas, Nev.; Kennewick, Wash.; Oklahoma City, and Galveston. Members of his family, Hunter G. and Virginia McCoy, worked as strikebreakers in Ypsilanti, Mich., earlier this year.

McCoy was once a member of the International Typographical Union. He was suspended for nonpayment of dues in 1946.

McCoy's presence in Portland presumably relieves the Portland publishers of the distasteful chore of dealing directly with the strikebreakers.

McCoy in Portland is filling the same position, chief herder of the strikebreakers, that he filled in the Galveston strikebreaking attempt in 1957.

Also on hand at the Oregonian building are Bill and Justine Glover. These two were in Ypsilanti, Mich., in November of last year as key personnel in a Bloor Schleppey-Shirley Klein strikebreaking attempt. Justine's specialty is the training of teletypesetter operators.

Bloor Schleppey and Shirley Klein are the unholy alliance who operate a professional strikebreaking service for the American Newspaper Publishers Association. They were exposed to public view recently by an investigating committee of the New York State Legislature which probed their activities in Westchester County, N.Y.

There has been no definite proof that Schleppey-Klein is directly involved in Portland. But there are numerous Schleppey-Klein alumni among the Portland strikebreakers. This may not be a Schleppey-Klein operation, but the methods used here are certainly copied from the Schleppey-Klein strikebreaking handbook.

Bloor Schleppey of Zionsville, Ind., has been described by Time magazine as a man who has a role in American journalism as unusual as his name: he breaks strikes for pay.

Schleppey claims he gets his strikebreakers on a volunteer basis from the nonunion composing rooms of some of his newspaper clients.

The Typographical Union's dossier on Schleppey claims that his flying squads are mostly drunks, misfits, social cripples, and are generally incompetent in their work.

Time magazine reports that within days of the arrival of a Schleppey gang in Haverhill, Mass., for a strikebreaking job for the Haverhill Gazette, several of the recruits were arrested for drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

Schleppey has often been scheduled as a convention speaker by the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

Besides the McCoys and the Glovers, strikebreakers with Schleppey experience who have now shown up in Portland are Morris Smith, of Bastrop, La.; John T. Mott, West Monroe, La.; Warren Smith, Durant, Va.; Yancy Darbo, El Centro, Calif., and Bill Mills and wife Sally Mills, of Levittown, Pa.

Among the strikebreakers, some of whom arrived in Portland on the first and second days of the strike, were F. E. Early, of Reno, Nev.. and Kenneth G. Comstock, of Jacksonville, Fla.

Early and Comstock checked into the Hungerford Hotel with two rifles, a shotgun and a sawed-off shotgun. The publishers at first denied these men had been hired, then changed their story to admit that their actions might be considered provocative and said they were no longer employed.

Early has disappeared, but Comstock has reportedly been seen several times between the Hungerford Hotel and the Oregonian building.

Another armed member of the troupe is Max L. Rue, of Mahoae, N.Y. He is the paymaster, or swag man, for the strikebreakers.

Charles E. Richards, of Houston, Tex., is in town with his wife and daughter. His wife has reportedly stated that her husband has participated in strikebreaking operations in Kansas, Missouri, West Virginia, New York, Massachusetts, Ohio, and Michigan.

Many strikebreakers are openly boastful of their line of work. They flaunt their ill-gotten gains, $200 and $300 per week plus overtime and expenses. They tell of this being my sixth (third, fourth, fifth) straight strike.

Some have qualms. One said, "I know this is a pretty dirty thing, but think of the money."

James Younger, of Fort Smith, Ark., is working at the Oregonian. He was strikebreaking in Reno last spring and summer. He was encountered in a Reno casino with four other strikebreakers by two persons who are now in Portland on legitimate business. On hearing that the two would be in Portland later in the year, the strikebreakers said, "We'll see you in Portland."

These are the "other available personnel" the publishers talk about. These are the men and women the publishers say have been promised "permanent employment."

These are the people who feed on frustration and misfortune in labor negotiations. When the Portland strike is settled they will take off for the next strike. They don't participate in community affairs or support community charities. They accept community services without helping to pay for them. They stay at luxury hotels mostly, but some are living in the security-guarded newspaper plant.

Importation of strikebreakers is something new for Portland. It is not new, however, in the newspaper industry in other parts of the country.

This has happened in Levittown and Bristol, Pa., in Westchester County, N.Y., in Haverhill, Mass., in Ypsilanti, Mich., in Oklahoma City, in Galveston, Tex., in Reno, Nev., and many other places.

Importation of strikebreakers was the cause of a legislative investigation in New York. Similar investigation has been planned in Pennsylvania. Congressional and State legislative investigation has been called for in the Portland situation.

One of the key findings of the New York investigation was that "availability of standby crews of strikebreakers tends to withdraw employer incentive to bargain collectively * * * the existence of a strikebreaker pool incites to irresponsible and negative behavior instead of good faith, interchange of proposals, and supporting argument."

That labor-management relations in Portland have come to such a pass is inconceivable to many citizens. They fail to reckon with the profit-fascinated ownership of the Oregonian.

S. I. Newhouse, absentee owner of the Oregonian since 1950, is not the man who built the reputation of the Oregonian. That reputation was started and nurtured over a period of more than 100 years by Oregonians. S. I. Newhouse is not the man who won the Oregonian's Pulitzer prizes and Heywood Broun awards. These prizes were won for the Oregonian by reporters who are now supporting the stereotypers in their fight to retain legitimate contract provisions by collective bargaining.

S. I. Newhouse is the man who has brought armed strikebreakers to Portland.

STRIKEBREAKERS IDENTIFIED

Professional strikebreakers are in Portland.

Here are the names and hometowns of more than 70 of them.

They are producing the hybrid newspaper that used to be your hometown Oregonian and Oregon Journal.

Almost all of them come from the slave-wage Deep South and other far-off States.

They are hired professionals who make their living as strikebreakers, moving from city to city and from strike to strike to help publishers break the printing trades unions.

They live like kings in local hotels, and send their average $200 weekly earnings back home to good ol' Tuskahoochee. Their expenses in Portland are paid by the publishers, who pick up their tabs for hotel rooms, food and liquor.

They are working in the Oregonian Building as printers, stereotypers, pressmen, engravers, and mailers.

Here is the list of those who have been identified—and undoubtedly there are more:

From Oklahoma: L. R. McCoy, Oklahoma City; Leon A. Minnick, Oklahoma City; Abel (Arvel) Green, Oklahoma City; M. E. Hawkins, Oklahoma City; William D. Wilson, Oklahoma City; Wayne M. Clark, Oklahoma City; B. J. Guy, Blair; J. Brenan, Oklahoma City; Alvin L. Winn, Oklahoma City; B. J. Wood, Oklahoma City; B. H. Boles, Oklahoma City; Mrs. Sue Sherry, Oklahoma City; M. L. Gardner, Oklahoma City.

From Louisiana: J. T. Mott, West Monroe; Mrs. J. T. (Doris) Mott, West Monroe; Richard Munson, Baton Rouge; M. Smith, Bastrop; E. J. Willhite, Bastrop; Charles Chastant, Baton Rouge; L. Maxwell, Monroe; P. Moak, Winnsboro; P. Purvis, Monroe; J. P. McCarthy, Monroe; Grover Dunn, Monroe; Linton A. Kellum, Alexandria; Steve Moore (with two companions), Monroe.

From Texas: Bill Glover, Houston; Justine Glover, Houston; V. G. Vinson, Abilene; T. E. Smith, Wichita Falls; Lee Norton, Wichita Falls; B. E. Byrd, Henderson; Charles E. Richards (with two companions), Houston.

From Florida: J. Fikes, Miami; Kenneth G. Comstock, Jacksonville; E. Light, Miami; J. E. Nelson, Miami; G. Charles, Miami; Roy Chesser, Miami; B. A. (Betty) Coxe, Miami; G. K. Carastun, Jacksonville.

From Arkansas: R. Jennings, Eldorado; Howard G. Elliott, Hot Springs; James Younger, Fort Smith.

From Nevada: F. E. Early, Reno; E. G. Miner, Reno; Don Premer, Reno; D. B. Anderson, Reno; James Miller, Reno.

From Illinois: John Mitchum, East Moline; Bobby Smith, Rock Island; Mrs. E. Hansen, Galesburg.

From Pennsylvania: Donald Leeking, Liteh; Dick Brooks, Levittown; George Crothers, Bristol; Bill Mills, Levittown.

From Iowa: Bob Bushek, Davenport; Joanne Hodgkins, Davenport.

From Mississippi: William Goodfellow, Natchez.

From West Virginia: Virgil Lockhart, Huntington.

From Virginia: Warren Smith, Durant.

From New Jersey: Curt Scrum, Palisades.

From New York: Max L. Rue, Mahoae.

From Maine: L. W. Davis, Seymour.

From Ohio: Richard Axline, Zanesville.

From California: Yancy F. Darbro, El Centro.

From Washington: Sylvia Duran, Pasco; C. E. Benjamin, Kennewick.

From Oregon: Mrs. W. H. Allen, Cottage Grove.

WIVES OF TYPOS THREATENED

Threatening telephone calls were received this week by the wives of three members of the locked-out Multnomah Typographical Union.

Mrs. Leroy Blubaum, wife of the union's president, was called and told that her husband had better quit his union activities and resign from his position as president of the union or "watch out."

Mrs. Leta Rooklidge, wife of Chester Rooklidge who is a member of the union's negotiating committee, was called and told substantially the same thing. Included in the call to Mrs. Rooklidge was the threat that if Rooklidge did not stop his union "agitation" he would be in for great physical harm.

Mrs. Robert Burgess, wife of a member of the union, was the target of a slightly different type of call. She was told that the caller had pictures of both her and her husband. The caller said Mrs. Burgess was a "ring leader" in the "mob at the Oregonian Friday." (Mrs. Burgess participated in a peaceful demonstration by union wives at the Oregonian building). Mrs. Burgess was told: "You had better quit campaigning, you're no Carrie Nation and you had better watch out."

Mrs. Burgess was warned not to go out by herself on the streets, that it "might be dangerous." She was told to think twice before answering the telephone, that it "might be a window play."

The caller said, "After all the smart ones are weeded out and only the foolish remain, watch out."

The calls, received between 9 and 11 p.m. Monday, were believed to be the work of the same psychopathic personality. The calls were reported to the police.

The caller, a woman, spoke in a calm, clear, unhurried voice with no noticeable accent. She appeared to be quite well informed on the more spectacular aspects of the newspaper strike.

STEREOTYPER PRESIDENT REPORTS: DETROIT PAPERS SETTLE IN 7 HOURS ALL ISSUES OF PORTLAND'S STRIKE

Arrival in Portland of James H. Sampson, international president of the Stereotypers' Union, and the resumption of talks between publishers of the Oregonian-Journal and union negotiators were the only concrete developments this week in Portland's 24-day-old newspaper strike.

Sampson brought the report that all issues involved in the stereotypers' strike against the Portland papers were settled last Saturday in 1 day of negotiation with publishers of the Detroit Times, Free Press, and News.

Sampson said the issue of the German-made M.A.N. machine, a roadblock in the way of a Portland settlement, was settled in Detroit on substantially the same basis as proposed by the Portland stereotyper negotiators. That is that the manning of the machine be negotiated between union and management after the machine has been installed and both sides have had a chance to see it in operation.

Union membership of foremen was left up to each individual in Detroit. The substitution issue was also settled amicably in Detroit in the single negotiation session which lasted 7 hours.

The stereotyper president and the local union representatives met with Portland management all day Tuesday and again Wednesday through the efforts of Federal Mediator Elmer Williams.

After the Tuesday session, Sampson said, "We got nowhere today. Nothing was accomplished."

Management representatives, D. S. Haines and W. R. Morrish, at Tuesday's session refused to allow television cameramen to take pictures of them seated around the table with union representatives, including Sampson. Newsfilm on local TV stations showed the union men and Sampson at the table, but the only shots of management representatives showed them walking into the room.

THE JOURNAL FLIES INTO THE NEWHOUSE TRAP

Why does Portland have a newspaper strike?

President James H. Sampson, of the Stereotypers' International Union, said in Portland this week that the whole question of the new German stereotyping machine was recently settled by Detroit newspaper publishers and stereotypers in 7 hours of honest collective bargaining.

All of the other key issues of the Portland strike were settled in Detroit in the same 7-hour session.

They were settled peacefully, swiftly, and to the satisfaction of the newspapers and the union.

Three months ago the publishers of Seattle's two big daily newspapers signed a new 2-year contract with the printing trades unions. This contract granted the same improvements in wages and fringe benefits that Portland printers, stereotypers, and other unions have been trying patiently, for many months, to negotiate with the Oregonian and Oregon Journal.

Then why does Portland have a newspaper strike?

Why all the bitterness? Why all the cost? Why the inconveniences? Why the broken friendships? Why the sickening sight of imported strikebreakers scuttling into the Oregonian building?

There is only one reason: This strike was deliberately planned and incited by the Oregonian and the Journal.

To be more accurate, it was planned by the Oregonian's absentee owner, Samuel Newhouse, of New York, who somehow holds the locally owned Journal as his captive partner.

The newspaper unions didn't want the strike. They tried desperately to avoid it. They offered one compromise after another in their efforts to reach a peaceful and honorable settlement.

What did they get in return from the publishers?

They got ultimatums. They got delays. They got legalistic maneuvers. They got evasions and runarounds. They got demands that the publishers knew no union could accept.

A spokesman for the Typographical Union reports: "They kept goading, prodding, needling, stalling, evading. If we dared to back down on one issue, we knew they would replace it with a new and more impossible demand. Finally we reached the only possible conclusion: They wanted us to strike."

If anyone still doubts that this strike was deliberately planned by the publishers, let him consider this evidence:

1. The lightning speed with which dozens of professional strikebreakers appeared in Portland from cities thousands of miles away.

2. In Reno last July, a group of professional strikebreakers told a Portland woman that they had "a date to break a strike in Portland next winter." These men were then working behind picket lines at the Reno Gazette and Journal.

3. The Oregonian (if not the Journal) carries strike insurance covering all losses for 50 days.

4. Gov. Mark Hatfield offered to mediate a settlement of the strike, and the unions promptly accepted. The Oregonian and Journal flatly rejected the Governor's offer.

Finally, consider this fact:

Samuel Newhouse, absentee owner of the Oregonian, owns 13 other newspapers in the East and Midwest. Since last June, six of these newspapers have peacefully negotiated new long-term contracts with the printing trades unions.

None of the so-called "issues" of the Portland strike were raised by Newhouse's representatives in these negotiations.

We can draw only one conclusion: Newhouse deliberately chose Portland as his battleground. He ordered his local managers to force a strike. He decided to tear this town apart, if necessary, in a cold-blooded grab for more money and power.

Why did he choose Portland?

There is one obvious answer: Newhouse wants to buy the Oregonian's afternoon competitor, the Journal. A long strike will bleed the Journal white, while the Oregonian is propped up by its strike insurance and by the profits from 31 other Newhouse newspapers, magazines, and TV stations.

Why has the Journal fallen into the Newhouse trap?

The newspaper unions have repeatedly offered to negotiate independently with the Journal. But the Journal remains a captive in the Oregonian building. She no longer "flies with her own wings."

DR. STEINER'S SERMON—MINISTER ASKS NEWS STRIKE FACTS

The public's stake in the current strike-lockout at Portland's two daily newspapers was the subject of Dr. Richard M. Steiner's sermon last Sunday. Dr. Steiner is minister of the First Unitarian Church.

Dr. Steiner deplored the fact that the public is without adequate information upon which to render a judgment in dispute. "We are dependent upon rumors and upon the biased statements printed by the party that has control of the main avenue of information," he declared.

He called for the truth, and asked: "Can we trust the newspapers to give us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth?"

Half-truths, he noted, "can be as deceptive as outright lies."

Dr. Steiner said there are two reasons for the public's confusion over the newspaper strike. "In the first place," he said, "they cannot believe that the right is all on one side, and as far as the printed word is concerned, only one side has access to the newspapers and it quite obviously considers itself to be without fault in the present controversy."

He continued:

"When it comes to presenting their case to the public, the newspapers have all the advantage. We are, as a result, surfeited with rumors. Whether these rumors are deliberately incited or not, no one can say. Whether there is any truth in them or not, no one can say. We are told, for example, that the strike is a plot by the Oregonian to take over the Oregon Journal, which has been in financial difficulties. This has been denied, but anyone reading the denial must wonder if the publishers have not left themselves an out when they say 'at this time' they do not contemplate an absorption of the Oregon Journal into the Newhouse chain.

"We have heard that the issue is 'featherbedding,' that the union refuses to settle the issue as to how many men shall work on a machine for stereotyping that the Oregonian says it is going to purchase. I have heard it reported on one hand that the union is willing to arbitrate the number of men on the machine when, as, and if it is delivered. I have heard that the machine is not actually in existence, that one was made in Germany, imported to Montreal, Canada, and there it developed so many defects it had to be returned for redesign, that no one knows whether the new machine will prove effective or not.

"If this is the issue that is holding up the settlement of the strike, if the Journal is not interested in this machine, how does it happen that the Journal lends itself to this issue? This is a fair question, I think, and one which ought to be answered, but how are we to find the answer? How are we to get it?

"Featherbedding is a real problem and will become more acute as automation increases. Its solution does not lie in strikes or lockout, but in statesmanship.

"I have heard it rumored that the Oregonian does not want to settle the strike until its insurance strike benefits run out, by which time it hopes to have brought the Journal and the unions to their knees. The benefits, by the way, make it possible, I am told, to pay strikers $200 a week. Is it true?

"The newspapers must be cognizant of these rumors, but they have not affirmed or denied them.

"I have heard it rumored that the Oregonian and the Journal are out to 'bust the unions,' that they are insisting upon an 'open shop' from reporters to pressmen. If these rumors are true (and I do not say they are true because I do not know) they ought to be matters of public concern.

"With the consolidation of newspapers that is taking place all over the country—and the Newhouse interests are playing a major part in these consolidations—the labor market for those whose only skills are in newspaper work is being diminished. Thus in an open shop, the wage scale is apt to be depressed for there are an increasing number of applicants for every job, and the law of supply and demand when not protected by unionism, works just as well in the labor market as it does in the marts of trade.

"Indeed, one of the tragic consequences of the present controversy is the job uncertainty of the men and women who have dedicated their lives to the profession of journalism and who have given to the city of Portland high examples of professional competency as reporters, some of them winning national awards for their work.

"Indeed, the Pultizer Prize, which the Oregonian boasts of, was won for them by guild members who are now uncertain as to the future of their jobs."

Dr. Steiner noted the publishers' charge that by respecting the picket lines and staying off their jobs, members of the Newspaper Guild and the craft unions have broken their contracts. "This may be true," he said, "but, if it is true, the newspapers have recourse to the courts under the Taft-Hartley law for damages. So far, I have heard of no threat of such suit.

"Surely the newspaper publishers are not so naive as to believe that those who owe so much to their unions would cross a picket line. The union movement is based on solidarity. If unions don't hang together, they shall surely hang separately to quote a much honored and revered Revolutionary leader."

In conclusion Dr. Steiner declared that the responsibility both of the unions and of the publishers in the present controversy is of concern to the public "and we ought to make known our concern to those who have accepted the responsibility to keep us informed."

[From the Guild Reporter, Washington, D.C., Dec. 11, 1959]

PORTLAND PAPERS CUT OFF GUILD BLUE CROSS PROGRAM

PORTLAND, OREG.—The Oregonian and the Oregon Journal are squeezing guild members in a frantic attempt to force them back to work across the picket lines of striking stereotypers.

First step in the squeeze was an announcement by the papers Friday, December 4, that guild members and their families would be cut off from Blue Cross coverage under the plans at the two dailies.

Management rejected a proposal by the Portland Guild that the health and welfare trust be continued and coverage maintained, with premiums to be deducted from salaries when the strike is over.

The guild promptly reached agreement with Blue Cross to establish a new interim hospitalization and surgical plan for its members, identical in both benefits and costs with previous coverage at the Oregonian and the Journal.

The plan adds a $13 a month premium for each member to the financial burden during the strike. The cost to the local, with some 160 members out, will be more than $2,000 a month over and above routine operating costs and regular benefits for members and dependents.

If Blue Cross coverage had been allowed to lapse, however, maternity benefits would have been lost for the wives of several guildsmen because of interrupted membership.

The two papers followed up the welfare cutoff with a series of weekend telephone calls and letters seeking to induce guild members to return to work. The messages were made up of veiled threats, promises, and plain pleading. There were no defectors.

Guild units at both papers have been honoring the stereotypers' picket lines since the strike began, November 5. Printers, pressmen, mailers, engravers, and other crafts also have refused to work during the strike. ITU members joined the picket line when they found the plant doors locked and guarded against them and their positions filled by strikebreakers on the first day of the walkout.

With the help of the strikebreakers, plus supervisors and other nonunion personnel, the Oregonian and the Journal have managed to publish a combined daily edition under the flags of both papers. The plant and equipment of S. I. Newhouse's Oregonian are being used to produce the hybrid.

Despite a claimed press run of more than 500,000 and more than 5 weeks of operation, the combination paper still is little more than a throwaway. Circulation is haphazard. Carriers report mounting losses. Advertising space is rationed and a growing number of merchants have switched to spot television and radio commercials.

A telephone poll of Portland residents by guild members, using scientific polling methods, revealed that some 15 percent of the papers' readers have canceled their subscriptions. Losses in the suburban and State areas, where circulation has been cut most sharply, may send the cancellation total to 20 percent, the pollsters estimate.

The cancellation campaign picked up momentum after the first of the month. Many residents had been reluctant to inflict losses on carrier boys by stopping delivery in mid-November.

Advertisers, too, are rejecting even rationed space in the face of the rate policy adopted by the Oregonian-Journal. For space in the combined paper, the advertiser pays twice—once to the Oregonian and once to the Journal.

Within the past 2 weeks, management's stand on two of the key issues in the strike appeared ludicrous in the light of developments elsewhere.

The Oregonian has insisted that the stereotypers agree only one man will be necessary to operate a new German plate-casting machine it has not even ordered yet and which is not yet in use anywhere in the country.

On November 27, the union reached agreement on the same question with all three Detroit newspapers under substantially the same terms it has offered the Oregonian: that the manning issue will be negotiated by the parties when and if the machine is installed and both sides have had a chance to see it in operation.

The Portland papers also insist they will sign no union contracts under which foremen remain members of the union, on the gounds that this creates a closed shop in violation of the Taft-Hartley Act.

That question, too, was settled in Detroit by leaving the choice of membership to the individual.

And on November 25, the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C., ruled that a contract is not necessarily an illegal closed shop just because the foreman is a member of the union.

The unions also turned up new evidence that the strike was deliberately provoked by management in an attempt to turn the plants into open shops in all departments.

Two visitors to Portland reported they had met one of the strikebreakers now in the city—James Younger, of Fort Smith, Ark.—in Reno, Nev., last spring and summer. They said that on hearing they would be in Portland later in the year, Younger replied: "We'll see you in Portland."

The names and origins of more than 70 of the strikebreakers were printed in the Oregon Labor Press, a weekly owned by 11 AFL–CIO unions and councils in the State. Several of the scabs were identified as recruits of Bloor Schleppey and Shirley Klein in other newspaper strikebreaking attempts around the country.

Part of the list was read to the public by Guild President Bob Shults on a half-hour TV program produced by the Inter-Strike Policy Committee, headed by Charles Dale, ANG international representative.

The program, which aroused a storm of comment in the community, featured a series of interviews with union officials, rank-and-file picketers, and strikers' wives. It was the third half-hour TV program sponsored by the committee since the start of the dispute. The policy committee also is sponsoring 10 5-minute news broadcasts a week, divided between two radio stations.

Preparation of the newscasts and other publicity and public relations material is being carried out by guild members. The local is continuing, too, the production and distribution of handbills and its work with the Inter-Union Speakers' Bureau. Local President Shults already has addressed student and faculty groups at three of Portland's four colleges.

One temporary setback—the loss of its interim headquarters—was met and overcome by the local. The guild was evicted from a vacant store it had rented on Southwest Broadway just before a wrecking crew demolished the building to make way for a new 23-story Hilton hotel. The local's new headquarters consists of a second-floor suite of offices formerly occupied by a firm of labor attorneys.

[From the Guild Reporter, Washington, D.C., Dec. 25, 1959]

OREGON STRIKEBREAKER—PROBE SET—STATE GROUP ORDERS STUDY OF SCAB USE

PORTLAND, OREG.—The stereotypers' strike against Portland's two daily newspapers rolled into the sixth week with developments on every front except the bargaining table.

Management suffered two setbacks during the week.

The Oregon Legislative Interim Committee on Labor Management Relations ordered a special investigation January 9 on the use of imported strikebreakers and their effect on collective bargaining. The motion clearly aimed at the Portland newspaper strike was passed unanimously.

Unions were on hand for the committee's session in the State capital at Salem. They were prepared to introduce evidence on organized strikebreaking. The committee, however, preferred to call a special session to hear the explosive testimony.

The Oregon Wage and Hour Commission was advised at its regular meeting that women teletypesetter operators were being worked 72 hours per week in order to produce the combined Oregonian-Oregon Journal at the Oregonian plant.

The commission voted 2 to 1 to order the companies to obey State law in limiting the workweek to 44 hours for women employees. The commission also noted that under this law women may be worked a maximum of 60 hours under emergency conditions.

Both events received extensive radio and TV coverage. The strike newspaper, called the Orejournal by those on the picket lines, gave the stories the "kissed off" news treatment. But management trumpeted on the front page the return to work of eight guildsmen on December 14. Several others trickled back to work during the week, bringing to 14 the number of defectors from the guild's ranks.

The group included several leaders of a back-to-work movement launched the week before. This issue was met head-on at a membership meeting of the local. After 2 hours of debate, the back-to-work motion was resoundingly defeated 117 to 23 by secret written ballot. The night before the strike started the local voted 68 to 30, also by secret ballot, to respect the picket line.

Bob Shults, PNG president, said he and other guildsmen had the highest respect for others in the back-to-work movement who continue to observe the picket line. "We are proud that they are honoring the rights of others by obeying the mandate of the majority as recorded by a secret ballot," he said.

When the first seven defectors arrived at the Oregonian plant they found a mass picket line of 125 persons. Radio and TV were on the scene to cover the incident.

One radio station's news director handed a microphone to Shults on the sidewalk and asked what effect the defections would have on the morale of the guild. Shults replied:

"The guild is a thinking man's union, a few members just filtered through the picket line."

The remark was widely quoted and tape recordings of the live broadcast were repeated on subsequent news programs.

Publishers of the Oregonian and the Journal have flatly refused to accept mediation through Gov. Mark Hatfield or through an impartial factfinding panel as suggested by both the Governor and Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER.

More than 3 weeks ago, the Portland newspaper unions accepted the Governor's offer of personal mediation, but the publishers would have no part of it.

This week, Senator NEUBERGER suggested that the Governor appoint "a citizen's factfinding panel of the utmost impartiality and integrity to help clarify the issues in the present Portland newspaper strike."

Again the unions agreed, but the publishers brushed aside the suggestion.

The Portland Guild represents the newsrooms of the two papers and inside circulation at the Journal.

For the first month of the strike management had let it be known that any guildsman would have to be rehired to get his job back. After the solid 5-to-1 vote to defeat the back-to-work movement management launched a whirlwind campaign at "weak sisters" with the offer that they could go back to work just as if they had never missed a day on the job.

Honey works where vinegar did not, management found out.

The defectors leaped from the frying pan to the fire as far as their hospital and life insurance plan is concerned. They can't work enough shifts in December to be covered in January under the joint guild-management trust fund and most certainly the hard-pressed guild treasury is not going to pay the $15.80 per person bill for them.

"Instead of declaring supplementary local benefits for members from the generous donations of other guilds we are paying the hospital and life insurance for all guildsmen respecting the picket line," Shults explained. This cost PNG almost $2,400 for December coverage. The local faces a $2,200 bill for January coverage for its 130 members still off their jobs.

The plan provides either Blue Cross or Kaiser Permanente hospital and surgical coverage and $4,000 life insurance.

Management apparently was stung by the latest in a series of TV shows sponsored by the newspaper unions. The newspapers reprinted the speeches of the four panel members and then denounced them in two columns of 12-point type. It took a full page of space.

The bitterest and longest blasts in the editorial were directed at Charles Dale, guild international representative assigned to Portland for the strike emergency. Dale had blistered management for the importation of 115 professional strike breakers into its mechanical departments. The TV shows have been hurting management as they urge the public to cancel their subscriptions.

One nonunion telephone operator said "The switchboard lights up like a Christmas tree the instant the program is over and continues that way for several hours as people cancel their papers."

Careful investigation shows the combined paper is down more than 100,000 in circulation. Advertisers, however, are charged the regular rates by both papers for rationed ads appearing in the combined edition.

The weekly Oregon Labor Press, in carrying the union story to Portland's citizenry, pushed up the press run of its December 18 issue to 100,000.

Planned for the year-end is an edition of 275,000, to be mailed to virtually every residence in the Portland metropolitan area. The eight-page issue will eliminate all advertising and regular features and will tell the Portland strike story from its beginning. Six striking editorial staff members, plus artists and photographers on assignment, will aid editor Jim Goodsell in production. Locked-out ITU mailers have volunteered to work over the Christmas weekend to get the paper into the mails.

The stereotypers are on strike at Portland. The ITU printers and mailers are on the picket lines carrying lockout banners. Pressmen, engravers, machinists, and members of other unions are respecting the picket lines. Teamsters employed by the Journal are also on the picket line.

[From the Oregon Labor Press, Dec. 25, 1959]

THE NEWSPAPER STRIKE STORY: THERE IS ANOTHER SIDE—EMPLOYEES ASK ONLY THEIR DAY IN COURT

This is an appeal to your sense of fair play.

It is the story—spread across this special issue of the Oregon Labor Press—of a newspaper strike in Portland.

The publishers have described their version of the dispute as the facts. Their union employees believe that these facts are biased, slanted, and in some cases, outright untruths.

Here is the employees' side. Openly and honestly, they say it is their side. It is a side which has not, unfortunately, been told by the publishers of the Oregonian and Oregon Journal.

We ask only that you read—and then decide where the truth is to be found.

The present newspaper strike is not an ordinary labor dispute. It is not over wages. It is not over any clear-cut issue. There has not been good faith bargaining by the publishers to settle it.

In short, we believe this is an employer-forced strike.

We believe it was provoked, deliberately, by the publishers of the Oregonian and Oregon Journal to destroy unions—unions whose members are your friends and neighbors in every part of the Portland area.

We say this for several compelling reasons:

1. A Republican Governor, Mark Hatfield, offered to mediate a settlement of the strike. He was urged to do so by both the Portland and the Oregon Council of Churches.

The Governor agreed. The unions agreed. The publishers flatly refused.

A Democratic U.S. Senator, RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, urged the appointment of a citizens' factfinding committee to clarify the strike issues for the public.

The unions welcomed the suggestion. The publishers flatly refused.

(Both newspapers, over the years, have praised Oregon Governors for mediating labor disputes. They have recommended factfinding as a method of settling strikes. But now the publishers reject these remedies in their own strike. We can only conclude that they don't want to settle this strike—and they don't want the public to know the facts.)

2. Every strike issue labeled as a "key issue" by the Portland publishers also was an issue in Detroit recently. In Detroit, each of these issues was settled without a strike, without months of negotiation, without bitterness.

In 7 hours of good faith bargaining, these issues were settled by Detroit's three major newspapers and the Stereotypers' Union—on terms to which Portland's striking stereotypers would agree this very minute.

Every issue settled—in 7 hours. They were not settled here, we believe, because the Portland publishers wanted this strike.

3. The Stereotypers' Union has offered many compromises and concessions, both before and after the strike began. But the Oregonian and Journal have met each compromise with a new and tougher demand.

We believe this proves that the publishers wanted the strike—and that now they want it to continue. How different from the 7-hour settlement of the same issues in Detroit. How different from the peaceful negotiation of new union contracts by both daily newspapers in our sister city of Seattle.

4. The Oregonian and Journal have continued to publish a joint newspaper by the wholesale importing of professional strikebreakers—most of them from the Deep South and other far-away States.

Many among the 116 identified strikebreakers have police records. Several of them came armed—at least one with an illegal sawed-off shotgun. All break strikes for salaries—premium salaries ranging to $300 a week plus expenses.

Several of these strikebreakers knew as long as 5 months ago that they were going to be needed in Portland this year. They were alerted long before the Stereotypers Union had even opened negotiations with the Oregonian and Journal publishers.

5. Strike insurance, a new device in labor relations, has enabled the Portland publishers to import their strikebreakers. Strike insurance is the reason why they defiantly refuse the proferred help of the Governor, why they defiantly refuse to bargain in good faith with the unions of their longtime employees.

Strike insurance means the Oregonian and Journal are collecting $1 million over a 50-day period—from a multi-million-dollar insurance account held in a Canadian bank.

This not only means that the publishers' losses are being covered.

What is far more important is that for the 8 weeks, while the employees try to scrimp along, there is absolutely no pressure on the publishers to negotiate for a settlement of the strike.

As in the old bloody days of raw capitalism, management can try—literally—to starve out its employees, while it loses not a cent. This is a strange situation for placid Portland and its once-venerated hometown newspapers.

6. This is a dispute which threatens to make Portland a one-newspaper city.

New York press lord Samuel I. Newhouse, who owns the Oregonian, wants the locally owned Journal.

If he gets it, he can save millions by merger.

If he gets it, we can expect the same kind of objectivity on all subjects that the hybrid Oregonian-Journal has provided on the news of this strike. Would we have newspapers or viewspapers?

HIGHER PRICES COULD RESULT

If Newhouse buys the Journal, watch prices climb; newspaper merger everywhere has meant higher advertising rates—and hence higher prices on the food and merchandise you buy.

Tragically, this strike never would have started if the publishers had shown good faith in bargaining or shown the slightest desire for honest negotiation of a labor contract.

But the Oregonian and Journal still profess to believe in collective bargaining. In rejecting Senator NEUBERGER'S factfinding proposal, they called collective bargaining the "proper procedure for settlement of such disputes."

In this dispute, the publishers have made a mockery of their own words. They have raised demands which no union in America could accept—wholesale elimination of union rights won in years of honest collective bargaining.

Check the progress on the issues:

Issue No. 1

Publishers originally demanded one-man operation of a German-made plate-casting machine which they haven't even ordered and which the stereotypers have never seen. They haven't seen it because there isn't a single one in operation in the United States.

Stereotypers offered to negotiate the number of men needed to run the machine when and if it was installed. As a further concession, they agreed to no work stoppage or strike during the progress of such negotiation.

The publishers refused the offer. Instead, they added a new demand—reexamination of the manning of other equipment—a question already settled by the collective bargaining procedure the publishers say they admire.

And, incidentally, the Journal has no interest in the machine. Why does the Journal support the Oregonian's adamant stand on an issue that means nothing to the Journal?

Issue No. 2

Publishers demanded the right to hire substitutes, which the union always has provided. Publishers said this system has forced hiring of men at overtime rates.

The stereotypers offered to settle this point by covering all regular shifts at straight-time rates and to guarantee no penalty shifts.

The publishers refused. Instead, they again added a new demand—that strikebreakers be given priority and seniority over regular employees of long standing.

Issue No. 3

Publishers demanded that foremen decide for themselves whether to belong to a union.

The stereotypers agreed.

Box score on the three issues:

The stereotypers: three issues, three concessions, no new demands.

The publishers: three issues, no concessions, five new demands.

In addition to the two mentioned, they insist on the following:

1. A 5-hour increase in the workweek, with no increase in pay.

2. An open shop, which would force union men to work side by side with strikebreakers.

3. A no strike clause in any new contract.

This is the type of collective bargaining that has caused the publishers to resist appointment of an impartial factfinding body.

This is the way management serves 850 employees, many of 20 and 30 years' service and whose loyalty would not permit them to walk out on mere whim or caprice.

ENTIRE COMMUNITY HURT

But this strike hurts not only the jobless employees.

It hurts merchants—because of restricted advertising sold at premium rates, because of the decreased spending power in the community. Strikebreakers take their money back to Dixie.

It hurts readers—because of an inferior product with scant local news, because they have grounds now to be distrustful of all objective news the papers may print.

It hurts the community—because if monopoly should result, Portland will be a city with one advertising rate and one voice—from which there would be virtually no appeal.

Documentation of the arguments we make here is detailed throughout this special issue of the Oregon Labor Press.

Read it and decide who merits your support—850 longtime citizens of our community who have made honest attempts and concessions in an effort to end the strike—or Newhouse and the professional strikebreakers he has imported from the South to destroy the unions to which your friends and neighbors belong.

THOSE NEW "OREGONIANS"—ROVING STRIKEBREAKERS SUPPLANT PORTLANDERS

"All are good people, most of them married, a large percent owning their own homes and paying Oregon taxes."

The words are those of the Oregonian-Journal, used to describe the personnel now putting out the combined paper.

They sound reassuring. Except for one thing.

They aren't true.

Already, the Labor Press has published documented rosters of 116 professional strikebreakers imported by the publishers.

Some were here within hours after the strike began—even though their homes are thousands of miles away. Others said, as long as 5 months ago, that they expected to be in Portland this year.

Take William Glover for example.

He is married—to Justine Glover, who has been associated with him in strikebreaking attempts across the country, including this one.

He may own a home—but it is not in Portland. And if he pays Oregon taxes, it is only because he has to through payroll deductions.

Glover, 34, known as "Bino" to his fellow strikebreakers, has worked for the Schleppey-Klein firm, an organization dedicated to breaking strikes—temporarily seizing, for exorbitant pay, the jobs of regular employees out on strike.

Before coming to Portland just after the present dispute began November 10, Glover was involved as a strikebreaker in Zanesville, Ohio; Houston; Ypsilanti, Mich.; Haverhill, Mass., and Westchester County, N.Y.

Compare him, for example, to Fred Breckon, one of the regular newspaper employees, whose jobs the strikebreakers have pirated.

Breckon is a soft-spoken printer who has worked at the Oregon Journal for 12 years.

He is proud of his home in Vermont Hills, a home into which he has welcomed this year a Mexican exchange student.

Fred Breckon votes and pays Oregon taxes, but he also does a host of things in the community which are not required of him:

He was one of the first volunteer workers at the Oregon Museum of Science and Industry. He is a member of the Men's Garden Club, a Mason, a radio ham, a member of the First Presbyterian Church.

His wife, Lillian, is a past president of the Portland PTA council and a State board member. She is on the YWCA board.

They managed to send their oldest son, Lyall, to Harvard, and now he works for the State Department. Their other son, Garry, is a Wilson High sophomore.

The Breckons now get the bare minimum strike benefits provided by the International Typographical Union. The Glovers, on the other hand, together make close to $700 a week, for their part in trying to break a legitimate strike.

This kind of activity has come under official scrutiny several times. In Westchester County, N.Y., for example, a New York State legislative committee denounced the existence of a strikebreaker pool.

A similar probe has been undertaken in Pennsylvania. Now, in Portland, the urgings of responsible public officials have resulted in the scheduling of an investigation by the legislative interim committee on labor-management relations.

The investigations come simply because these people are strikebreakers, who, by their existence, the New York committee concluded, incite labor strife by encouraging publishers to force regular employees, good people, out on strike.

Missing Bylines—Famous Reporters Honor Picket Line

Missing these days from Portland's two daily newspapers are the bylines of reporters whose years of dedicated service have won them a proud place in American newspaper history.

These are the bylines of members of the American Newspaper Guild, members who have voted overwhelmingly to support their fellow unions in the strike against the Oregonian and Oregon Journal.

They are bylines which have earned Portland a national reputation for honesty and impartiality in reporting.

The men and women supporting this strike have won, individually or for their papers, almost every major honor in American journalism—the Pulitzer Prize, the Heywood Broun Award, Nieman fellowships, national recognition for reporting in the fields of government, education, traffic safety, and aviation.

Nieman fellowships, incidentally, provide graduate study at Harvard University for America's outstanding newspapermen and newspaperwomen.

Supporting this strike are news reporters you know:

Wallace Turner, Oregonian, winner of two Heywood Broun Awards (for his exposure of scandal in sale of Indian lands and for investigation of vice), Nieman fellow, major contributor to the winning of a Pulitzer Prize.

Donald J. Sterling, Jr., Journal, Nieman fellow whose reporting of city government and of other stories have won him widespread respect for impartiality, for accuracy.

Wilma Morrison, Oregonian, one of America's top education reporters, twice winner of the National Education Writers Association's top award, only noneducator ever appointed to the educational policy committee of the NEA and former Oregon Education Citizen of the Year.

Stan Weber, Journal, whose down-the-middle coverage of labor disputes has earned him respect of both management and labor in a field as explosive as any covered by newspapers.

Mervin Shoemaker, Oregonian, veteran political writer, whose views are sought by national magazines.

Stan Durland, Journal, whose authoritative reporting of medical affairs has gained him the confidence of both the medical profession and the reading public.

Leverett Richards, Oregonian, national authority in the aviation field (he flies jets himself), public information officer for the Antarctic Operation Deep Freeze in 1956 and 1957, and 1957 winner of the Junior Chamber of Commerce Award for outstanding contribution to aviation in Portland.

J. Edward Reid, Journal, national award winner for his crime reporting, trusted associate of FBI agents and other top police investigators.

Paul Hauser, Oregonian, veteran of the political arena, even better known for his human interest stories which for years have drawn both tears and laughter from his readers.

John Finch, Journal, whose coverage of the waterfront has kept readers both entertained and informed on vital activities in a major shipping center.

These are but a few of the bylines missing from the hybrid newspaper now being printed by imported strikebreakers in our city.

And the reporters are not alone in the Newspaper Guild in their support of other unions.

With them are sports writers who have covered championship fights, Rose Bowl and East-West games, national basketball championships, national golf tournaments.

With them are the society editors and writers—at ease at Portland's most exclusive parties, in the most exclusive clubs—yet now supporting a newspaper strike and lockout, lending a hand in union activities.

With them are photographers, risking injury one minute at floods and fires, the next quietly photographing teenagers who win leads in senior class plays.

With them are women in the newspapers' home service departments, women who answer frantic young brides' requests for instructions on cooking elk steaks.

With them are garden experts who save your roses with proper pruning instructions.

With them are artists whose cartoons can infuriate or tickle, whose deft touches save faded photographs brought in for reproduction.

These are the men and women of the Portland Newspaper Guild.

They are homeowners, active in civic affairs, proud of their city.

They are proud of their role in American life.

They are also proud of their union.

Strikebreaking Probe Slated by Legislators

The importation of strikebreakers and its impact on labor-management relations in Oregon will be aired at a public hearing scheduled in Salem January 9 by the Legislative Interim Committee on Labor-Management Relations.

Although the decision to conduct such a hearing obviously grew out of the current newspaper strike, in which the combined Oregonian-Oregon Journal is being published by imported strikebreakers, the committee has announced that the matter will be considered in the light of the overall labor-management relations picture in the State.

Decision to call the hearing was reached unanimously by the committee at a meeting in Salem December 18 on the motion of Walter J. Pearson, senate president, who is a member of the group.

Initial request for just such a hearing was made by State Representative Edward J. Whelan, another committee member and executive-secretary of the Multnomah County Central Labor Council.

Representatives of the two struck newspapers and the unions involved in the strike-lockout will be invited to testify at the hearing, but no attempt will be made by the committee to consider the issues of the strike itself. It was emphasized that the hearing will be confined to the single matter of importation of strikebreakers.

George Brown, political education director for the Oregon AFL–CIO, also was in attendance at the December 18 meeting and urged the committee to confine its hearing to the one problem, without going into the strike issues.

Whelan originally proposed that the committee take up the matter of strikebreakers when it became apparent within the first week of the strike that the combined newspapers were importing strikebreakers from as far away as Florida.

Whelan viewed the practice of importing strikebreakers as having a "serious negative impact on the efforts of mediation."

Provocations Resisted—Attacks, Threats Harass Pickets

They have been attacked with cars, bottles, and baseball-size rocks.

They have been threatened with sawed-off shotguns, rifles, and late-night phone calls.

But, nonetheless, the pickets and other union members involved in the present newspaper strike have not let themselves be provoked.

A survey of the thick police bureau file on the strike disclosed that incidents of violence or near-violence concerning the strike, by and large, were not caused by the union side.

The first report in the police file, dated November 15, is probably also the most menacing.

Patrolmen Louis De Giovanni and Bernard Schuette stopped two men leaving a Florida-licensed car across Southwest Columbia Street from the Oregonian plant—where the struck managements are publishing jointly.

The men, Gordon Comstock, 27, and Franklin E. Early, 22, were carrying an armload of weapons. The men said they had been hired by the Oregonian.

The officers' report described the weapons as a .22 Winchester, a 12-gage Savage, a .22

Higgins—and a sawed-off shotgun, "homemade and without markings of any kind."

The gun, in clear violation of Federal law, was seized by the FBI, and the Federal Alcohol and Tobacco Tax Unit investigated.

The combined newspaper reported the incident without any mention of the sawed-off shotgun or the FBI's role.

Despite the notoriety this caused, a similar incident occurred 4 weeks later, when weapons were taken from three other imported strikebreakers—Curtis Gleason, Holden, Mass.; Richard C. Brewster, Oxford, Mass., and an unidentified third man.

On December 11, police arrested paper distributor Wilford P. Weller, 520 Northeast Laurelhurst Street, after he plowed his car into a group of women pickets.

Four women were struck, and Arleta Johnson, 27, 5423, Southeast Gladstone Street, was hospitalized.

Patrolman Bernard K. Smith said Weller was so belligerent that "I had to go over his hood to get to the driver's side and get the car stopped."

A more serious incident on November 19 sent printer Ira Connell, 55, 9570 Southwest 80th Avenue, to Emanuel Hospital with painful hip and ankle injuries.

Connell was not picketing but was talking to a friend on the picket line when he was struck by a newspaper-filled station wagon.

Connell's wife, a witness, said the vehicle didn't stop, but "just shot right out of the tunnel."

On December 14, picket Eugene K. Wootten, 14745 Southeast Rhone Street, walking in front of the empty Journal Building, just missed being struck by large rocks thrown from an upstairs window.

At least two union families have been threatened with violence, by a smooth-talking woman familiar with their jobs.

There have been a few incidents on the other side of the fence.

The most serious ended December 11 when two former Journal truckdrivers were convicted of assault and battery in Milwaukee justice court and fined $75 each.

Present Journal distributors George A. Fleming and Elmer Betts testified they had been struck several times with lengths of rubber hose after the former drivers, Mike Rovito and Claude Mayo, followed them to Oak Grove from the Oregonian.

On November 15, Henry D. Keith, 32, 910 Southeast 175th Avenue, identified as a pressman, was arrested for drunkenness and jaywalking in connection with an attempt to spill papers.

STRIKEBREAKER KNEW HE WAS COMING—FIVE MONTHS AGO IN RENO BAR: "WE'LL BREAK A PORTLAND STRIKE"

Five months ago, the publishers of the Oregonian and Oregon Journal already were planning to force a strike and to import professional strikebreakers.

That is the conclusion of two Portland telephone operators who were told by a newspaper strikebreaker in Reno last summer:

"We'll be coming up to Portland this year * * * we'll all be up there."

This week, the two women gave the first detailed public account of their encounter with newspaper strikebreakers, asking only that their names be withheld.

The scene: The cocktail bar of the Carlton Hotel in Reno, Nevada.

The time: The evening of July 11, 1959.

"I had been playing a machine," says one of the women, "when this man spoke to me. We got to talking and he said he was a strikebreaker.

"I didn't even want to talk to him then—a strikebreaker is the most despicable thing I can imagine, but my friend said she didn't even know what a strikebreaker was."

The man, now identified as James Younger, of Fort Smith, Ark., was then working behind the picket line at the Reno Gazette and Journal. He is now working behind the picket line at the Oregonian building.

In the Reno cocktail bar, Younger explained that he got $250 a week counting overtime, $6 a day for meals, and his hotel bills and transportation taken care of.

"I go wherever the money is," he said.

By this time, the husbands of the two women had returned "and we got to talking some more with this fellow—he was the only clean-cut looking one in the bunch—and four or five other people who worked with him.

"They said they were breaking the strike at the Reno paper and were bragging all about how much money they were making.

"We told them we were from Portland.

"'Say,' this one fellow said, 'we'll be coming up to Portland this year.'

"'Oh, don't be ridiculous,' I said," the woman recalls.

"'Well, we will be. We'll all be up there.'"

The other Portland woman's account of the incident is almost the same.

She recalls that a woman strikebreaker was creating a raucous scene at the bar. This woman, about 45, talked as though she were a leader of the strikebreakers.

"She said that by the end of the month, she would have earned $1,000," the young Portland woman relates.

"She told me where the next newspaper strike was expected, and said, 'I'm going to be there. I'm going to be in the middle of it.'

"I asked her how she knew.

"'Oh, our association always knows that,'" the woman replied.

After their return to Portland several days later, the women reported the incident to their union head, Wesley D. McDuffee, president of Local 9201, Communication Workers of America, who confirms their story.

"They were quite shocked about this strikebreaking situation in Reno," McDuffee said this week. "Very frankly, I didn't think much of it at the time. But I changed my mind when the strike started in Portland—and especially when Younger showed up here."

The women also asked an Oregonian reporter, long-time friend of one, about the likelihood of a strike.

"He laughed," the woman recalls. "He said there wasn't even talk of a strike."

And indeed there wasn't—by the unions. For all this took place 4 months before the strike began and 2 months before Stereotypers Local 48 even sat down to open negotiations with the Portland publishers.

But today, just as he said he would be, James Younger is 1 of the 116 identified strikebreakers working at the Oregonian plant.

PUBLISHERS IMPORT 116 STRIKEBREAKERS

A pool of professional strikebreakers is available on immediate call in the newspaper industry.

Each newspaper strikebreaking operation provides a training ground for new strikebreakers.

Now they are in Portland. They are working at the Oregonian building putting out the hybrid Oregonian-Oregon Journal, getting premium pay and all expenses.

They arrived from as far away as Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, and Florida, many on the first day of the strike.

Chief of the imported strikebreaking crew is L. R. McCoy, fresh from a similar assignment in Galveston, Tex. He was sent here by the Southwest Newspaper Publishers' Association, an affiliate of the national association.

Working here under him are a number of alumni of the Schleppey-Klein operation.

Organized by Bloor Schleppey of Zionsville, Ind., self-avowed paid strikebreaker for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, the operation has trained printers, pressmen, and stereotypers to pirate the jobs of regular workers.

Schleppey has been a frequent speaker at ANPA conventions and his services have been used in dozens of strikebreaking attempts.

It cannot we determined if he or his associate, Shirley Klein, are involved here directly. But their students are here.

They are people like David B. Anderson, 23, whose home address is unknown, but who hasn't spent much time there lately in any case. He has worked as a Schleppey-Klein strikebreaker in Davenport, Iowa; Chicago, Miami, and Haverhill, Mass.

Or Betsy Coxe, a blonde teletypesetter instructor who is known to have worked as a strikebreaker in Miami and Oklahoma City.

Or Lee Norton, whose job-pirating history includes episodes in Galveston, Tex., Monroe, La., and Wichita Falls, Tex.

Their names have been detailed before. The Labor Press has listed the roster of 116 imported roving job stealers.

Whose jobs have they taken?

Harold Warner has spent 54 of his 68 years working for first the Journal and then the Oregonian.

"We helped build the Journal," he says with pride. "If the Jacksons or the Pittocks were around now, this kind of strike would never have happened."

His is a two-generation Oregonian family. Son George, 32, already has worked at the Oregonian for 9 years. Both Warners are substantial citizens. They own homes. They are active in youth work and other community activities. They pay taxes for and take pride in their neighborhoods and city.

In his 29 years as a pressman in Portland, John Bisch has been a leader in his union, a school district chairman, a civil defense official, and an active Mason.

Petite Freda Cowling, club editor of the Oregonian for more than 30 years, has spent countless hours working for the Red Cross, the United Fund, the Visiting Nurse Association, and the Air Defense Filter Center.

She has given blood 35 times at the Red Cross blood center.

Mrs. Cowling, who, like other members of the Newspaper Guild, decided not to cross the picket lines into the struck newspaper plant, is a church and precinct board member, buying a home and paying local taxes.

Who is more valuable to the community, Freda Cowling or Betsy Coxe?

The story can be repeated again and again—as many times as there are strikebreakers to compare with regular newspaper employees—solid citizens of Portland.

A few are detailed with pictures on this page. Compare the records—and then decide whose side you'd like to be on.

ONE-NEWSPAPER TOWN?—THREAT OF MERGER FACING PORTLAND

Repeated denials by Journal owners have failed to erase the threat posed by the newspaper strike-lockout that Portland will wind up in the ranks of one-newspaper cities.

Samuel I. Newhouse, the New York press lord who owns the Oregonian, wants to buy the Journal. Already the Journal has fallen to a "kept" status in the Oregonian building.

The Journal management's denial that the paper is for sale comes as no surprise. All newspaper consolidations are preceded routinely by similar firm denials.

Actions of Journal publishers, however, weaken their denials. The day the strike commenced, the Journal management closed its own plant and transferred operations to the plant of its competitor, the Oregonian.

Further, the Journal management admitted it had no interest in the German platecasting machine, operation of which the Oregonian posed as the primary issue which led to the strike-lockout.

One Journal official said privatey early in the strike:

"This situation means the windup of the Journal and the windup of me. The Oregonian is going to take us over when this strike is done."

Missing is any denial on the part of the Oregonian management that Newhouse interests want to purchase the Journal. Elsewhere, Newhouse has been successful in buying out his competitors in the newspaper field.

Newspaper consolidation and monopoly control have been progressively increasing in recent years. The consequences of such mergers are manifold, and of growing concern to the public.

What might one newspaper mean to Portland?

It would mean increased subscription rates. It could mean increased advertising rates which would be passed on to the consumer through increased prices of merchandise.

Of more significance to the public generally might be the editorial implications of a monopoly operation. It could mean concentration of all editorial power in one newspaper and quite possibly in one man.

It could mean the establishment of a policy which could create a blackout of all but one side of any issue.

Louis M. Lyons, curator of the Nieman Foundation at Harvard University, views the newspaper consolidation trend in this way:

"As mergers increase and more and more cities are reduced to a single newspaper ownership, the danger that the newspaper will become chiefly a voice of the local power setup increases.

"As this concentration proceeds, what form of countervailing power is available to the elements in the community which do not feel their interests affiliated with the elements of local power?

"In short, what chance for those who do not feel represented by the board of trade?"

STRIKE INSURANCE: $1 MILLION ACE IN HOLE—PORTLAND PAPERS USE NEW WEAPON

Strike insurance.

This is the ace in the hole held by strikebreaking publishers of the Oregonian and Journal.

A strike insurance war chest of more than $17 million is held in a Montreal, Canada, bank. It is out of reach of U.S. courts and laws.

It can pay the Portland publishers up to $1 million in the present strike lockout.

Each of them can collect $10,000 per day, up to $500,000, over a 50-day period.

Premium payments are deductible as a business expense for tax purposes.

Strike insurance is the device that enabled the publishers to bring in a flying squad of strikebreakers. These strikebreakers, some of them armed and some with police records, are here to put down a legitimate effort of Portland newspaper unions to bargain collectively for fair and decent working conditions and wages.

NEWHOUSE LEADS DEVELOPMENT

Strike insurance is a potent new weapon for union busting. It has been pioneered by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Spearheading its development within the newspaper industry is Samuel Newhouse of New York, absentee owner of the Oregonian.

Two representatives of the Newhouse newspaper chain are on the Newspaper Publishing Premium Fund Committee of the strike insurance plan. They are Theodore Newhouse and M. J. Frey.

Theodore Newhouse is Sam Newhouse's brother. He is general manager of the Long Island Press and Star-Journal. Although he is a resident of New York, he is also vice-president of the Oregonian Publishing Co.

M. J. Frey is publisher of the Oregonian.

Presence of two Newhouse men on the strike insurance committee is all the proof needed that the Oregonian is covered. Statements that the Oregon Journal also participates in the union-busting insurance plan have brought no denials from Journal publishers.

One reason why the publishers' strike insurance is held in Canada is that in 1956 the filing of such policies in New York was rejected by that State's department of insurance as contrary to public policy.

PLAN MOVED TO CANADA

The New York State Department of Insurance investigated charges that strike insurance actually encouraged publishers to force their employees out on strike.

The investigation was handled by the office of Jacob K. Javits, then attorney general of New York and now a Republican U.S. Senator from New York.

"On July 26, 1956," Javits reported, "I was advised by the Department of Insurance that the filings of each insurance company involved were rejected on the ground that approval of such coverage would be contrary to public policy."

But that didn't stop the American Newspaper Publishers' Association. They merely transferred their strike insurance to other companies and moved it into Canada—beyond the reach of U.S. laws.

Premiums for this insurance are high. Cost of the 50-day policy for one newspaper is $12,262.50 per year.

But payment of $24,525 has given the Portland publishers $1 million and 50 days for their cold-blooded attempt to starve out their union employees.

Existence of newspaper strike insurance has been known for several years. But only last spring were the details of the plan made known. The American Newspaper Guild acquired copies of a memorandum of the Newspaper Publishers' Premium Fund Committee.

The plan was set up, according to the memorandum, by publishers to cover losses resulting from strikes. The memo says that responsible underwriters are willing to provide such insurance under a group plan. It predicts that total coverage issued by the underwriters will be not less than $17.5 million.

The underwriters are not named, but their representatives are Mendes and Mount, 27 William Street, New York, N.Y. Mendes and Mount are the New York attorneys of Lloyds' of London.

ANPA COUNSEL CALLS TURN

Montreal Trust Co. of Canada is the escrow agent to which all premiums are paid. This company issues strike insurance to newspapers on the advice of Elisha Hanson, general counsel for the American Newspaper Publishers' Association.

Montreal Trust Co. pays strike insurance claims in U.S. dollars.

Payments are made starting with the eighth day of a strike.

If publication is totally suspended, publishers are paid the full amount of daily indemnity. If publication is partially suspended, the amount paid includes (1) fixed charges, (2) expenses that cannot be eliminated during partial suspension, and (3) profits the publisher is prevented from earning because of partial suspension.

Armed with their new strike insurance weapon, the publishers of the Oregonian and Journal deliberately took positions in negotiations that obviously could not be accepted by the Stereotypers' Union. They refused to bargain in good faith. Other newspaper unions ran into the same arrogant attitudes in their negotiations with the publishers.

That the publishers deliberately planned and provoked the strike seems clear also from the speed with which they brought to Portland an organized crew of professional strikebreakers.

STRIKEBREAKING VETS HERE

Strike insurance and a pool of strikebreakers are the coordinated one-two punch adopted by antiunion newspaper publishers all over the country. This is the strategy in Westchester County, New York, where the Macy chain of newspapers has embarked on a union-busting campaign.

It is in Westchester County that the activities of the Bloor Schleppey strikebreaking service to publishers has been bared by an investigating committee of the New York State Legislature. Key men in previous Bloor Schleppey strikebreaking operations are now in Portland working for the hybrid Oregonian-Journal.

Strike insurance for the Newhouse chain is just like finding money. Even if Sam Newhouse has to pay out the $12,262.50 premium each year for each of his 14 newspapers, he is money ahead if he provokes a strike at only one of his operations.

Payment for insurance protection against losses over which one has no control is a legitimate procedure. But to be covered against losses over which the publishers themselves do have control is another matter.

LABOR SPURNS SIMILAR PLAN

Can a publisher insure himself against strike losses and then deliberately provoke a strike in order to collect money to finance a union-busting operation? This is clearly not the basis on which insurance policies are normally written.

This is the same as taking out fire insurance on a building and then deliberately setting fire to it in order to collect the insurance.

No wonder the premiums are high. No wonder the money is kept in a bank outside the borders and jurisdiction of the United States of America.

A similar insurance plan was offered to the AFL–CIO to insure members against time lost during strikes. It was turned down flatly.

Nelson Cruikshank, director of the AFL–CIO Department of Social Insurance, termed the plan a violation of the principles of both insurance and unionism.

"You don't insure when the risk is increased by the insurance," Cruikshank said. "A group of workers might have a grievance and the insurance would encourage them to call for a walkout when the problem could be settled peacefully."

"These forms of insurance actually provoke strikes," Cruikshank said.

Portland's newspaper strike is a perfect illustration of the dangers foreseen by the AFL–CIO in refusing to become involved in strike insurance plans.

WHOLE COMMUNITY ENDANGERED

But Samuel Newhouse, owner of the Oregonian, has no such scruples against strike insurance. He is a leader in the group of publishers who have put strike insurance in to effect.

Newspaper unions are alert to the danger of strike insurance. It is a vicious and potent weapon in the effort to drive unions from newspaper plants. Combined with the equally potent professional strikebreaker weapon, it becomes doubly dangerous.

The danger is not only to union members, but to any community where free, collective bargaining for legitimate labor goals has been recognized as an American tradition.

Aroused public opinion against the insurance-financed strikebreaker tactics of the Oregonian and Journal has been the best answer in Portland.

You have one way in which to express your opinion: By canceling your subscription.

OREGONIAN'S ABSENTEE LANDLORD—NEWHOUSE SETS STRIFE PATTERN

To publish Samuel I. Newhouse, it's an old, old story—this strike and lockout at the Portland newspapers.

His record of constant clash with labor speaks for itself.

Examples:

The first strike in the history of the American Newspaper Guild was in 1933 against the Staten Island (N.Y.) Advance—a Newhouse newspaper.

The first strike in the 25-year history of the St. Louis Newspaper Guild was against the Globe-Democrat—a Newhouse newspaper.

And now it's Portland—where the Oregonian has been published since 1950 by the absentee landlord from New York City.

The pattern is clear.

And the pattern of his life is just as clear. Newhouse is a businessman with a sharp eye for the fast buck—bucks which have come fast enough that the value of his vast publishing empire is estimated at from $150 million to $200 million.

The secret of this business success can be spelled out with two words—purchase and consolidation. He buys papers. He consolidates them. And he winds up, when the plan works, with a one-newspaper city—his newspaper.

It happened in Syracuse, N.Y.

It happened in Harrisburg, Pa.

It could happen in Portland.

With his 14 newspapers, Newhouse is America's third largest chain publisher. (And how he hates that word chain.)

Yet in the cities from coast to coast in which he operates, Newhouse is almost unknown.

Only twice since he bought the Oregonian 9 years ago (for $5½ million in cash) has Newhouse visited Portland.

Newhouse is himself no newspaperman. He does no writing. He does not personally direct editorial policies of his vast holdings. He is interested only in making the money that enables him to collect an annual salary of $250,000.

Newhouse is a man of action—action which at times has proved downright amazing. He bought the Oregonian in a telephone conversation. He bought his Syracuse papers in the same way. (He'd never even been in the city, he said.)

He is said to know the financial condition of every major paper in the country. If true, this explains his success in moving so quickly.

Yet once a deal is completed he has shown an astounding lack of interest in his properties—except for the financial reports.

On his first visit to Portland he had to be persuaded even to take a look at the Oregonian plant. He was there 10 minutes, remarked that "it's three times too big," and left.

Newhouse is outspoken in his belief in mergers.

In Editor and Publisher, trade magazine of the newspaper publishing business, he was quoted as saying current tax problems make it advisable for local papers to gain strength by affiliation with other newspapers.

This, of course, spells merger.

And as another magazine, Printers' Ink, pointed out, Newhouse is "always on the prowl for available properties."

Newhouse, 64, was born in New York City, the oldest of eight children of immigrant Russian parents. He passed bar exams but junked a legal career to buy newspapers. When he was 25, he purchased his first one. And it was a classic transaction.

He bought a paper in Fitchburg, Mass., kept it a year and sold it at a 50 percent profit. And for the entire year hardly anyone in Fitchburg even knew what Newhouse looked like.

Newhouse is publicity shy. He gave the first speech of his life last year. It lasted 3 minutes, and he said he'll give no more.

He does not take part in community affairs, confines himself to business ventures.

As Joe Bailey, vice president of the International Typographical Union, put it:

"If he (Newhouse) has done anything constructive for humanity in this country, I have yet to learn of it."

Perhaps, the strangest statement ever made by Newhouse was uttered shortly after he purchased the Oregonian.

"A newspaper," he was quoted by Editor & Publisher, "is more than a press and rolls of print. It must have continuity of tradition and service. Such continuity is best achieved by retaining and aiding the men and women who give the newspaper its character."

This philosophy—"retaining and aiding the men and women who give the newspaper its character"—from an absentee publisher who has been an antagonist of labor in every city in which he has operated.

This philosophy from a publisher whose "men and women" have been supplanted by imported strikebreakers.

NEWHOUSE EMPIRE

These are the 14 newspapers, 9 radio and television stations, and 9 magazines owned or controlled by Samuel I. Newhouse:

The Oregonian, Newark Star-Ledger, St. Louis Globe-Democrat, Syracuse Herald-Journal, Syracuse Herald-American, Syracuse Post-Standard, Staten Island Advance, Long Island Press, Long Island Star-Journal, Harrisburg Patriot, Harrisburg Evening News, Jersey Journal, Birmingham News, and Huntsville (Ala.) Times.

KOIN–TV and KOIN–AM in Portland; WSYR–TV and WSYR–AM and FM in Syracuse; WTPA–TV in Harrisburg, and WAPI–TV, WAPI–AM and FM in Birmingham, Ala.

Vogue, Vogue Pattern Book, British Vogue, French Vogue, House & Garden, British House & Garden, French House & Garden, Glamour, and Bride's magazine.

"CAN WE TRUST THE PAPERS?"—DR. STEINER CALLS FOR FACTS IN THE NEWSPAPER STRIKE

A public without adequate information upon which to render a judgment has a vital stake in the current strike-lockout of Portland's two daily newspapers, Dr. Richard M. Steiner declared in a recent sermon. Dr. Steiner is minister of the First Unitarian Church.

"We are dependent upon rumors and upon the biased statements printed by the party that has control of the main avenue of information," he declared.

He called for the truth and asked: "Can we trust the newspapers to give us the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth?"

Half truths, he noted, "can be as deceptive as outright lies."

Dr. Steiner is himself a former newspaperman, having served as reporter for the Chicago News Bureau and the Cleveland (Ohio) News. He has, in addition, been an instructor of journalism at Washington State College and Bradley College, of Peoria, Ill.

He is an active participant in Portland's civic life, serving as board member of the City Club, of which he is past president, and taking a leading role in such agencies as CARE, the USO council, Council of Social Agencies, the Child Guidance clinic and the Cerebral Palsy and Mental Health associations.

Dr. Steiner said there are two reasons for the public's confusion over the newspaper strike. "In the first place," he said, "they cannot believe that the right is all on one side, and as far as the printed word is concerned, only one side has access to the newspapers and it quite obviously considers itself to be without fault in the present controversy."

He continued:

"When it comes to presenting their case to the public, the newspapers have all the advantage. We are, as a result, surfeited with rumors. Whether these rumors are deliberately incited or not, no one can say. Whether there is any truth in them or not, no one can say. We are told, for example, that the strike is a plot by the Oregonian to take over the Oregon Journal, which has been in financial difficulties. This has been denied, but anyone reading the denial must wonder if the publishers have not left themselves an out when they say 'at this time' they do not contemplate an absorption of the Oregon Journal into the Newhouse chain.

"We have heard that the issue is 'featherbedding,' that the union refuses to settle the issue as to how many men shall work on a machine for stereotyping that the Oregonian says it is going to purchase. I have heard it reported on one hand that the union is willing to arbitrate the number of men on the machine when, as, and if it is delivered. I have heard that the machine is not actually in existence, that one was made in Germany, imported to Montreal, Canada, and there it developed so many defects it had to be returned for redesign, that no one knows whether the new machine will prove effective or not.

"If this is the issue that is holding up the settlement of the strike, if the Journal is not interested in this machine, how does it happen that the Journal lends itself to this issue? This is a fair question, I think, and one which ought to be answered, but how are we to find the answer? How are we to get it?

"Featherbedding is a real problem and will become more acute as automation increases. Its solution does not lie in strikes or lockouts, but in statesmanship.

"I have heard it rumored that the Oregonian does not want to settle the strike until its insurance strike benefits run out, by which time it hopes to have brought the Journal and the unions to their knees. The benefits, by the way, make it possible, I am told, to pay strikebreakers $200 a week. Is it true?

"The newspapers must be cognizant of these rumors, but they have not affirmed or denied them.

"I have heard it rumored that the Oregonian and the Journal are out to 'bust the unions,' that they are insisting upon an 'open shop' from reporters to pressmen. If these rumors are true (and I do not say they are true because I do not know) they ought to be matters of public concern.

"With the consolidation of newspapers that is taking place all over the country—and the Newhouse interests are playing a major part in these consolidations—the labor market for those whose only skills are in newspaper work is being diminished. Thus in an open shop, the wage scale is apt to be depressed for there are an increasing number of applicants for every job, and the law of supply and demand, when not protected by unionism, works just as well in the labor market as it does in the marts of trade.

"Indeed, one of the tragic consequences of the present controversy is the job uncertainty of the men and women who have dedicated their lives to the profession of journalism and who have given to the city of Portland high examples of professional competency as reporters, some of them winning national awards for their work.

"Indeed, the Pulitzer prize, which the Oregonian boasts of, was won for them by Guild members who are now uncertain as to the future of their jobs."

Dr. Steiner noted the publishers' charge that by respecting the picket lines and staying off their jobs, members of the Newspaper Guild and the craft unions have broken their contracts. "This may be true," he said, "but, if it is true, the newspapers have recourse to the courts under the Taft-Hartley law for damages. So far, I have heard of no threat of such suit.

"Surely the newspaper publishers are not so naive as to believe that those who owe so much to their unions would cross a picket line. The union movement is based on solidarity. If unions don't hang together, they shall surely hang separately—to quote a much honored and revered Revolutionary leader."

In conclusion Dr. Steiner declared that the responsibility both of the unions and of the publishers in the present controversy is of concern to the public "and we ought to make known our concern to those who have accepted the responsibility to keep us informed."

OREGON COUNCIL OF CHURCHES,
December 16, 1959.

GOV. MARK HATFIELD,
Salem, Oreg.

DEAR GOVERNOR HATFIELD: We were delighted to read of your offer to union and management to aid in settling the tragic dispute involving our two Portland newspapers, but regretted to learn of management's decision to reject your proffered help on the grounds that nothing could be accomplished. However, we fervently hope you will not let the matter rest with this initial failure.

Many ministers and laymen, not only in the greater Portland area but throughout the State, are tremendously concerned about this economic cold war which gives indication of erupting into violence. We have in our congregations families that are in economic distress at the Christmas season because of the strike, and others in the ranks of management who are greatly involved in the tension and strife.

More is involved in the strike than human need, economic issues, and strife. The fate of a community newspaper may very well be at stake. We do not feel that the press can rightly assume the strike is their private business. Newspapers are more than private enterprise; they are a public trust. Their policies and destinies are a community concern.

I am confident that the many ministers and church leaders with whom I have talked, and others whose attitude I can surmise, join with me in urging you to make continued efforts in urging management and labor to sit down with you and a factfinding group. I do not feel that public opinion will allow the newspapers to reject indefinitely your offer of assistance.

Just as the importunate widow was finally heard by the judge because of her persistence, so we are confident you will be heeded by the Portland newspapers if you continue to insist that there should be an honest attempt at settlement through your high office.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD GLEN BROWN,
President, Oregon Council of Churches,
Minister, First Christian Church of Portland.

[From the Guild Reporter, Washington, D.C., Jan. 8, 1960]

PORTLAND STRIKE

The Portland, Oreg., strike holds more significance than appears from casual inspection.

From all obtainable evidence, the Portland work stoppage serves as a pattern which, if it succeeds, could lead to its adoption elsewhere in the newspaper industry, to the complete destruction of union-won safeguards in pay and working conditions.

First, the Portland strike was planned and provoked by management, more specifically the management of the Oregonian, which dominates the Portland scene over its normal rival, the Journal.

There is no doubt of this fact. Last summer, before any Portland union had even planned an approach to collective bargaining in the fall, strikebreakers then at work in Reno were aware that they would be needed in Oregon later in the year.

And the negotiations, when they opened with the stereotypers' spokesmen, were farcical. Management introduced a trumped-up issue, increased its own demands as the union tried to make concessions.

Second, the massive retaliation familiar to guildsmen in Cleveland, Detroit, Boston, and New York takes shape in Portland, too. The Journal has made common cause with its business competitor, the Oregonian. Journal executives moved into the Oregonian plant to make it possible to get out a hybrid daily.

Third, the Oregonian carries strike insurance, beyond question, since its owners, the Newhouse interests, have strong representation in the insurance plan set up by the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

And lastly, the Newhouse management, absentee owners in Portland as in many other places across the country, is notoriously cash-register-oriented and oblivious to community interests, if they interfere with the moneymaking operation of its dailies.

There is increasing belief in Portland that the Journal, home-owned, has been taken captive by the larger, stronger and chain-newspaper-backed Oregonian. There have even been flat predictions that the Journal's days are numbered, and that the Newhouse plan is to emerge on top in Portland, making it a one-newspaper city.

Fortunately for the unions affected, there had been complete awareness from the time negotiations broke down, that this was no "ordinary" one-union strike. Other unions were quick to come to the aid of the stereotypers and presently there is a well-coordinated council of unions directing the overall strategy of the situation.

Fortunately, too, radio and television stations in Portland not under the censoring thumb of the struck dailies have been spreading the facts.

The year-end issue of Oregon Labor Press, edited by Portland Guildsman James W. Goodsell with the help of an augmented staff of strikers, ran off enough copies so that it could be distributed to almost every home in the Portland area where the dailies circulate.

Its message, "the other side of the strike story," has already brought encouraging support, and more importantly, a wider realization of the potentials in the ruthless, ominous drama being enacted behind the picketed entrances of the Oregonian plant.

The picture is a gruesome one. Given strike insurance and the willingness to import a loathsome crew of strikebreakers, there is also the possibility of the extinction of Portland's home-owned newspaper. In its place, readers would have a daily single-mindedly devoted to making money for its east-coast owner, who is a financial operator, not a publisher. It's an ugly situation, dangerous to the public welfare, to the industry and to its unions.

PORTLAND OPEN SHOP BID SPURS SUMMIT SESSION

PORTLAND, OREG.—Faced with a clear attempt by major unionized newspapers to establish plantwise open shops, international leaders of all unions involved in the Portland stereotypers' walkout converged here this week for a conference on strike strategy and coordination.

ANG President Arthur Rosenstock and Director of Organization J. William Blatz were here to represent the guild at the meeting, which began Wednesday, January 6. Also on hand were officials of the Stereotypers, the International Typographical Union, the Pressmen, the Photoengravers, and the Teamsters.

The meeting resulted from an invitation to the union leaders extended by Harold D. Bamberg, chairman of the Portland Newspaper Unions' Interim Committee, to "observe personally this fantastic union-busting operation."

Last weekend, ANG Secretary-Treasurer Charles A. Perlik, Jr., conferred with local guild officers and addressed a membership meeting Sunday night. International Representative Loel Schrader has been assigned to join International Representative Charles Dale in working with the local.

As the 10th week of the strike against the Oregon Journal and S. I. Newhouse's Oregonian drew to a close, there were these other developments:

The Legislative Interim Committee on Labor-Management Relations scheduled a public hearing at the State capital, Salem, January 9, on the impact of professional strikebreakers on free collective bargaining.

Public support swelled for a third, independent daily newspaper proposed as a community-owned enterprise.

Gov. Mark Hatfield for the second time declined to appoint a factfinding committee to intervene in the strike. As long as the managements of the two dailies refuse to cooperate with such a committee, he said, its appointment would be "fruitless."

Web pressmen, by a vote of 108 to 1, and paperhandlers, by a vote of 22 to 0, officially joined the stereotypers as strikers, January 2, and charged the companies before the National Labor Relations Board with bad faith in their refusal to bargain on a renewal of the unions' contracts, which expired December 31.

The stereotypers, who struck on November 10, also filed charges with the NLRB that the Oregonian and the Journal had refused to bargain in good faith.

A guild member became the object of telephoned and personal threats after four imported strikebreakers were beaten up in a barroom brawl with strangers.

The Oregournal—the hybrid daily being produced by scabs under the flags of both the Oregonian and the Journal—continued its throwaway circulation policy against a rising flood of cancellations.

The top-level conference of union officials this week underscored the seriousness with which they regard the Portland situation. The belief is growing among unionists that the Oregonian and Journal have launched their union-busting adventure as a pilot operation. Should the two papers succeed in ousting the unions with the use of strikebreakers, publishers in other large cities could be expected to try it, too, spreading industrial warfare throughout the industry.

Management tactics at the bargaining table before the walkout were enough to convince Portland union members that the strike was deliberately provoked.

The companies insisted that the stereotypers' workweek be increased from 35 hours to 37½ hours, at no increase in pay. In the first bargaining session after the strike started, the publishers called for a further increase in the workweek to 40 hours at no increase in pay. Since the strike the papers also have demanded elimination of the union-security clause from the stereos' contract. Management also has taken the position that long-standing policies on substitutions and union membership of foremen must be stricken from the pact.

One of the key issues in the dispute is the insistence of the Oregonian that the stereotypers agree in advance to one man operation of a new, untried German casting machine the paper says it plans to buy. The union replies that this would be buying a "pig in a poke," that the machine is not in operation anywhere in the country and there is no way yet to determine how many men its operation will require. In its only installation so far on this continent—in Montreal—the machine developed serious "bugs" which raise questions of safety no matter how many men are operating it, the union points out.

These bargaining tactics of management and its reliance on strike insurance to recruit professional strikebreakers are the basis of the stereotypers' unfair practice charges filed with the NLRB.

The pressmen's charges against the two papers cite management's repeated refusal even to meet with the union to discuss renewal of its contract. On December 30, the day before the pressmen's contract expired, the papers notified the union that its members no longer were employees. At the same time, the publishers mailed checks to individual pressmen covering accrued vacation pay.

All unions at the Oregonian and the Journal plan to present evidence and witnesses at the Legislative Interim Committee's hearing on strikebreaking. Representatives of the two newspapers also have been invited to appear.

The committee will consider the importation of strikebreakers in relation to the overall labor-management scene in the State and will not delve into the issues which provoked the Portland strike. It was the current strike, however, which prompted the call for the hearing.

The call was by a unanimous vote of the committee's members, who represent both houses of the State legislature.

Petitions signed by hundreds of unionists idled in the strike were presented to Governor Hatfield Tuesday, January 5, calling for an inquiry by a fact-finding body. The petitions were presented by a group which included Mrs. Frances Blakely of the Guild. The Governor accepted the petitions but pointed out fact-finding was impossible without the cooperation of management as well as the unions. Earlier in the dispute, fact-finding proposals of the Governor and U.S. Senator RICHARD NEUBERGER were spurned by the publishers. The unions had welcomed the offers.

The idea for another daily paper—tentatively designated the Portland Daily News—grew out of the fear that merger with or acquisition of the Journal is one of the goals of Newhouse's Oregonian.

When the strike bagn, a Journal executive remarked: "This strike situation means the windup of the Journal and the windup of me. The Oregonian is going to take us over when this strike is done."

At least one Journal circulation representative in central Oregon has urged subscribers who have canceled to take the paper again "because this strike is a secret plot by Newhouse and the unions to take over the Journal."

After repeated denials by Journal officials that it was for sale to anyone, a committee was formed to explore the possibility of another, independent daily.

A luncheon meeting of Portland union representatives unanimously voted to support "a profesionally managed and operated newspaper, independent in news coverage." They had heard from James T. Marr, executive secretary of the State AFL-CIO, that facilities already have been located for printing a new paper.

A coupon in the weekly Oregon Labor Press, intended to poll readers regarding their interest in another daily, brought such a response that four women were retained to handle the returns. Two television stations covered the scene in the Labor Press office as mail sacks were opened and thousands of coupons counted.

Although the poll did not solicit funds for the proposed Daily News, hundreds of $1 and $5 bills and numerous checks were enclosed with the coupon returns.

The outbreak of violence in the strike, and the subsequent threats against the person of a guild photographer, were attributed to the scabs themselves by Guild President Bob Shults.

Shults told the membership meeting Sunday night that local officers had spent 4 days running down information about the brawl in the bar of the Hungerford Hotel in which the four strikebreakers were beaten.

"We are convinced that the photographer had absolutely no connection with the incident," said Shults, "and further that no unionist was involved. We are deeply suspicious that the whole thing was staged by the scabs themselves to create an excuse either to leave town now that the strike insurance is running out or to move out of the hotel and across the street into the newspaper plant where their every whim would be satisfied by management."

The guild photographer, who formerly had lived in the Hungerford before it was taken over by the strikebreakers, had dropped in for a New Year's drink with the bartender, a personal friend. About 15 minutes after he left, a fight started between four of the scabs and four strangers. During the fracas, a chair was hurled through a huge plate glass window in the lobby of the hotel and the bar was nearly demolished. One of the scabs reportedly was hospitalized overnight.

The holiday season had at least one bright spot for guild members. Some 200 members and their spouses were entertained at a guild party, December 29, in the press club. Use of the club's facilities was donated, as were all drinks and food. Additional cash contributions actually gave the local a net of $21.20, Shults reported. Running the party were several ex-members of the local, headed by former president Bob Swan, who is now in public relations.

[From the AFL-CIO News, Washington, D.C., Jan. 9, 1960]

PORTLAND PAPERS OUT TO CRUSH UNIONS—STRIKEBREAKERS PAID UP TO $300 WEEKLY

PORTLAND, OREG.—The 2-month-old strike of the stereotypers against Portland's daily newspapers, focusing national attention in the newspaper industry on the showdown struggle here, is forcing unions in the field to consider major new tactics.

As the strike drags on, it has become more apparent that managements of the Oregonian and the Oregon Journal aim at nothing less than crushing all the newspaper unions involved in the dispute.

The stereotypers struck November 10 after failing to make any headway in negotiating a new contract. Their old agreement with the two papers expired September 15. The publishers refused to discuss wages or any other contract matters unless the union agreed first to three demands:

That a German-built automated metal plate-casting machine, which the Oregonian says it proposed to buy, be operated by one man. Present equipment is operated by four men. The German machine is untested in this country and has not even been seen by the stereotypers.

That foremen not be required to belong to the union. They have been in all past contracts. Foremen work alongside other men, perform the same duties.

That the union give up its right to provide substitutes.

All other unions in the two plants—printers, pressman, engravers, mailers, paperhandlers and Newspaper Guild of reporters, editors and photographers—observed the picket lines. But the publishers imported strikebreakers, chiefly from the South, and began immediately to publish a joint product in the Oregonian plant. Some of the imports have been identified as veterans of such strikebreaking operations as Lima, Ohio, Haverhill, Mass., Miami, Fla., Reno, Nev., and Oklahoma City.

The job pirates receive premium pay—up to more than $300 weekly—and are quartered at the publishers' expense in a nearby hotel. Management also picks up food and bar tabs.

Husband and wife teams are frequent among the strikebreakers. The women operate teletypesetter machines, on which news copy is translated into perforated tape, which in turn is fed through automated linotype machines. The publishers were caught early in the strike working some of the women 12 hours a day, 72 hours a week, in flagrant violation of State law which fixes a maximum 44-hour week for women.

A public hearing on importation of strikebreakers and its impact on labor-management relations in Oregon was scheduled for January 9 by an interim committee of the State legislature.

LAVISH OUTLAYS

Lavish outlays for recruiting and paying strikebreakers and setting up a training school for new ones at the Journal plant are made possible by payments from a publishers' strike insurance plan.

Each management can collect up to $10,000 daily over a 50-day period for a combined total of $1 million.

The stereotypers have offered compromises on each of the three management demands—compromises which formed the basis of peaceful settlement of the same issues at Detroit. But the publishers have refused to consider them and instead have come up with five new demands:

An open shop.

Re-examination of manning agreements on all other stereotyping equipment.

A 5-hour increase in the workweek at no increase in pay.

Priority and seniority for strikebreakers.

A no-strike clause.

Gov. Mark O. Hatfield, Republican, successful last year in mediating other labor disputes, offered his services but the publishers refused them. Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, Democrat, proposed a citizens' factfinding panel to study the strike and drew a similar curt rejection from the publishers. The unions had welcomed both proposals.

Unfair labor practice charges have been filed by the stereotypers on the basis of use of strike insurance funds to import and train strikebreakers, and by the web pressmen based on the publishers' refusal to bargain in good faith.

The pressmen's contract expired December 31. Four days earlier, management notified the local its members were no longer employees. With expiration of the contracts, the pressmen and the affiliated paper handlers voted to strike and joined other crafts on the picket line.

NEW PAPER POSSIBLE

To get their story before the public, the unions have turned to radio, TV, and handbills. A special edition of 300,000 copies of the Oregon Labor Press, devoted entirely to the strike, was mailed out to all residents in the Portland area. Now Portland's labor movement is taking steps to start a third daily newspaper in the city. Business agents and secretaries of unions in the area have voted support for such a paper, to be financed by sale of stock.

International officers of newspaper unions will hold a summit meeting in Portland this month to discuss financing for the venture.

A committee of newspaper union representatives is preparing cost estimates, locating publishing facilities, and determining staff requirements for the proposed new paper, tentatively named the Portland Daily News.

Union members have launched a house-to-house canvass to measure public interest in such a paper and to press, at the same time, a campaign to persuade those still taking the combined Oregonian-Journal to cancel their subscriptions. Cancellations already are estimated to have reached 100,000.

[From the Oregon Labor Press, Jan. 15, 1960]

STRIKEBREAKER'S WITNESS IDENTIFIES PROFESSIONALS HERE

Professional strikebreakers now working at the Oregonian-Journal have swarmed into struck newspaper plants across the country—sent by a central strikebreaking agency.

So testified Gerald E. Gish, who as recently as 2 years ago worked shoulder to shoulder, breaking strikes, with many of the persons now employed behind picket lines at the Oregonian.

His testimony came before the State legislative interim committee on labor-management relations which met in Salem Saturday to explore possible legislation against the importing or use of professional strikebreakers.

Some 300 spectators, including four busloads of workers idled by the Portland newspaper strike, crowded the hearing room.

The implication of Gish's testimony was vehemently denied by the three Portland attorneys who appeared for the Oregonian and Oregon Journal. They argued to the committee that legislation against importing nonunion employees during a strike would discriminate against businesses requiring technically skilled employees.

Gish, now a union printer at the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, said he was affiliated with an organization known as the Schleppey-Klein strikebreaking agency from 1955 to 1957 and worked at a number of struck newspaper plants in various parts of the country.

He told of receiving premium pay, transportation and living expenses and even of being paid $110 a week for doing nothing while on standby duty for a month before a strike in Westchester County, N.Y.

"The highest I ever got was $627 for 1 week in the Zanesville, Ohio, strike," he told the committee.

A dramatic point in the hearing came when State Representative Edward J. Whelan, Portland, held up five snapshots of strikebreakers, taken on the Portland picket lines.

Gish identified the pictures and then picked out the names of 10 other strikebreakers—now at the Oregonian-Journal—with whom he had worked in other strikes.

The first of three attorneys appearing for management was William Lubersky, who said he represented the Oregonian and Associated Oregon Industries. He rejected the contention that the Portland papers had dealt with Schleppey-Klein or any other strikebreaking agency.

"I am emphatically denying," he said, "any collusion between the publishers. There were no employees on standby. Management did not want a strike."

Under questioning by committee members, Lubersky admitted that probably there had been advance planning. He said: "An employer who is threatened with a strike has every right to start laying plans to operate."

He said he guesses that the newspapers paid transportation and living expenses to the imported workers "who came in to help us out in an emergency."

At the end of the hearing, State Senator Harry Boivin of Klamath Falls, committee chairman, and State Senator Walter Pearson of Portland said several suggestions had been made and information collected which might lead to legislation.

Labor's presentation was led by George Brown, political education director of the Oregon AFL–CIO. He told the committee that the importation of professional strikebreakers is "a departure from normal, peaceful, intelligent collective bargaining and is not in the best interests of the citizens of this State."

Brown continued: "Acceptance of the use of professional strikebreakers will mean a return to the law of the jungle."

Appearing during labor's presentation was Dr. Richard Steiner, minister of the First Unitarian Church of Portland. He said he was not speaking for labor or management but as a member of the public.

Management, he argued, has a big advantage "because it can propagandize the public without hindrance. This is an advantage that is unfair. It is enhanced by the use of professional strikebreakers."

The committee can help overcome the unfair advantage by recommending legislation against strikebreakers, whose presence prolongs the strike, Dr. Steiner concluded.

In his testimony he told of a phone call from a woman who wanted advice. She had been asked, she told him, to get a strikebreaker into a compromising position—without doing anything actually immoral. Would he sanction this?

Dr. Steiner postulated several explanations for the call to the committee. In one he suggested the call might have been a "plant" from management of the newspapers or their sympathizers, designed to discredit or embarrass him.

The fourth union spokesman at the hearing was Rene Valentine, International representative of the Typographical Union, who traced the history of strikebreaking agencies and reviewed investigations into such activities in other States.

Gish detailed his own history as a strikebreaker, dating from a loan he received while still a student in Oklahoma.

His strikebreaking career started in Oklahoma City and then went to Zanesville, Ohio. Other strikes took him to Grand Junction, Colo.; Levittown, Pa., and Westchester County, N.Y.

LAWYERS OBJECT

Management's presentation, consisting largely of rebuttal, was begun by Lubersky who contended that labor's case was "both hypocritical and sanctimonious."

The sole purpose of labor's testimony, he said, "is to have another forum in the propaganda battle."

This point was later echoed by Portland attorney Verne Newcomb, who rapped labor for not bringing specific legislative proposals to the committee meeting. He was cut short, however by Senator Pearson, who pointed out that the committee's purpose was not to hear proposed laws but only to explore the need for legislation.

Both Lubersky and Newcomb argued that management had the right to continue to operate and that since technically skilled nonunion newspaper workers are not available in Oregon, it would be discriminatory to legislate against the importing of workers during a strike.

Replying to this, Richard Carney, Portland labor attorney, argued that the objectionable aspect of the strikebreakers was not their importation but their professionalism.

These workers, he said, do not have regular jobs or homes, but make their living touring the country from strike to strike. The existence of such a pool of strikebreaking workers is the evil, Carney said, since it is a deterrent to good-faith bargaining on management's part.

Management lawyers had claimed that only the Federal Government could properly enact legislation dealing with imported strikebreakers. Carney contended that a State law would be both practicable and proper

In addition to Chairman Boivin, Senator Pearson and Representaive Whelan, committee members attending the hearing were Senator Robert F. White of Salem, Representatives Robert Duncan, Medford, and William J. Gallagher, Portland; Dr. Richard H. Jones of Reed College, public member; Carl J. Gilson of Portland, labor member, and Hillman Lueddemann, Portland, management member.

MAYOR GETS UNION APPEAL—SCHRUNK IS ASKED TO SETTLE STRIKE

An earnest appeal for help, signed by about 80 union officers and members, was sent this week to Mayor Terry Schrunk.

The letter asked Schrunk to move with dispatch in an effort to settle the current strike against Portland's two daily newspapers.

Last month Schrunk invited both George Meany, president of the AFL–CIO, and Secretary of Labor James P. Mitchell to hold a proposed top level labor-management conference in Portland. The major noted the need for "an improvement of attitudes being displayed at the collective bargaining table."

The union members' appeal to Schrunk said:

"In your recent letters to AFL–CIO President George Meany and Secretary of Labor James Mitchell, you called special attention to this area as being free from the frictions and pressures which might exist in other areas. These cancerous frictions are now rampant in this area. This is a condition that the city of Portland cannot afford."

The letter pointed out that the newspaper strike-lockout is farther from settlement now than it was when the strike began November 10.

"Offers of aid by the Governor have been brushed aside by the publishers. Federal mediation is ineffectual. The publishers seem adamant in their joint effort to disrupt the harmonious union-management relationship traditional in the City of Roses," it said.

"We ask you as chief executive of the city where this deplorable condition exists to move with dispatch in an effort to settle this dispute, which has become a conflict for the control of men's minds," the letter concluded.

LEADERS MEET IN PORTLAND—UNIONS PLEDGE FULL STRIKE AID

Publishers of Portland's struck newspapers have forced "the most significant and far-reaching team effort by national newspaper unions in the history of the American newspaper industry."

So said a statement released this week following a two-day summit conference of leaders of international unions whose locals are involved in the present 10-week-old Portland strike.

The officials gathered here at the request of heads of the locals.

The nine visiting officials, after the first day of meeting, described Portland as a "national battleground," and said they were shocked by the "obstinacy and bad faith" of management's stand.

Among those who met with local officers were Arthur Rosenstock, president of the American Newspaper Guild; Walter J. Turner, national vice president of the Pressmen's Union, and Leo Feeney, national vice president of the Stereotypers.

The text of their final statement follows:

We are united on a negotiating program with the publishers of Portland's strike-bound newspapers. The decision for common action by all newspaper unions was forced upon us by the blatant union-busting techniques employed by the publishers.

The international unions cannot afford and do not intend to permit their local unions to be destroyed by a giant newspaper chain and its Portland satellite. The labor movement of Portland and the entire State of Oregon cannot afford to permit this return to labor's dark ages.

Since the strike began on November 10, management has consistently raised its demands on the unions instead of seeking a peaceful and honorable solution at the bargaining table or through mediation efforts of Governor Hatfield or a fact-finding committee.

Chief of these new and outrageous demands is a management proposal that the stereotypers take a 12½ percent hourly pay cut despite the constantly increasing cost of living.

The publishers have chosen to make this an all-out fight. We must meet their challenge. We pledge the utmost support of the international unions to assure that this union-busting venture by the publishers is not successful.

Contracts of all of the mechanical craft unions have now expired. We reaffirm our decision that no union will return to work at the two newspapers until settlements are reached with all of the unions with expired contracts. Striking employees will return to work without fear of reprisal or discrimination. The unions agree that all contracts must have a common expiration date. All contracts must contain a clause allowing all unions to respect picket lines at the newspaper plants.

The publishers are publicly tied in a common front against unions, and have consistently rejected all union offers to negotiate separate contracts with the Oregon Journal and the Oregonian. This stone wall of publisher opposition has today created the most significant and far-reaching team effort by international newspaper unions in the history of the American newspaper industry.

MRS. KEEVER CONFESSES FALSE STORY

Mrs. James Keever, who has made a number of police reports about threats and violence because her husband is working behind the Oregonian picket line, this week was arrested, jailed, and convicted for making a false police report.

She confessed to police that she made up the story she told them early Sunday morning about being kidnapped for 7 hours by two men who threatened her because her husband, an Oregonian advertising salesman normally, was working as a pressman in the struck plant.

The conviction came Wednesday in the municipal court of Judge J. J. Labadie, who fined her $25.

The Keevers won front-page banner-headline treatment in the Oregonian-Journal last week when a window in their home at 6607 Southeast Duke Street was broken by a rock.

Mrs. Keever, 26, told police she made up the kidnapping story in the hope her husband would not find out she had really been out with a male acquaintance.

The incident began when her husband filed a missing persons report with police Friday evening. At 12:15 a.m., Mrs. Keever called him from an eastside cocktail bar and told the kidnapping story.

She repeated it to police later but when they pointed out inconsistencies, she confessed the story was false and admitted having gone to a basketball game with the male friend.

PORTLAND DAILY NEWS—SUPPORT IS STRONG FOR THIRD NEWSPAPER

Prospects for a third Portland newspaper continued to brighten this week on two fronts.

Union business representatives, at their weekly luncheon meeting Tuesday, heard detailed legal reports on the incorporation of the third paper, tentatively named the Portland Daily News.

As projected, it would be launched with union support but would have an independent editorial staff and policy and would be financed through broad public stock sale and support.

A demonstration of that support, termed "amazing" by State AFL–CIO Secretary-Treasurer James Marr, came in response to a coupon printed in the Oregon Labor Press 2 weeks ago.

Officeworkers were still processing returned coupons this week, although the pace dropped off from the first week when four volunteer workers were called in to handle the flood of mail.

But by press time, 2,509 coupons, many of them containing unsolicited contributions, had been mailed in.

This response came from a press run of 32,500. In other words, 7½ percent of all Labor Press readers took the trouble to fill out and clip the coupon, address an envelope and mail it with 4 cents postage.

The original outline for the paper was to start with 100,000 24-page papers, but later information reported to the union representatives Tuesday indicated that either the press run or the maximum number of pages can now be doubled—100,000 48-page papers or 200,000 24-page papers.

OREGONIAN-JOURNAL KNOWS ITS ARGUMENT IS FALSE

The hybrid Oregonian-Journal has a crafty disregard for facts. Nowhere is this better shown than in its recent editorial complaint that the longtime Portlanders who belong to unions at the two newspapers refused to go through the stereotypers' picket line.

Of course they refused to go through. What else did the publishers expect when they forced the stereotypers out on the street?

Union men have been respecting picket lines for 100 years and more. Yet the hybrid newspaper pretends that this is a new and dastardly thing.

Further, the Oregonian-Journal cynically argued in a front-page editorial that the unions were violating their contracts in refusing to cross the picket line. As if a union contract were a slave labor agreement, binding a man to work no matter what changes may occur in the conditions of his employment.

The Oregonian-Journal singled out the Newspaper Guild, arguing that the Guild was morally and legally bound by contract to go to work across the picket line.

That is utter nonsense. And the Oregonian-Journal's highly paid battery of legal experts knows it. They are lying in their teeth when they say the Guild broke a contract or took any step that was not the legal and moral right of the Guild.

The labor laws of this land guarantee the reporters, photographers, artists, and editors of the Guild the right to refuse to cross a picket line at their employer's plant.

The cynical staff of the Oregournal is merely trying to confuse the public in arguing that it is illegal or immoral for a union to refuse to cross a picket line.

Just think back to 1949 when the Pressmen's Union went on strike. By the publishers' cynical theory of 1959–60, the other unions should have come to work. Well, in 1949 some tried to. And what happened? The publishers shut down their plants, locked out the employees and refused to pay their wages. All that, despite labor contracts with the same unions as today.

Were the publishers then guilty of violating the contracts? By their 1959–60 reasoning they were. But the fact is—and the publishers know it—that was not the case.

Only a few weeks ago the hybrid newspaper published on its front page a story from New York, reporting a court decision on this matter. It said publishers need not pay employees when the publishers decide to shut down their plants in a strike.

The conclusion is obvious. If a labor contract does not bind the employer to pay his employees during a labor dispute, then that contract does not bind employees to work during a labor dispute. The National Labor Relations Act clearly recognizes this fact.

So let's have an end to the Oregonian-Journal's preaching about the sanctity of contracts that do not apply.

It is a phony, dishonest argument.

ONLY ONE SIDE CAN PROFIT FROM ACTS OF VIOLENCE

Last Sunday the combined Oregonian-Journal published another in its series of front-page editorials on the newspaper strike. This one, titled "Fact for Today," accused the unions of fostering violence.

This calls for a reply.

We ask you to consider four facts:

1. No responsible union leader condones the use of violence as a strike tactic.

2. Every decent union member regrets any outbreak of violence, whether the act was incited by union members or by strikebreakers.

3. The Portland newspaper strike, throughout its 9 weeks' duration, has been remarkably free of violent acts. Yes, there have been a few—but remarkably few, considering the tensions of the strike and the provocation supplied by the publishers and their imported strikebreakers.

4. It is the publishers—not the unions—who profit from any incident of violence that can be blamed on unionmen or on "persons unknown." They can play it up on their front page and they can write front-page editorials about it afterward.

There have been many indications that the Oregonian-Journal publishers actually have been hoping for "rough stuff" as grist for their propaganda mill.

The unions' position on the question of strike violence is quite simple. We believe it is (a) wrong and (b) stupid.

[From the AFL–CIO News, Washington, D.C., Jan. 16, 1960]

UNITED FRONT FORMALIZED—NEWSPAPER UNIONS IN PORTLAND PLEDGE PACTS FOR ALL OR NONE

PORTLAND, OREG.—Representatives of international unions whose locals have been battling savage union-busting tactics of the Oregon Journal and the Oregonian have agreed that "no union will return to work until settlements are reached with all of the unions."

Officers and international representatives of the stereotypers, newspaper guild, pressmen, Typographical Union, photo engravers and the unaffiliated Teamsters declared they "do not intend to permit local unions to be destroyed by a giant newspaper chain and its Portland satellite."

The Oregonian is owned by Samuel I. Newhouse of New York, whose empire includes 14 newspapers, 9 magazines and 9 radio and TV stations. The Oregonian has been publishing a joint paper with the Oregon Journal, using imported strikebreakers.

Union members employed by the two papers have been respecting the picket lines of the stereotypers, who struck November 10 after rejecting management proposals to seriously weaken their contract. Meanwhile contracts of the other mechanical unions have expired.

The statement by the union representatives declared:

"Striking employees will return to work without fear of reprisal or discrimination. The unions agree that all contracts must have a common expiration date. All contracts must contain a clause allowing all unions to respect picket lines at the newspaper plants."

The joint newspaper dismissed the unions' statement as "negotiation by ultimatum."

Meanwhile, the imported-strikebreakers issue was aired at a public hearing of the State legislature's interim committee on labor-management relations.

UNIONISTS AROUSED

More than 200 newspaper union members packed the committee hearing room in the State capitol at Salem, 50 icy miles away, to hear labor offer evidence and argue the need for remedial legislation.

George Brown, director of political education for the Oregon AFL–CIO warned that if "this precedent is allowed to continue and is accepted as common practice in labor-management relations, it can spread to every industry in the State."

"There seems to be evidence that strikebreakers were in Portland on a standby basis even before the strike was called," he said.

A witness was Gerald E. Gish, of Cleveland, a Typographical Union member employed on the Cleveland (Ohio) Plain Dealer, who testified he had once been a professional strikebreaker, connected with the Bloor Schleppey and Shirley Klein newspaper strikebreaking organizations.

Gish outlined his career in 1955-57 from his recruitment by Oklahoma City publishers 2 months before a strike there until he broke with the Klein group and helped the ITU organize strikebreakers at Glen Cove, Long Island, N.Y.

STRIKES PROVOKED?

In an hour-long appearance before the committee, Gish testified:

Strikebreakers usually draw premium wages and extensive overtime, plus eating allowances and hotel bills. Transportation is usually paid as well. Gish's top weekly check was $675 at Zanesville, Ohio.

Strikebreakers know in advance where strikes will occur, and he was among strikebreakers brought into Westchester County, N.Y., and kept on a standby basis before an ITU strike against the Macy chain of papers there. When for a time it appeared the ITU would not strike there, Gish quoted Shirley Klein as saying, "We'll have to provoke it."

Strikebreaking organizations know in advance the plant layouts at the newspapers which will call on their services, and assignments of key strikebreakers are predetermined.

Gish identified names or pictures of at least 15 strikebreakers now on the Portland scene as people he had known in other similar operations. His experience as a strikebreaker included work in Oklahoma City, Zanesville, Ohio, Grand Junction, Colo., Levitttown, Pa., and Westchester County, N.Y.

The publishers were represented at the hearing by two attorneys, who contended State legislation on the subject would be unconstitutional because it would be discriminatory against certain industries and because the Federal Government had preempted the field.

Management also denied that strikebreakers had been brought in on a standby basis, that publishers had used the services of the Schleppey-Klein organization or any such group and that premium wages were paid the strikebreakers.

On another front, James T. Marr, executive-secretary of the Oregon AFL–CIO, reported articles of incorporation have been drawn up for a third daily newspaper for Portland. Preliminary work has been launched, he said, on details of a stock sale campaign by which the publication, tentatively named the Portland Daily News, will be financed.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief comment on the matter of strike insurance. It may seem plausible and reasonable to suggest that a newspaper take out strike insurance to cover a certain period. However, we ought to consider the public policy involved. When we do so, then I think we shall have a better idea as to why the State of New York frowns upon that kind of a policy.

Mr. President, this kind of an insurance policy is designed to help stir up labor strife, or will have that result, because if an employer has strike insurance for 4 or 6 or 8 weeks, he thinks that by playing tough he can destroy the union in 4 or 6 or 8 weeks. And so a basic question of public policy is involved.

It does not follow that any insurance policy ought to be recognized as a policy that will have standing within the law if the purpose of that policy is to endanger free collective bargaining in our country. And so what the Newhouse empire has done is to go up to Canada and enter into an insurance policy arrangement which it thinks will insure it, or at least protect it or strengthen it, in case it gets into a "strike busting" controversy with the union, such as it has gotten into in Portland, Oreg.

So, Mr. President, I would have the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare conduct a very thorough investigation with regard to the antilabor tactics being used by some newspaper publishers in this country, because, if I am correctly informed—and I am asking for an investigation to find out what the facts are—there has developed a combination of newspaper publishers in this country acting in concert in connection with this particular union-busting tactic.

Then I think there is a need for investigation on the part of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the practices, ascertaining to what extent the practices exist, of certain union-busting newspaper publishers who are working out a systematic arrangement with a business concern that contracts to assure and guarantee them that it will provide them with the necessary strikebreakers in case they get themselves involved in a strike with any of the newspaper unions in this country. That matter ought to be looked into.

Mr. President, there are other facets of antiunion activities on the part of newspaper publishers being raised in the Portland, Oreg., case which, in my judgment, call for investigation of the labor practices of newspapers in this country; and I shall offer a resolution within the next few days seeking to accomplish the end of having the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare take over a thorough investigation of this problem.

Mr. President, I think it is about time, may I say in conclusion, that the people of Oregon are relieved from the news monopoly of the Oregonian and the Journal, because, whether they are published in one plant under one management or under separate management, they do form a news monopoly in the city of Portland. They sorely need competition.

There are some indications that one good which may come out of this very costly strike may be the establishment of a Portland Daily News. Perhaps a new newspaper in our State may become a reality. We need it. And if it is established, it will certainly have my subscription, and I shall do what I can to encourage its establishment. I understand petitions are being circulated in my State seeking the signatures of those who are willing to back the establishment of such a newspaper.

All I wish to say in closing, Mr. President, because I think so many in my State have become weary of the unreasonable policy of the two-headed reactionary Oreganian-Journal, is that we need this proposed new newspaper in my State, and I hope the plans for its development meet with success.

I yield the floor.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, under the order previously entered, I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock and 17 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, under the previous order, until tomorrow, Thursday, January 21, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate January 20, 1960:

NATIONAL MEDIATION BOARD

Robert O. Boyd, of Oregon, to be a member of the National Mediation Board for the term expiring February 1, 1963. (Reappointment.)

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

I nominate the following candidates for personnel action in the Regular Corps of the Public Health Service subject to qualifications therefor as provided by law and regulations:

I. FOR APPOINTMENT

To be senior surgeons

Harry F. Colfer
Ralph W. McComas
Donald B. Tower

To be surgeons

David R. Kominz
Edward L. Kuff
Edward J. O'Rourke
Erwin S. Rabeau
Joseph F. Wilson

To be nurse officer

Margaret E. Benson

To be senior assistant surgeons

Thomas A. Waldmann
Stanford B. Friedman
Julian A. Koplen
John E. Venable, Jr.
Paul H. Black
Bertram S. Brown
Robert D. Bahr
William P. Reagan
John V. Petrucci
Robert C. Hoye
James I. Carr, Jr.

To be assistant surgeons

George W. Douglas, Jr.
Gerald R. Bassett
Jack D. Poland

To be senior assistant sanitary engineer

John D. Weeks

To be assistant sanitary engineers

Donald P. Dubois — George R. Elmore
James K. Channell — Charles F. Walters
Richard I. Dick — John A. Eure

To be junior assistant sanitary engineers

Harold C. Ervine — Clayton L. Sullivan
Robert P. Hangebrauck — Howard P. Zweig
Harvey J. Hansen

To be senior assistant scientist

William H. Lyle, Jr.

To be assistant scientist

John R. Newbrough

To be senior assistant therapist

Martha M. Lasche

To be junior assistant therapist

James D. Ebner

SECTION 5232 APPOINTMENTS

Having designated, in accordance with the provisions of title 10, United States Code, section 5232, the following-named officers for commands and other duties determined by the President to be within the contemplation of such section, I nominate them for appointment to the grade of lieutenant general while so serving:

*Joseph C. Burger — *John C. Munn
*Edward W. Snedeker — *Wallace M. Greene, Jr.
*Thomas A. Wornham

*Indicates ad interim appointment issued.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate January 20, 1960:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Raymond A. Hare, of West Virginia, to be a Deputy Under Secretary of State.

DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

Walter C. Dowling, of Georgia, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Federal Republic of Germany.

John D. Hickerson, of Texas, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Philippines.

Walter P. McConaughy, of Alabama, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Korea.

Edson O. Sessions, of Illinois, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Finland.

William P. Snow, of Maine, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Union of Burma.

John J. Muccio, of Rhode Island, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Guatemala.

Edward Page, Jr., of the District of Columbia, to be Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Bulgaria.

John Ewart Wallace Sterling, of California, to be a member of the U.S. Advisory Commission on Educational Exchange for a term of 3 years expiring January 27, 1962, and until his successor is appointed and qualified.

INTER-AMERICAN DEVELOPMENT BANK

Robert Bernerd Anderson, of New York, to be a governor of the Inter-American Development Bank for a term of 5 years and until his successor has been appointed.

Douglas Dillon, of New Jersey to be an alternate governor of the Inter-American Development Bank for a term of 5 years and until his successor has been appointed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 20, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Bernard Braskamp, D.D., offered the following prayer:

James 4: 10: Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and He shall lift you up.

Eternal God, as we turn to Thee in prayer and meditate upon Thy grace and goodness, wilt Thou inspire us with more of gratitude and devotion.

May we now, with one accord, beseech Thee for that needed wisdom which is far beyond our fallible and finite minds but never withheld from any who come unto Thee with a humble spirit and a contrite heart.

We pray that Thy Holy Spirit may engender and kindle within us a sincere desire to do Thy bidding with a greater faithfulness and a more determined will.

Grant that neither despair from within nor enemies from without may ever becloud our vision of Thy divine presence with us and Thy beneficent purposes for us.

Hear us in Christ's name. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Ratchford, one of his secretaries.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES—AMENDING FEDERAL WATER POLLUTION CONTROL ACT

Mr. BURKE of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 3610) to amend the Federal Water Pollution Control Act to increase grants for construction of sewage treatment work, and for other purposes, disagree to Senate amendments thereto, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BURKE]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. BLATNIK, FALLON, JONES of Alabama, MACK of Washington, and CRAMER.

ECONOMIC REPORT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 268)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, together with accompanying papers, referred to the Joint Economic Committee and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

I present herewith my Economic Report, as required by section 3(a) of the Employment Act of 1946.

The report was prepared with the advice and assistance of the Council of Economic Advisers and of the heads of the executive departments and independent agencies directly concerned with the matters it discusses. It summarizes the economic developments of the year and the steps taken in major areas of economic policy to promote the sound expansion of employment, production, and income. It also puts forward a program for the year 1960 which, in the context of present and prospective economic conditions, would effectively implement the purposes of the Employment Act.

The major conclusions and recommendations of the report are set forth below, in part in the words of the report itself.

By the first quarter of 1959, the recovery that started early in 1958 had already carried production and income to levels higher than ever before attained in the American economy. A considerable further advance was scored during the remainder of 1959, despite the deep effect of the 116-day strike in the steel industry.

The Nation's output of goods and services in the fourth quarter of 1959 was at an annual rate of $482 billion. When adjusted for price changes, this rate of output was 3½ percent higher than the rate attained in the corresponding period of 1958. By December 1959, total employment had reached a record level, 66.2 million, on a seasonally adjusted basis. And personal income payments in December were at an annual rate of $391 billion, $24 billion greater than a year earlier. After adjustment for increases in prices, the rise in total personal income in 1959 represented a gain of nearly 5 percent in the real buying power of our Nation.

As we look ahead, there are good grounds for confidence that this economic advance can be extended through 1960. Furthermore, with appropriate private actions and public policies, it can carry well beyond the present year.

However, as always in periods of rapid economic expansion, we must avoid speculative excesses and actions that would compress gains into so short a period that the rate of growth could not be sustained. We must seek, through both private actions and public policies, to minimize and contain inflationary pressures that could undermine the basis for a high, continuing rate of growth.

Three elements stand out in the Government's program for realizing the objectives of high production, employment, and income set forth in the Employment Act: first, favorable action by the Congress on the recommendations for appropriations and for measures affecting Federal revenues presented in the budget for the fiscal year 1961; second, use of the resulting surplus, now estimated at $4.2 billion, to retire Federal debt; third, action by the Congress to remove the interest rate limitation that currently inhibits the noninflationary management of the Federal debt. Numerous additional proposals, many of which are described in chapter 4 of the Economic Report, will be made to supplement the Federal Government's existing economic and financial programs.

Following the budget balance now in prospect for the fiscal year 1960, these three elements of the 1960 program will strengthen and be strengethened by the essential contributions to sustainable economic growth made through the policies of the independent Federal Reserve System. Fiscal and monetary policies, which are powerful instruments for preventing the development of inflationary pressures, can effectively reinforce one another.

But these Government policies must be supplemented by appropriate private actions, especially with respect to profits and wages. In our system of free competitive enterprise and shared responsibility, we do not rely on Government alone for the achievement of inflation-free economic growth. On the contrary, that achievement requires a blending of suitable private actions and public policies. Our success in realizing the opportunities that lie ahead will therefore depend in large part upon the ways in which business management, labor leaders, and consumers perform their own economic functions.

A well-informed and vigilant public opinion is essential in our free society for helping achieve the conditions necessary for price stability and vigorous economic growth. Such public opinion can be an effective safeguard against attempts arbitrarily to establish prices or wages at levels that are inconsistent with the general welfare. Informed public opinion is also necessary to support the laws and regulations that provide the framework for the conduct of our economic affairs.

Further progress is needed in establishing a broad public understanding of the relationships of productivity and rewards to costs and prices. It would be a grave mistake to believe that we can successfully substitute legislation or controls for such understanding. Indeed, the complex relationships involved cannot be fixed by law, and attempts to determine them by restrictive governmental action would jeopardize our freedoms and other conditions essential to sound economic growth.

Our system of free institutions and shared responsibility has served us well in achieving economic growth and improvement. From our past experience, we are confident that our changing and increasing needs in the future can be met within this flexible system, which gains strength from the incentive it provides for individuals, from the scope it affords for individual initiative and action, and from the assurance it gives that Government remains responsive to the will of the people.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 20, 1960.

ADDITIONAL ASSISTANTS IN THE DOCUMENT ROOM, OFFICE OF THE DOORKEEPER

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 340, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 3, 1960, until otherwise provided by law, there shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, compensation for the employment of two additional assistants in the document room, office of the Doorkeeper, at the basic salary rate of $2,000 per annum, each; such service to continue until the end of the month during which the Congress adjourns sine die, or recesses, or the fourteenth day after such adjournment or recess, whichever is the later date.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMENDING HOUSE RESOLUTION 136

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 410, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That House Resolution 136, Eighty-sixth Congress, as amended by House Resolution 181, Eighty-sixth Congress, is hereby amended by striking "$475,000" and inserting "$750,000".

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 413, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That, effective January 6, 1960, expenses of conducting the investigations authorized by section 18 of rule XI of the Rules of the House of Representatives, incurred by the Committee on Un-American Activities, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $327,000, including expenditures for employment of such experts, special counsel, investigators, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, and which shall also be available for expenses incurred by said committee or subcommittees outside the continental limits of the United States, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by said committee and signed by the chairman of the committee, and approved by the Committee on House Administration.

SEC. 2. That the official stenographers to committees may be used at all hearings, if not otherwise officially engaged.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 1, following "1960," insert "the further."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROGRAM TO PROVIDE MINIMUM OF SECURITY FOR THE AGED

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, any social security pensioner in the United States who is forbidden by law to earn over $1,200 a year—in addition to his old-age benefits—is barely existing.

Here is a strange contradiction.

Nearly a quarter of a century has passed since the Congress made a cautious start on the construction of a social security program. In spite of a gradual extension in coverage, and a number of small increases in benefits, that program has not yet succeeded in providing a genuine minimum of security for the aged.

By writing into the original law a provision stating that a person receiving old-age insurance could earn up to $1,200 in wages each year without jeopardizing his monthly checks, we admitted that the benefits were woefully inadequate.

Depression thinking was also a factor in establishing this rigid ceiling. It was motivated by fears in the 1930's that retired persons would go on working and thus deprive younger people of job opportunities.

That ceiling is completely unrealistic in the light of today's high cost of living.

In a nation that prides itself on initiative, we are denying to older people the right to supplement their meager old-age insurance by continuing to work, even on a job paying less than the minimum wage.

Paradoxically, however, that antiquated provision of the law places no ceiling on other income, such as interest, dividends, and so forth, received by the few who are more fortunately situated than the rank and file of retirees.

I consider this as discrimination against those who are most in need of the opportunity to earn additional income. There should be no ceiling on income received from wages. As long as the Congress will not agree to this, I ask that the present ceiling be raised from $1,200 to $2,400, so that those who must continue to work after retirement will have a reasonable chance to lift themselves from the poverty of social security benefits. Because my bill, H.R. 9460, will not cost a dime, I think that it will be safe from a Presidential veto.

THE IMPENDING THREAT TO AMERICA'S HEALTH

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. KING of Utah. Mr. Speaker, the mail flowing into my office in recent weeks shows that the American public wants, and expects, action in this session on a problem which threatens the well-being of nearly every American, from the newborn infant to the elderly adult.

That problem is the contamination and pollution of the food, water, and air which sustain the lives of our people.

I am pleased that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has announced that it will begin hearings January 26 on the color additives bill which passed the Senate last year. It is generally understood that the law on food, drug, and cosmetic color additives is outmoded and badly in need of a major overhaul. This legislation very probably will pass the House in this session.

The proposed amendment to the color additives law embodies some beneficial provisions. But I strongly feel the Congress has an obligation, in the face of growing public concern over this problem, to do more than simply to modernize the law on this subject. It must, I feel, begin in dead earnestness to seek a basic approach and solution to the general problem of contamination and pollution of our food, water, and air.

At least two developments have, since the adjournment of the 1959 session, given dramatic focus to this problem.

In November, the warning which the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare issued on contaminated cranberries made front-page headlines in nearly every daily newspaper in the Nation.

Contaminated poultry made headlines in December, when the same Department asked the poultry producers—and the producers agreed—to stop the sales of dressed caponettes which, in being fattened for market, had been treated with pellet injections of an artificial hormone commonly called stilbestrol.

These developments, which sparked widespread public reaction, served to show that the contamination of our food is indeed a serious problem. There have been other manifestations of its seriousness; and still others seem certain to follow.

News Columnist Ed Koterba, in his column carried December 31, 1959, in the Salt Lake Tribune, said the cranberry scare will seem like "small peanuts" besides some of the other examples of chemical contamination which are likely to be exposed in the new year.

Mr. Koterba went on to observe, and I quote:

> Beginning March 7, under a new Federal law, all food chemicals that have not been proved safe by lab test up to then may be removed from grocery shelves. No such tests had been required in the past.
>
> Some food and drug people believe that right now there may be as many as 150 chemicals—possibly many more—which we are now eating that are dangerous to our health.
>
> In the light of this, cranberries, capons, and cosmetics are small fry.
>
> And this is just the beginning.
>
> Within a few months there will be additional revelations about strontium 90, and how this radioactive fallout, which has already been found in milk and wheat, is finding its way into other foods.
>
> In its "man versus environment" conference, the Public Health Service also brought out evidence that even the air we breathe is more dangerous than we have suspected. Research is now under way to determine relationship between air pollution and chronic diseases.
>
> Maybe the scariest handwriting on the food-bin wall comes from a study of drinking water.
>
> Public Health Service studies have so far barely made a bubble on the problem.
>
> One scientist gulped when he looked over the Food and Drug Administration's 10-page typewritten list of crude materials, all potentially dangerous, which could be found in water.
>
> Strangely enough, we can purify ordinary sewage these days, but no adequate methods have been found to make harmless the water that is polluted with these new chemicals.

The menace of air pollution made headlines just this week.

In a front-page story in the Washington Post of January 18, 1960, Dr. Richard A. Prindle, chief of the air pollution medical program in the U.S. Public Health Service, was quoted as saying that air pollution could produce a national disaster.

Dr. Prindle spoke in San Francisco at an air pollution conference sponsored by the University of California, and the Post report of his speech said, in part:

> Dr. Prindle advised his fellow physicians that such air-pollution episodes as that at Donora, Pa., in 1948—in which 20 persons died and 5,910 were made ill—are not the most difficult part of the problem they face. Instead, he said, it is "to understand and help correct the more subtle but nonetheless significant disaster of slow ruination of health and life."
>
> Dr. Prindle noted an increase in diseases "thought to be associated with or caused by air pollution." He listed among them lung cancer, chronic bronchitis, and emphysema.
>
> Even if the amount of air pollution could be held steady, he said, more people would become exposed to risk from lung cancer because more people are moving from the country into the cities. But, he added, air pollution is increasing because the expanding economy and rising need for energy cause more fuels to be burned. Combustion is never complete.
>
> Dr. Prindle presented data indicating that lung cancer kills 11 of 100,000 white male nonsmokers who live in the city, but only 1 of 100,000 living in the country. Among white male smokers he believes, the rate is 65.2 per 100,000 in rural areas and 79 in urban areas.
>
> He said that one can speculate that the higher rate in cities represents, in large part, the contribution of air pollution.
>
> In this connection, he said, that cigarettes and air pollutants may "interact to enhance each other's effect."

Dr. Prindle's remarks make it quite clear that the already distressing menace of degenerative diseases is being magnified by the problem of air pollution.

In my own mind, I have regarded for years the contamination and pollution of our food, water, and air as a serious problem. I strongly felt that it was one of the important problems confronting the Congress in 1959.

Last September, almost 2 months before the cranberry scare swept the country, I wrote and introduced a bill, H.R. 9150, which would establish a National Scientific Commission to make a thorough, independent investigation of food and water contamination and of the roles which additives play in this problem.

The time has arrived, I think, when the Congress ought to be striving consciously to project a national policy on health. The commission which I propose could give the Congress the independent, nonpartisan technical counsel which it needs to shape such policy and translate it into law.

To the American people, the voice of the Federal Government on health must sometimes seem to be that of an uncertain trumpet ringing tremulously in a wilderness of confusion. The absence or inadequacy of policy on health, at the national level, is reflected in the contradictions which characterize the pronouncements of Federal agencies on two topics, tobacco and fluorides.

On tobacco, the Public Health Service has issued public warnings about the association between smoking and lung cancer, while the Department of Agriculture continues to subsidize and encourage the production of tobacco. The Honorable RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, of Oregon, a Member of the other body, who has repeatedly deplored this inconsistency in Federal policy, once observed:

> What would be the reaction here in America if we learned that the government of Red China was subsidizing the production of poppies, from which opium is distilled. Would we not raise our voices in righteous scorn and indignation? Then what must the rest of the world think of the fact that in the United States eggs and meat and vegetables are not supported as basic farm crops, but tobacco is?

After quoting the warning from Surg. Gen. Leroy E. Burney that independent studies "have confirmed beyond reasonable doubt a high degree of statistical association between lung cancer and prolonged cigarette smoking," the Senator went on to assert:

> Once the Surgeon General had issued such a statement, it seemed to me the height of irony for the Government to continue to regard tobacco as a basic crop. If tobacco is a causative element in spreading the grimmest malady which may plague large numbers of Americans, then the growing of tobacco should not be subsidized out of the taxes collected from the American people.

The contradiction in policies on fluorides has been described in the book, "The American Fluoridation Experiment," published in 1957. The Public Health Service has endorsed fluoridation; yet, as the book observes:

> Under the food and drug law, fluorine is classified as a poison, the use of which in processed foods in any quantity is prohibited.

I want to stress that I am neither an advocate nor an opponent of the practice of fluoridating public water supplies—I stand in complete and sincere neutrality on it. It is my earnest hope that the Scientific Commission which I have proposed would serve to resolve the national controversy which has developed over fluoridation. This, in fact, should be one of the high-priority assignments of such a Commission to make an authoritative, independent determination of whether this practice, now embraced by many American cities and endorsed by the Public Health Service, the American Dental Association, and the American Medical Association, but vigorously opposed by hundreds of distinguished members of the medical and dental professions and by other professional groups, should or should not be embraced by all the people of this country for the enrichment of their health.

Some observers have suggested that the Commission which H.R. 9150 would establish would, in practice, duplicate the work which Food and Drug Administration is doing. This is not the case. This Commission could help the FDA in at least three ways in which this agency is not fully able to help itself, and do so without duplicating the agency's efforts.

In the first place, it would keep the FDA out of the sometimes awkward position of recommending policy changes and new legislation which the FDA itself would be responsible for enforcing. Second, it would offer a strong, authoritative voice to support some of the controversial moves which the FDA must necessarily make to protect the health and safety of the public. While it is true that the FDA has some excellent scientists directing its inspection and control work and carrying out its research, the Commission which I propose would also be comprised of distinguished scientists with national and international reputations. A controversial move, such as the warning on cranberry contamination, would be less controversial, and would seem less bureaucratic, if it were recommended by such a nonpartisan Commission. Third, this Commission would be in a better position than would the FDA to fight for a larger appropriation for the FDA, which it desperately needs, to enlarge the inadequacies in its current program. It is common knowledge that the FDA is underfinanced and understaffed.

There is a serious inadequacy, for example, in the inspection program on pesticides and insecticides. With its present facilities and manpower, the FDA can run only widely scattered spot inspections on agriculture crops. The vast majority of the raw foods which flow into the Nation's markets and kitchens now are never checked and may carry chemical residues which greatly exceed the tolerances which the FDA is attempting to enforce. Budget requests to enlarge the agency's inspection work have been repeatedly cut, and cut severely.

Moreover, the work of this Commission would actually benefit commercial interests. To illustrate, the crisis recently experienced in the cranberry market, which was a real blow to many a good and conscientious producer, would not have happened if the responsibilities of food producers had been made crystal clear long before these crises could ever have arisen. This proposed Commission would facilitate the realization of this objective.

It would also be my hope that this Commission, being completely unbiased and uninfluenced by commercial interests, might encourage public and private health agencies to extend their research further into fields which may promise very little personal profit, but which may promise much in improved national health. We must extend our horizons in every direction. There are many broad avenues to health. Let no one claim an exclusive monopoly for his particular approach. Diversification of effort must characterize our health program, with increased emphasis upon the importance of nutrition.

I do not suggest that H.R. 9150 is the only approach. My interest in health problems, and in the role which food and water contaminants play in that problem, is not motivated by any pride which I may have in the authorship of this bill. My interest is in seeing something constructive done about the problem. I would happily support any measure which serves that objective.

It well may be that the health problem will not receive the serious, sustained attention it deserves in the Congress until the House or the Senate, or both, establish standing committees on health This is a possibility which, I feel, the 86th Congress would do well to examine carefully. It seemed a step in the right direction when the Federal Government gave full departmental status to the functions combined in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is conceivable that in the future we will see those functions which are administered by this Department realined again, and perhaps separate departments of education, and of health, and of welfare, created.

Moreover, it is quite conceivable that the future will see the Congress establish separate standing committees to keep constant watch on the health of the American people. Meanwhile, I will continue to urge the enactment of H.R. 9150, as a necessary and acceptable immediate approach to the problem.

I am grateful for the support my proposal of a fact-finding Commission has received. Americans in nearly every State and many organizations have written me their support. Communications from the American Farm Bureau Federation and the National Health Federation show they want a fact-finding Commission appointed on this problem.

We talk a lot about our competition with Russia, and the retention of our world leadership. It seems to me, however, that keeping up with, or ahead of, the Russians will be rather pointless, if in the meantime we dissipate our national virility and strength, and become a race of coddled and physically corrupted weaklings. Our real success will depend only in part, and a relatively small part, in building better missiles to shoot the moon or our enemies. Of far greater significance will be our ability to live in harmony with the laws of physical, mental, and spiritual health, in order that we might resist the ravages of disease, and achieve the fullness of our creative potential.

In conclusion, I find that I feel less concern over the serious problems which confront us than I feel over the attitudes of the American people toward these problems. The distinguished news analyst, Joseph Alsop, in his column carried last December 2 in the Washington Post, observed, and I quote:

> For surely the real source of America's self-pity and America's self-doubt is a dim but growing sense that we cannot compete in the modern world without somewhat greater efforts and sacrifices. Because of our rich heritage, we can get by with far less effort and far less sacrifice than any other nation. But we cannot grow as we ought to grow, and defend ourselves, and maintain our economic leadership and our political leadership, too, without rather more effort and more sacrifice than we are making now. And the sooner we pull up our socks in the indicated manner, the sooner the wails of self-pity will cease to be heard.

Mr. Alsop, I think, has bitten into the heart of the challenge before us. I hope we will not have to lose our priceless heritage to learn that it is truly priceless. If we are going to remain the foremost civilization of the world, we will have to be just as strong in our desire to hold that position as other dedicated, resourceful nations are in their desire to have it.

STATE OF THE UNION MESSAGE: IT'S THE LITTLE THINGS THAT COUNT

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, the state of the Union message this year was more than usually interesting. Not so much for its high sentiments of hope for peace, prosperity, and justice, but for its almost total silence on some fields of activity which are inextricably tied into our stature in the world.

In the past a Member could either read the message or listen to it and receive the same impressions. But not so this time.

On at least 18 occasions the President either added new material, deleted significant statements or expressions, or changed language. There is a saying that "It is the little things that count." And since this important annual speech was delivered over a week ago, I have carefully analyzed both the written and the delivered message in an effort to interpret some of the little things, express and implied, that seemed meaningful to me.

As a ranking member of the Committee on Science and Astronautics ever since its formation, I was naturally very much interested and, in fact, pleased to note that the President recognizes the importance of stepping up our space program and that his 1961 budget will call for practically doubling expenditures for space research and development.

But I also have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries and chairman of its Oceanography Subcommittee. Through work on that committee and from long prior service on the Armed Services Committee, I have become acutely aware of the importance of the oceans to the security and well-being of the world in general and to that of the United States in particular. I am a strong believer in the concept of total seapower.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I know something of our needs in and on the oceans. As chairman of our Oceanography Subcommittee, I have been impressed with the fact that "we know more about the back side of the moon than we do about the bottom of the ocean." So I listened eagerly for the President's views on support and development of our posture on and in the oceans.

I was keenly disappointed at his almost complete failure to take any cognizance of this vital area of concern to this country, an area in which our military and our scientists have shown we are rapidly losing way in the competition for total seapower. Though plugging for step-up in space activity, no reference at all was made to the recommendation of the National Academy of Sciences for a coordinated program of intensified oceanographic research. Nor was there any reference to strengthening our failing merchant marine or the growing problems in our increasingly important fisheries. And little reference was made to our Navy.

I said I was keenly disappointed at the omission of reference to some of these matters. But perhaps, in view of the very general nature of most state of the Union messages, it would be unreasonable to expect the President to make direct reference to every aspect of our national life and programs requiring support.

Upon listening to the delivered speech in comparison to the prepared text, I became frankly disturbed to note an apparently concerted effort to write off and to ignore the very existence of the oceans or anything suggestive thereof. Well, yes, there was enough reference to "oceans" left in the message to float our nuclear submarines—but not enough to ascertain the existence of undersea obstacles they might meet. For example, as delivered there were three very ominous, it seemed to me, and obviously deliberate emendations from the preprepared message—three of only four references, direct or indirect, substantive or rhetorical, to the water area that comprises more than 70 percent of the earth's surface.

I will cite these three instances:

First. On page 6 of the prepared text the President made the reassuring statement that "The deployment of a portion of these—our—forces beyond our shores, on land and sea, is pursuasive demonstration of our determination to stand shoulder to shoulder with our allies for collective security."

A good statement. But I wonder why the deliberate omission in the delivered speech of "on land and sea"?

Second. Then again, on page 9, after very rightly cautioning us against permitting the advance of inflation, he eliminated the sentence reading "inflation's ravages do not end at the water's edge."

Now I cannot help but wonder why this seemingly innocuous reference to water should be deleted.

Third. Then again, on page 12 of the prepared text, the President would have said:

> We live, moreover, in a sea of semantic disorder in which old labels no longer faithfully describe.

I believe I subscribe to the statement, to the extent that I can understand it. But am I paranoid to wonder why the word "storm" was substituted for the word "sea" in the delivered address? Am I sick to see something sinister or significant in such semantic antics as the sudden substitution of sibilants in a simple simile?

When the President speaks to the Congress on the state of the Union, it is surely proper to assume that he says nothing without a purpose. The same must apply to such unequivocal modifications of the distributed prepared text.

So I fear for the future of some of our naval, merchant marine, fishery and oceanographic programs. I predict that a study of the budget for 1961 will bear out these misgivings.

In any event, the President certainly squeezed all the water out of what was already a rather dry address.

INFLATION AND THE EMERGENCY HOMEOWNERSHIP BILL

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in addressing the House this morning is to call to the Members' attention, with justifiable pride, the actions of the Home Builders Association of Chicago in properly understanding the inflationary abuses of the so-called emergency homeownership bill. Innocent-sounding titles such as this are too often used to cover legislative proposals which are, in the long run, detrimental to the interest of homeowners, taxpayers, and all Americans. Inflation is today the greatest danger our country faces. Fantastic spending proposals with their roots in the welfare-state philosophy of government are detrimental to the stability of the American economy, and I am gratified that the Chicago homebuilders, with their tremendous reputation for civic responsibility, have seen fit to boldly oppose this new proposal for massive Federal spending under the name of a nonexistent emergency.

[From the Chicago Daily Tribune, Jan. 19, 1960]

BUILDERS WIN FIGHT AGAINST FEDERAL AID—CHICAGOANS HIT INFLATION BILL

Chicago area home builders were successful Monday in their initial efforts to prevent the National Association of Home Builders from endorsing a program to seek special financial aid from the Federal Government.

Kimball Hill, past president, and Ralph Finitzo, president of the Home Builders Association of Chicagoland, said that appropriation of $1 billion to the Federal National Mortgage Association as proposed in the Rains bill before Congress would be inflationary.

The measure has been urged by builders in the southern and western parts of the United States, where the supply of mortgage money has dwindled and interest rates have risen to 7 percent.

TABLED UNTIL WEDNESDAY

Monday the national association's directors voted to table the issue until Wednesday. The vote was close but the victors were confident the result would stand if another vote comes Wednesday.

The Rains bill was introduced by Representative ALBERT RAINS, Democrat, of Alabama, who was a speaker at the national association's annual convention in the Conrad Hilton Hotel.

A TRIBUTE TO REPRESENTATIVE GORDON CANFIELD WHO WILL RETIRE UNDEFEATED

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include an editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, Representative GORDON CANFIELD, of Paterson, N.J., will voluntarily retire from Congress at the end of this year to enjoy a well-earned rest.

He came to Congress in 1941 to represent the people of the Eighth New Jersey District. From his very first day in this House, he has compiled an admirable record of intelligence, integrity, and human understanding in behalf of his constituents and the Nation.

GORDON is an around-the-clock Congressman who never spared himself when others needed him. Always in close touch with the people and the problems of his district, he earned the respect and the affection of Republicans, Democrats and independents alike.

As a public servant he is invincible, because no man could do more for the people he represented.

As a colleague he won our esteem for his courage and devotion to the highest ideals of representative government.

His superhuman labors affected his health, and led to the reluctant decision to retire at the end of 1960. Our thanks and best wishes go with him at the conclusion of his brilliant career as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives. We sincerely hope that he will enjoy many years of fulfillment in the less-strenuous program that opens up before him.

Our regard for him is best summed up in the December 16, 1959, editorial of the Paterson News, titled "GORDON CANFIELD Retires and the District Loses a Champ." Under unanimous consent I insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to insure permanent recognition of his outstanding service as a Member of Congress.

The editorial follows:

GORDON CANFIELD RETIRES AND THE DISTRICT LOSES A CHAMP

Things won't be the same in Passaic County politics from here on in—at least in the even years of congressional elections.

GORDON CANFIELD has been the Congressman from this Eighth District through a generation and only the youngish oldtimer will be able to recall that it was his boss, the late George N. Seger, who was his predecessor. That was 20 years ago.

Thus for well nigh two decades CANFIELD has served us in Washington, and as a public servant and as a Republican candidate every 2 years, he was a veritable champion. In the Republican heydays and in the lean years when the magic name of Franklin D. Roosevelt was cutting down Republicans, the people remembered GORDON CANFIELD'S beneficences and he was always top man on his ticket. Some good candidates fell by the wayside before the CANFIELD juggernaut.

The answer was Congressman CANFIELD'S dedicated service, and in truth, it was this around-the-clock devotion which has finally determined him to retire from the political wars. To have continued in the only way he knows how to campaign or to serve in office might have permanently impaired his health.

So who can quarrel with his decision not to run again in spite of the void he will leave and the heart tug his decision to retire inspires? He has certainly earned the right to call it a day as a candidate after 37 years in Washington.

What was the secret of Congressman CANFIELD'S unmatched success? It was being with and for people. It could just as well have been coined in his name when it was said that to have a friend one must be a friend.

Just a few years ago, an overexuberant Democratic candidate, seeking to probe the CANFIELD success secret, came up with the bombastic charge that all the Congressman had to offer was his friendship for the little man. That did it, touched off such an atomic indignation among the rank and file of the voters that the ingenious candidate was snowed under.

The little man was there at the polls to vote for his friend. It has always been so—no letter unanswered, no opportunity for service ignored. Thousands knew his friendly intercession, his always solicitous concern for the people of his district.

During World War II, Congressman CANFIELD became restive at home. So he shipped abroad a freighter, made the rounds of the camps where his hometown boys were serving, comforted them, brought messages back to anxious loved ones. He braved the dangers of the sea, walked in the historical London blitz, was horrified at the Nazi slaughterhouse in Buchenwald. Here was one man who knew firsthand what he talked about to his people, and they believed in him.

In Congress, Mr. CANFIELD stood up and was counted. He was one of the first to warn of the threat of communism, because he had seen its creeping infection spreading when he was in Europe. He fought for proper defenses, for recognition of missile preparedness. He alone of all Republican candidates was endorsed by labor which constantly was on the Democratic side.

But he was no rubberstamp for any man or any cause. He had courage.

And so when GORDON CANFIELD decides now he cannot rally the strength of another vigorous campaign with all its exactions, when he feels he would like to nestle home with his faithful family and rest a bit on the laurels he has earned, who among us will say him nay?

The Eighth District yields him to the inexorability of time only in Congress.

There will be other opportunities for service for this man of decency, integrity, and dedication.

Meantime, all people of good will, regardless of politics, will wish him well as he begins his final year of service in Congress, and among these the News is happy to be counted as delighted that through all his years of matchless service, we were his stanch and unremitting supporters.

Of him it will be said with truth: "Well done thou true and faithful servant."

AMENDMENTS TO SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ULLMAN] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, in 1956 the Congress established a new program of disability benefits for persons aged 50 and over. It was described as a conservative plan designed to test the feasibility as to cost and administration of insuring against this type of risk in a public program. Because of this approach, the bill included a very strict definition of total and permanent disability, and the minimum age for benefits was set at age 50.

We have now had almost 4 years of experience with the plan. And we have learned from recent and extensive hearings conducted in November by the Ways and Means Subcommittee on the Administration of the Social Security Laws that the disability system has been a successful experiment and that it is financially sound.

The bill I introduce today would further strengthen this program by making benefits available to workers at any age, by giving some reality to the definition of disability as it applies to elderly disabled people and by providing insurance benefits to widows and widowers who are totally disabled. I would like to comment on each of these provisions in turn.

In a recent press release, the Honorable BURR HARRISON, chairman of this subcommittee, stated that he sees no reason to continue the exclusion of persons under 50, which he called an arbitrary and discriminating requirement. He added:

> A man, for example, aged 35 or 40, who is the sole support of a growing family and becomes disabled, faces as great a hardship as does the disabled person who at 50 years of age is more likely to have fewer dependents.

By removing the present limitation which pays benefits only to men and women 50 years of age and over, my bill would make eligible for benefits some 100,000 workers below that age, who have now qualified for the freeze. In addition, it is estimated that another 25,000 workers who have not applied for the freeze would apply for benefits together with around 100,000 dependents of the disabled workers. The rehabilitation features built into the present system would be far more important for this younger group of workers than they have been so far for older workers. Indeed, I believe that one of the most important features of this change would be the effect it would have of bringing these disabled younger workers into contact with rehabilitation facilities.

Of like importance, to my mind, is the strict definition of disability.

Since July 1957, when disability benefits first went into effect, it has become apparent that this strict definition has been administered even more strictly. I would venture to say that every Member here present has, at one time or another, had letters from constituents who, although clearly unable to work, have been held not to be disabled under the law. Such a strict definition works a particular hardship in the case of a man or woman approaching retirement age—a period when opportunities for employment for even the most ablebodied are very remote.

The bill I introduce today is a step in giving some reality to the definition of "disability" as it applies to these people. It would establish an occupational definition of "disability" which would be applicable to workers who have attained the age of 60. These older workers must now meet the admittedly tough requirement of the act by showing that they are unable to engage "in any substantial gainful activity"—which means, according to the Social Security Administration, that if a 60-year-old disabled lumberjack in my district could theoretically work as a pecan sheller in Georgia, he is thereby disqualified from benefits.

My bill would modify this definition by providing that a 60-year-old worker could qualify if he was unable to "engage in any substantial gainful activity which is the same or similar to that of his usual occupation or employment." I point out that this is not a new or untried concept from the standpoint of administration. Occupational definitions of disability appear in the Civil Service Retirement Act and the Railroad Retirement Act, as well as in State workmen's compensation, temporary disability, and staff retirement legislation.

Limiting the occupational definition to age 60 has the following advantages: First, it pinpoints the problem of the older disabled worker who has little chance or opportunity of becoming rehabilitated so that he can perform another job. Of those workers referred to State vocational rehabilitation agencies under the disability program of the Social Security Act, less than 5 percent accepted for rehabilitation have been aged 60 or over and only a small proportion of these are actually rehabilitated. To rehabilitate an individual aged 60 or over for employment requires expense, time, and effort which many consider not to be justified in view of the relatively short period before his retirement, and the fact that his reemployment often can be accomplished only under sheltered work conditions. However much we may engage in wishful thinking as to the potentialities of rehabilitation, the hard fact is that the limitation of trained staff for rehabilitation programs means they cannot be expected to concentrate their efforts on older men and women at the expense of younger people with families.

Moreover, my proposal faces up realistically to the fact that, although theoretically it might be possible for these people to, perhaps, do light work in another line of employment, their chances of getting such work are negligible. All evidence, and good commonsense, suggests that their chances of getting any job at all are extremely remote. For most of us the time is past when, in an agricultural environment, our work life could be tapered off with light chores. A form of hard-core unemployment is developing even among our able-bodied older men and women who are unable to get jobs once they are laid off. This situation has been accentuated during the past few decades because more people are living longer. The call for handicraft skills is decreasing at a time when the expansion of machine technology is discarding many of the skills developed during a lifetime.

For these reasons, numerous bills have appeared to lower the retirement age for social security purposes to age 60. Such a proposal would help to relieve the hardships of the workers I have described but it would be very costly to social security plan. And a large part of that cost would go toward paying benefits to the most fortunate people of all—those who are financially able to retire early.

I believe, therefore, that the basic solution is not just an early retirement age but more flexibility in the retirement age concept by making benefits available to those men and women who, through factors beyond their control, have been retired by a disabling condition. We know that the onset and extent of crippling diseases rises rapidly after middle age. We know that a man 60 or more may be the victim of a slowly disabling ailment which, while it does not yet meet the strict definition in existing law, precludes the possibility of work. And, if able-bodied people at this age are unable to find jobs, how can our social security plan continue to deny benefits to disabled workers on the ground that they could work if someone would hire them?

The third provision of this bill is the extension of insurance benefits to widows and widowers who are totally disabled. Under the present law, such benefits are available only at age 62 for widows and at age 65 for widowers. It seems to me that the philosophy of the legislation as it now stands presumes that widows and widowers below this age, assuming that they do not have minor children to care for, are able to meet the loss of the family breadwinner by seeking employment themselves. This is undoubtedly true for most widows and widowers, but what of those who are physically unable to work? Under the present law they must wait for survivors benefits until they have reached age 62, or, in the case of widowers, age 65. This can be a long and heartbreaking wait and I feel sure that most, if not all, of the Members of this House have, like myself, received letters from constituents who find themselves in this situation. Since 1956 we have recognized the need for assistance of disabled workers. Can we, in good conscience, ignore the same need on the part of those who have lost the working member of the family but are unable to replace him themselves? I do not see how we can.

Mr. Speaker, the bill I present today builds on our past experience with the social security program. It does not propose any radical departures from current philosophy, but instead strengthens the program so that it better meets the needs of our people. Two of the proposals I am making relate to changes which Chairman MILLS, of the House Ways and Means Committee, has indicated as worthy of consideration, in his opinion. I believe that this bill presents a reasonable and equitable way of meeting the very real hardship which is now being experienced by older men and women who have been turned away from the door of the social security office because they were adjudged to be not quite sick enough or crippled enough to qualify under the law as it is now written; by younger workers whose disability is no less of a personal disaster because they don't happen to be 50 yet; and by younger widows and widowers who cannot now qualify for benefits because they have not established coverage under the law but who are unable to do so because of their physical disability. I hope that this proposal will receive the careful consideration which I believe it deserves.

THE CHALLENGE OF PRESERVING PEACE: THE SEVEN DYNAMIC SPEARHEADS OF PEACE POWER

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California, in the second speech of this series, outlined the Sino-Soviet peril to peace and freedom. Now I ask: In the decade of the 1960's, can we meet this dire peril?

Can we preserve a peace based on justice?

Can we move even one step beyond and enlarge freedom throughout the world?

We can. But, I firmly believe that we will, only if we remold seven dynamic spearheads of peace power, the very spearheads which the Republicans already have used to preserve peace since 1953. Because the peril has deepened, these spearheads must be continually sharpened.

First. The first of these spearheads is a consistent and firm American foreign policy designed to clarify our vital commitments in advance, in order that no opponent will be drawn into war through miscalculations.

Twice in this century the absence of such positive diplomacy has produced wars. In 1908, when conflict between Austro-Hungary and Serbia was imminent, Russia backed down on its obligations to come to the aid of Serbia. In 1914, when a similar crisis developed Austro-Hungary expected Russia to back down again. But Russia did not. Thus, the way to World War I was paved by the Austro-Hungary miscalculation of Russia's position.

As the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] noted in the previous speech, the American Secretary of State, Dean Acheson, in 1950 outlined the perimeter which America would defend in the Far East. Korea was excluded. Therefore, the Communists calculated that the United States would not intervene if they attacked South Korea.

Here, then, are examples of two prolonged wars, bred in an atmosphere of miscalculation. Had diplomats made clear, in advance, the positions of their countries, war could have been prevented.

Apparently, Russians today recognize all-out war as nuclear suicide. If so, the most likely possibility of nuclear war during the decade we have just entered would be through Russia miscalculating. That could occur if Soviet leaders believed that, when confronted with the brink of war, an administration in Washington would retreat.

Consequently, we must never introduce into our foreign policy ambiguities and appearances of softness and domestic divisions which might spark the Communists into a miscalculation that could fuse a war.

Today, Russia knows the United States cannot be bluffed or blackmailed. Throughout the decade ahead we must continue to have a President, Vice President, and Secretary of State, who understand the Soviet strategy and who will not employ defensive and ambiguous policies.

Is there a difference between the approaches of the Democratic Advisory Council and the Republicans to this area of foreign policy?

Unfortunately the same differences the gentleman from California [Mr. WILSON] noted in his speech exist today. The Democratic Advisory Council and its spokesmen, Adlai Stevenson and Dean Acheson, make statements which often give Red Russia and Red China the picture of a divided America with ambiguous will and zig-zagging diplomacy. Apparently they want to stand up to the Communists on one issue, but not on the next.

We Republicans shall always abhor this attitude. For we believe it breeds miscalculations.

Second. The second dynamic spearhead of peace power is an effective, flexible, military deterrent system. It must employ a secure retaliatory capacity to respond vigorously at places and with means of our own choosing.

There has developed an increasing tendency among critics of the administration to judge our deterrent capacity purely in arithmetical terms using only a part rather than the whole of our deterrent or retaliatory capability for comparative purposes. This defensive attitude of trying to match and copy everything Russia does would leave the initiative with Russia. In contrast, we must look to the total deterrent force in being and planned to determine our real military posture.

In order to reverse the pronounced Communist successes throughout the world, the Eisenhower administration inaugurated a new foreign policy which was the antithesis of the containment strategy of the previous administration.

As was noted in the previous speech, containment had resulted in the United States trying to spread its ground strength around the world so thinly that it became ineffective. During this same period, we had a virtual atomic monopoly. Yet, so poorly was this source of potential strength integrated into our foreign policy that Communist aggression abounded.

Vice President NIXON explained the plight of the new administration when it took office in 1953:

> We found that economically their [the Russians] plan, apparently, was to force the United States to stay armed to the teeth, to be prepared to fight anywhere—anywhere in the world—that they, the men of the Kremlin chose.

The solution of the new administration was expressed by Mr. Dulles:

> The way to deter aggression is for the free community to be willing and able to respond vigorously at places and with means of its own choosing.

This policy demanded a reshaping of our military forces in order to obtain a mobile retaliatory capacity. Many administration critics were slow, however, to grasp the true implications of this new strategy. They still do not understand it. They insist on saying that the term "massive mobile retaliatory capacity" envisions exclusively atomic retaliation aimed at cities like Moscow or Peiping.

They maintain that Mr. Dulles inaugurated a one-weapon strategy, an all-or-nothing-at-all approach. Ironically, his critics attack, for political reasons, a policy which they fabricated for attack, a strawman which exists only in their own thinking, a ghost of their imaginations which never existed in the thinking of the State Department and the White House.

Mr. Dulles often explained the fallacy of such an interpretation. For example, in a 1954 article published in Foreign Affairs, the late Secretary of State noted that the new policy, in relation to Korea, did not mean that renewed Communist aggression would result in the United Nations dropping atomic bombs on Peiping or Moscow. It did mean that we will respond, not defensively, but with initiative, at times and places of our own choosing.

Of course, we will never alert an opponent in advance to the particular weapon or the particular place we will respond. Keeping him guessing as to the means—whether we would use naval forces, conventional land forces, tactical atomic weapons, or what—is part of the psychology of our deterrence. But we will make crystal clear our aim to defend an area through an initiative which allowed no privileged sanctuaries. Manchuria in the Korean war was a privileged sanctuary.

If is unfortunate indeed if the constant literature produced about so-called massive retaliation beclouds the true strategy of the present administration. That strategy of the present administration ended the Korean war. It deterred war in the Formosa area. It foiled Communist designs on West Berlin. Throughout the decade ahead, this same strategy of initiative can preserve the peace.

It involves a system of deterrence where our entire arsenal—from conventional to the most unconventional weapons—is combined with just the right selectivity to apply force exactly calculated to check the specific case of aggression.

Throughout the 1960's, our responses must be affirmative—not just negative and defensive. Our vision must be forward-looking and sensitive to the constantly changing weapons of our military system. Our perspective must consider the intrarelationship of our deterrent system. The energy for our national security must not be wasted on duplication and overconcentration of what is no longer essential.

When it becomes necessary to increase the proportionate share of budget spending to maintain this type of security, the American people, through curtailment of subsidy and nondefense spending programs, must make personal sacrifices. We can afford the defense we need. But we Republicans believe that we must afford it through sacrifice, and not through deficit spending.

Democrats like those in their advisory council want to afford that defense through charging it to the next generation and bankrupting their freedom. With splintered vision, they want to build up our missile defenses by lowering our economic defenses.

Third. And this leads us to consider our next spearhead of peace power—a strong, free, and rapidly growing American economy.

On May 24, 1957, Khrushchev pronounced:

> We do not intend to blow up the capitalist world with bombs. If we catch up with the United States in per capita production of meat, butter and milk we will have hit the pillar of capitalism with the most powerful torpedo yet.

The gentleman from California—speech No. 2—described how the Eisenhower policy of using with initiative the total potentialities of our strength ended the Korean war and blocked major aggression by Communists since. As a result, the Communists have shifted their major hopes to an economic offensive.

Their success will depend to a large degree upon the fiscal policies and productive forces within America. For at the base of this Soviet-American economic conflict is the ruble versus the dollar. The fundamentals of the conflict are not new to the Communists. Lenin said:

> The best way to destroy the capitalist system is to debauch the currency.

Plainly, Communist theorists believe that eventually democratic nations will debauch their own currency. Thereseems to be a mounting danger of this Communist expectation turning into a reality within America.

Our impoverished oversea neighbors, however, have learned through bitter experience an economic lesson in survival. They have adopted balanced budgets and sound economic policies which have produced unprecedented prosperity. The austerity program in England has yielded budget surpluses and a 6 percent tax cut. Because of hard money policies in France, her economic stability has greatly increased. The Common Market has accelerated Europe's overall economic rise. Japan is enjoying swift recovery and booming industries. And the economic growth of West Germany equals that of Red Russia.

And how do these countries view the United States? I quote from some remarks of William McChesney Martin, Jr.

> To the foreigner, much more than to Americans, the dollar is a symbol of this country's strength. A decline in the value of the dollar would suggest to him a decline in the faith and credit of the United States; signaling in his mind a decline not only in American economic strength but also in moral force.

As we enter the 1960's the Democratic Advisory Council and liberal Democrats in Congress still scoff at the economic laws which are producing fiscal health overseas. They vigorously oppose efforts to balance the budget.

What makes their complacency over fiscal policies so perilous?

The industrial revolution, which reached its peak years ago in the United States, is just going into full swing in many areas abroad. Especially is this true in the Iron Curtain countries where the labor force has been reduced to slavery.

This cheap labor market becomes an acute factor in East-West trade competition, since in the United States wages often climb more rapidly than profits. Thus, the final cost of our products has priced us out of many foreign markets. This places us at a disadvantage in a trade war with Russia. Must we add to this the handicap of a decadent dollar?

Because of the importance of the dollar in our foreign policy, fiscal soundness at home has become essential in meeting the Communist peril abroad. This and the other economic essentials will be treated in more detail in a subsequent speech of this series.

Fourth. The fourth dynamic spearhead of peace power is collective security and solidarity throughout the free world. Mr. Herter said recently:

> Our greatest advantage in the world struggle is that we are not alone. Many countries are with us wholeheartedly and confidently. Many others are with us in spirit, even though they cannot say so.

To maintain this advantage, we must continue to foster our collective security system. In certain respects, this system is an economy measure, for it enables our allies to supplement our own military forces.

The numerous bases in those friendly countries not only provide needed facilities for our air and naval forces, but also afford us missile sites. This dispersion of bases throughout the world makes it impossible for Soviet aircraft and missiles to destroy our retaliatory capacity.

The other vital military contribution of our allies is in terms of manpower. The United States is able to devote primary emphasis to strategic striking forces, to missiles, and to space developments because of this supplementary manpower. So, our conventional war strength can be only partly appraised in terms of U.S. Army combat divisions. It can be fully evaluated in terms of the allied divisions our forces support and train. The technical, logistical, and missile capabilities perform a vital function for numerous military assistance groups and provide tactical support to many allies.

Paradoxically, many representatives of the opposition have shouted that our Army divisional strength is too small, and then have voted to cut mutual security funds and hence the Army divisional strength of our allies, which comes at less cost to us in dollars and American manpower.

At the same time, our entire foreign aid program must be subject to periodic reappraisal. A decade ago the economy of many of our major allies was in a depressed state, and this required us to bear the major burden of both military and general economic aid to the free world. We rejoice in the startling recovery that many of those allies have made, and we call upon them to accept their full share of responsibility in fostering both the defense and economic health of the free world.

As a result of economic transactions with other countries last year, the United States had a deficit in balance payments of about $3¾ billion. Why has this deficit resulted? We have an annual expenditure of about $3 billion to maintain our military forces overseas. Our loans, grants, and capital outflow that increase our exports amount to about $2 billion annually, and we have a private capital investment outflow of about $2 billion a year. Obviously, it is necessary to our economic health that the prosperous free nations bear more of the burden in maintaining efficient defenses, of encouraging private investment and in assisting the less developed areas.

Solidarity of the free world involves more than just the economic aspect. It has a psychological and diplomatic side, too.

It is indeed tragic that the leading foreign policy spokesman of the Democratic advisory council, Mr. Dean Acheson, seems to berate our efforts to promote moral solidarity throughout the world. On the eve of the President's departure for an unprecedentedly long and strenuous trip among our many allies and friends, Mr. Acheson publicly said that little good would come from the trip. While the President tries to promote unity, Acheson seems to promote disunity. Has he no awareness of the importance attached to statements of a former Secretary of State?

Will he never learn a lesson? About a year ago he was the principal author of an advisory council pamphlet which painted a picture of disunity within the free world and claimed that our position in the world and our alliances were dissolving "as just a hundred years ago men watched the Union dissolve under the weak and palsied hand of Buchanan." The release of this vindictive pamphlet was timed to coincide with the week that the NATO ministers were meeting in Washington to reaffirm unity and solidarity. The Berlin crisis had begun, and it was necessary to our diplomacy to present Khrushchev with the picture of a united NATO. And yet, the Democratic advisory council used its efforts to propagandize the line of disunity.

When supporting and promoting collective security and solidarity among our allies, both political parties should make a constructive contribution. During the 1960's, we call upon responsible Democrats to do something, somehow, to control these nonconstructive spokesmen of their advisory council. Indeed, we sympathize with those Members on the other side of the aisle who deplore this irresponsibility.

The dilemmas of their party disunity, however, in no way relieve them from the duty to curtail this council when its members jeopardize unity in our defenses against the Sino-Soviet peril. For, in the decade ahead, cooperation among our political parties to promote allied unity will be as important as cooperation among the allies themselves.

Fifth. Science and technology is the fifth spearhead of peace power which we must vastly sharpen.

The deepest peril we face is that the Russians will concentrate on a few given, but quite decisive, areas and develop superior technological skills. In the area of rocket technology, we have seen what they have accomplished in outer space. This did not happen by luck. They had enormous vision and great drive. By 1947, the rocket theories of the German scientist, Sanger, had created a tidal wave of excitement in the Kremlin.

So that a top priority could be set up for the rocket program, Stalin ordered an aerodynamics expert, Col. Gugori Tokaev, to his office. Tokaev, who later defected, said that the Kremlin leaders were in almost a hysterical clamor for greater details about a super rocket. Neither were the diplomatic implications of this technological adventure lost on Stalin. He told Tokaev that the rocket "would make it easier to talk to the gentleman shopkeeper, Truman."

As Dr. von Braun pointed out at the time Russia shot up her first sputnik:

> The United States had no ballistic missile program worth mentioning between 1945 and 1951. * * * These 6 years, during which the Russians obviously laid the groundwork for their large rocket program, are irretrievably lost.

At the outset of the 1960's, we must launch into this field of technology with renewed determination to make up for the lost years. We must surpass Russia. Erratic programing and crash measures are not the answer. Clear lines of leadership, however, are essential. And I hail it as a great step forward that all space projects, including the brilliant team of Dr. von Braun, have now been placed under the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. The news that the Saturn project may cut 2 years from Russia's lead time is most heartening.

In the decade ahead, however, we must meet a much broader challenge yet in the fields of science and technology. Many spokesmen of the Democratic Advisory Council appear to advocate responses which exclusively involve greater appropriations of money and greater bureaucratic controls. Paradoxically, Russia has made profound progress in science and technology because in this area she abandoned Marxian centralism and control and inaugurated freedom and incentive. Did not Khrushchev, during his visit to America, boast to the President that Russia used incentives more extensively than did the United States?

In contrast to the approach of the Democratic Advisory Council, the Percy Committee Report emphasized that there are three essentials to the creation of a strong science and technology:

> The maintenance of an environment of freedom and public understanding in which creativity can flourish.
>
> The maintenance of a superior educational system which stresses the value of excellence for its own sake and which makes a special effort to search out the most gifted minds, wherever found, and to make available to them the most advanced training which they are capable of absorbing.
>
> The provision of scientists and engineers with the economic resources with which to pursue their search with the utmost aggressiveness.

This approach will indeed grant our Nation a new lease on its heritage, and a renewed faith in its capacity.

And this leads to a consideration of the next dynamic spearhead.

Sixth. The sixth dynamic spearhead of peace power is the increased use of the psychological, moral, and spiritual resources of a free society.

The Communists have made a god of Karl Marx and a religion of scientific materialism. Undoubtedly, the Marxian gospel exploits the weaknesses of human nature. Its breeding ground is in discontent and in frustrated hopes.

So, we are dealing with a dangerous peril, one involving far more deadly consequences than just missiles, military strategy, and geographical battlefields. The peril is not solely from without. It threatens from within as well. It will prey on our every lack of faith in ourselves.

During this age of conflict, the decisive battleground will be in the minds of men.

The static lie of Russian communism can be met only by the dynamic truth of American freedom. Unfortunately, many Americans have not awakened to the basis of the big lie even within their own country. The big lie is found in the materialistic interpretation of man and man's destiny. Of this, communism is merely a ruthless manifestation. This materialism is often called, simply, socialism. Our ideas and faith can never be victorious over Communistic ideas through a greater application of materialism, statism, and socialism.

I fear that the Democratic advisory council exerts an influence to convert our foreign policy into a materialistic program, to purge it of all principle. Is this not a repetition of the pattern of allowing the Soviet to control the initiative and to choose the framework for conflict?

A strong faith and ideology within America is essential. It is just as essential to carry it to the Russian people themselves. This leads to the next force.

Seventh. The seventh dynamic spearhead of peace power is a people-to-people approach. The Vice President's visit to Soviet Russia last summer was a creative, dynamic, and timely breakthrough of the Soviet Iron Curtain. I say it was creative because it challenged the Communists as never before into a contest of ideas. I say it was dynamic for it was a giant step forward toward a long-standing aim of the Eisenhower foreign policy of liberating minds and restoring freedom within the Sino-Soviet bloc.

The Percy report has splendidly summed up our policy of liberation:

> Our policy of nonviolent emancipation, with its longrun perspectives, would spell out the policy of peaceful liberation which some have either not understood or deliberately distorted out of all proportions. The emancipation policy promises to establish much-needed facilities for the peaceable creation of pressures for gradual expansion of freedom within the Communist empire.

During his visit to Russia, Vice President NIXON superbly dramatized American superiority in the production of consumer goods. Granted, much of what he said never got to the Russian masses. But some of what he said had a marked effect. A continued program of this nature, with increased cultural and scientific exchanges will bring to the Russian people and to the satellites the American story of the benefits from a free economy. In turn, this story will create upward pressures on the Soviet rulers. This could deter Soviet aggression and expand freedom within Russia and her satellites.

The follow-up to the initial people-to-people approach has been the personal diplomacy of President Eisenhower. For some time before his death, Secretary of State Dulles had pointed out to the President his tremendous prestige throughout the world. The time might come, insisted Dulles, for the President to use fully this prestige and influence through a series of tours. Obviously, it would have been a cardinal blunder to embark in this personal diplomacy at the wrong time. But was the time not ideal, before a summit meeting, toward the end of the President's term in office? This would further steal the initiative from Mr. Khrushchev. It would cast the setting for the conflict where we want it—in the arena of world opinion—that would make it a battle of ideas and not of missiles.

The casual observer will ask: Have not some of the members of the Democratic Advisory Council been calling for a summit meeting year after year? And is the Republican leadership not now taking us to a summit? So is there any difference in attitudes in this particular regard?

Most certainly, yes. The difference is in timing and in preparation. Yalta and Potsdam were failures. We tried a summit in 1955 and it became clearly evident that Khrushchev was not yet thoroughly convinced that the Eisenhower administration had irrevocably inaugurated a new foreign policy which would not bow to blackmail and to duplicity.

It took four more years to educate the Soviet leaders, during crisis after crisis, that the new administration would not compromise vital issues. And the final part of Khrushchev's education was during the Berlin crisis of 1959. He gave America a deadline. He was determined to humiliate us into a summit, when the entire world knew it was blackmail. America stood her ground, despite the fact that a former Truman advisor, George Kennan, declared we should withdraw from Europe altogether.

Khrushchev's education was complete. He realized that he was confronted with a new foreign policy, far different from that of the Truman administration. He had the alternative of plunging his country into an all-out war, or seeking a peaceful means of competition. At this decisive moment, the President took the initiative. He sought to avoid a condition mentioned in the speech of the gentleman from California—speech No. 2—where a Soviet leader might see no way out, feel that he was boxed in, and irrationally tumble toward war. Without retreating from the Berlin issue, Mr. Eisenhower invited Mr. Khrushchev to the United States. Thus the Soviet Chairman, at the decisive moment, was led toward the ways of peaceful competition. The timing of our President was brilliant.

Now we do hold the initiative.

The greatest single challenge of the 1960's is to bring the people-to-people approach closer and closer to every member of the Communist empire. This policy, however, can backfire if executed by unskilled men with limited ability and limited vision.

We must continue to have as President, Vice President and Secretary of State, leaders with judgment and knowledge of world affairs. The future of this country—indeed, the future of freedom throughout the world—cannot be risked, either to rank amateurs in international relations, or to those who produced the ambiguous and faltering diplomacy of the late 1940's.

As we enter the decade of the 1960's a profound difference emerges between the foreign-policy approaches of the Republicans and of the Democratic Advisory Council. Basically, it is this: While the Republicans are looking forward, members of the Democratic Advisory Council, the Stevensons and the Achesons, are looking backward. Against the Russian peril, they still do not understand the need for a consistent, clear policy of firmness. They have splintered vision, and see the Soviet peril only in parts. Their reactions are defensive.

The Republicans undertook the campaign of 1952 with two important foreign-policy aims—to end the war in Korea and to initiate a policy of liberation. Peace in Korea, the Republicans knew, could only come from reshaping a policy of the initiative which outlawed the privileged sanctuary. Liberation of those in Soviet slavedom could only come by maneuvering the Russian leaders into a climate of exchange of ideas, culture, and competition in consumer production.

This year the Republicans undertake another campaign. More than just political, it is a campaign to promulgate a philosophy for maintaining peace with justice and extending freedom here and throughout the world.

We have summed up this policy for the 1960's in terms of seven spearheads of peace power. Not just one, but all seven are needed to spearhead the progress of freedom throughout the world.

Why is the Republican Party capable of promoting this dynamic policy? Because as a party it possesses the four qualities which the chairman of the Republican policy committee mentioned in the initial speech: Party unity, party philosophy based on principle, party democracy, and party foresight toward the needs of future generations.

With these qualities, the Republicans uniquely are equipped to see the Sino-Soviet challenge as a whole and not in parts. Uniquely are the Republicans qualified to marshal all the forces and resources of our Nation and turn the age ahead from peril to promise.

THE NUMBERS RACKET IN NEW YORK CITY

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ULLMAN). Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. POWELL] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, last week I exposed before this Congress and the Nation the numbers racket of New York City as pauperizing the poor and criminalizing the dwellers of the ghettos. The number of criminals is increasing rapidly according to the records of the courts. The amount of money now being played per year on numbers only, in New York City alone, is $150 million. This figure is arrived at on the basis of estimates made by members of the press in New York.

All of this is operating without a single banker or big controller being arrested. It is entirely in the hands, according to the police department's own admission and statistics, of the maffia syndicate and the combine, as the New York Times reported a week ago, in their Sunday edition, with every single Negro even in the Harlem community, driven out.

Last week I put before this Congress and this Nation the names and addresses of a few of those operating in my district, plus excerpts from my sermon calling on the people of my community to kick the habit of gambling. Police headquarters in New York City issued a bulletin after my speech of last Wednesday saying that the names that I gave them were "no new names" and that the list which I presented here in Congress, photostatic copies of which I hold in my hand, was 5 years old. These are the photostatic copies of the lists found on former Police Sergeant Luberda when he was arrested in March of last year by State troopers near Suffern, N.Y., for drunken driving.

Subsequently they found nineteen-thousand-four-hundred-odd dollars in his car. These lists have the names and addresses of a number of places and of the numbers operators, with the amounts by each name of how much was paid off to the police.

Sergeant Luberda went to prison for 2 years for refusing to testify before the grand jury.

These lists, by the way, were identified in court by a member of District Attorney Frank Hogan's staff as "the pay off list" to the police department. Judge John Mullen in sentencing Luberda to 2 years in prison said, "You are the bag man for the police department."

The police department last Wednesday after my talk here said these lists were 5 years old, and also said I gave no new names. In the first place, there were new names, four, to be exact, and I will repeat them:

Nick Angelo and Louie B., bankers, 3543 Broadway.

Tony D'Amato, 509, 522, and 526 West 147th Street.

Tony Plait, at 529 and 531 West 151st Street.

These are new names.

The police department confessed later that one of them had been arrested, but he was "only a runner." This is an untruth. These four are all big, and the biggest is Tony Plait, at the two addresses I gave to the Congress last week.

Today in my remarks I will list more new names and more numbers headquarters, but in the meantime I am asking the police department to explain to the public why they have not arrested all of those who were named last week if for no other charge than the usual charge, that of vagrancy.

Let us take the word of police headquarters that the list I introduced last week was 5 years old. Mark you, these are the exact words of Deputy Police Commissioner Walter Arm as reported in the daily press in New York, that those lists are 5 years old.

Those lists I gave last week were part of the lists found on the person of former Sergeant Luberda in March of 1959. If these lists are 5 years old, then that means that Luberda, who was on the police force then, was the bag man for the Police Department while on the force. I would like the special committee of Congress which has been investigating payola on TV and radio to look into the $150 million numbers racket in New York and the payola to the police department of New York which, in other words, has been going on for 5 years. We know, of course, it has probably been going on much longer.

The damaging admission by police headquarters that they knew all of these lists for 5 years proves that they knew how much was being paid off by Luberda, because the amount is by each drop, with the weekly payoff, the amount by these names of weekly payoff to the lower echelon, the man on the beat.

I asked them publicly why they did nothing about this for 5 years. The public knows they did nothing.

Since the lists are 5 years old, then that means also the police headquarters knew who the bankers were—these names are here—where they were operating during that 5 years and yet let them operate freely without any arrests.

The very first name there, Louie the Gimp, was not arrested until I held a conference with the police commissioner and complained about Louie the Gimp, one of the biggest, operating a numbers bank in front of my church. Then and only then was he arrested. If they, the police department, say they knew about it for 5 years, since police headquarters knew that the list found on Luberda was 5 years old, why did they obstruct justice by not so informing the district attorney, Frank Hogan? The release from the police department, the list of 5 years ago, is also corroborating evidence, and this is important, that the gambling stamp tax which we passed here in 1951 is now due for at least 5 years on each one of the names mentioned.

I just received a letter a few minutes ago from Mr. H. Allan Long, who is director of the Intelligence Division of the Treasury Department. In response to my remarks of last Wednesday, he writes me, and the letter just came, that they are working on the gambling stamp tax of these named, and I quote from his letter, and it is already in the hands of the New York office.

The next point I want to bring out is—how can the police department and the district attorney's office find out who the overlords are in back of this $150 million racket?

Ninety percent of the bail bond business is handled by one man. How can we find out who pays off this one man? Because the bail bond fee and the forfeiture are not paid for by the man when he is arrested. They are paid for by someone else.

First. The application for the bail bond in New York City shows who pays the premium, and that is in the office of the company. The company is known to me and the company is known to the authorities in New York. So, therefore, it would be easy to find this information.

Second. The confession of judgment on the bail bond shows who pays the forfeiture. This must be signed in advance.

Third. And this is the important part, and this is a most important part, the affidavit filed with the court under the law of New York shows at whose request the bond is written when the bond is written. This affidavit is found in the court clerk's office attached to the bond.

I might point out that most of the time when the bond is written the defendant is in jail.

With all of the foregoing information, if 200 or 300 of these number runners who are repeaters, and mark you who were arrested before the Sergeant Luberda exposé of March 1959, if they are subpenaed and cross-examined, it would definitely show that they did not pay for their bail bond. They did not pay for their lawyer, even though at the beginning some might lie. After that evidence has been secured, then the bail bondsmen can be brought in and confronted with it and a demand made then as to who did pay for the bail bond.

I would like to say the district attorney for New York, Mr. Hogan, has been very cooperative. I have been working very cooperatively with him. I had an extensive conversation with him last Saturday. On Monday, I received a tip which undoubtedly is going to lead to the very top. I immediately called up Mr. Frank Hogan for whom I have the greatest admiration. He was overjoyed to get it and his office, with his own detective force, is working on this now. This, I think, is going to break within the next few days and I cannot say any more about it because it is too important.

These are new names and new addresses that I am going to give:

Candy store, 469 West 148th Street—under Nick Angelo. Also, the J. & P. Market, 3614 Broadway. The E. & J. TV appliance store at 3638 Broadway. Freddie's No. 2 Grocery Store at 3343 Broadway. Under another known hood named "Al," known to the police department, these are operated: The Big Four Coffee Shop, 3301 Broadway; Produce Market, 3491 Broadway; and again under Nick Angelo, the Piedmont Restaurant at 3301 Broadway. Finally, under two new bankers known only as Sol and Tom, the Amsterdam Market at 2016 Amsterdam Avenue.

I will continue to list these names, continue to turn them over to the district attorney, to the Intelligence Division of the Department of the Treasury, and to another authority that I cannot reveal at present that has been working with me—an authority in our area. I have received many threats, but they mean nothing to me. I will be back here, God willing, Wednesday with more of these names until that day comes when the police department of my town starts arresting these known people and starts closing up these known addresses which, in their own words, they have known for 5 years.

I yield back the remainder of my time, Mr. Speaker.

ANTI-SEMITIC ACTS IN GERMANY AND THROUGHOUT THE WORLD

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'HARA] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I join with my dear friend and distinguished associate on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARBSTEIN], who addressed this body yesterday, in protest against the apparent inactivity of our Government in connection with anti-Semitic acts in Germany and elsewhere throughout the world. This is one time when our country must act with authoritative firmness. Outrageous attacks upon any people because of their religion or of their race are a challenge to all that our United States of America stands for. I am one of the House sponsors of a concurrent resolution that makes crystal clear the position of the Congress of the United States. I hope that there will be no delay in the adoption of this resolution, which the able chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, Mr. MORGAN, promptly has scheduled for committee hearing and action.

From Rabbi Eric Friedland of the district that I have the honor to represent I have received a letter in which he states:

I am impressed with your concurrent resolution in connection with the recent wave of desecration of Jewish houses of worship. I dare say that none of us are in a position to speak authoritatively on the reason for the outrages. Whether they represent a planned attack on a very vulnerable target by neo-Nazis, whether this is a subtle communistic strategy to divide and confuse NATO, whether this is another demonstration of periodic international anti-Semitism, whether it is hoodlumism, or whether it is simply highjinks perpetrated by youth in a quest of "kicks" no one knows. Maybe it is a combination of a few of these factors. Maybe all are represented. At any event, it seems to me that the situation calls for vigorous action. First of all, an effort should be made to ascertain the source of the propaganda and the hostile acts. Secondly, some effort must be made to apprehend the dastardly perpetrators of these monstrous and inhuman acts. Finally, those in positions of authority and those who represent the conscience of the Western World must be heard.

To single out the Jew for humiliation and attack may seem innocent on the surface, but the Jew is a barometer of the moral state of the world. If the world is silent about the Jew, ultimately those who assail the world's morality will destroy all decent people and their institutions as well.

I am pleased that you saw fit to be among the first to take a bold position.

Mr. Speaker, I also am including in my remarks the statement of Rabbi Hayim Goren Perelmuter, another beloved spiritual leader in the Second District of Illinois, as follows:

The Swastika rides again around the world, like some satanic satellite of somber warning. There are differences of opinion as to what it betokens.

Some would dismiss it as an outbreak of hoodlum rash, the new search for kicks on the part of delinquent degenerates. Some think it has a neo-Nazi origin. Some say it might emanate from the Communists; and some that an Arab League anti-Jewish factor is involved.

Perhaps there is an element of fact in all of these. But whatever it be, it betokens a serious danger sign as to the health of the body politic of the Western World. The sickness is compounded of a dangerous drift toward appeasement, and a flabby weakness fashioned out of an excess of prosperity.

And as always, the forces that would undermine democracy and decency strike, in whatever slimy manner, at the Jew.

To all of us this should sound an alert and a reaction. A reaction, not of panic, but of positive and courageous posture. If our synagogues are targets for these forces let us hallow them and sanctify them. Let us hallow them and sanctify them by strengthening them with our devoted participation.

We must educate our children better, deepen our own reservoirs of faith, and make the altar of our worship alive with our constant devotion.

We must throw ourselves with renewed vigor into every phase of Jewish activity at home and abroad. And we must alert all forces in the democratic world that they may know for whom this warning bell tolls.

It tolls for all, for Christian as well as Jew, for black as well as white. It tolls for all that is decent in humanity.

A BILL TO AMEND TITLE II OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, I should like to introduce at this time and send to the desk a bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to relax the severity of existing provisions with respect to deductions from benefits on account of earnings. I request that the bill be printed in the RECORD at this point:

TO AMEND TITLE II OF THE SOCIAL SECURITY ACT SO AS TO RELAX THE SEVERITY OF EXISTING PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO DEDUCTIONS FROM BENEFITS ON ACCOUNT OF EARNINGS

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) paragraph (2) of section 203(e) of the Social Security Act is amended by striking out "$80" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$254".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall be effective, in the case of any individual, with respect to taxable years of such individual ending after the month in which this Act is enacted.

This is an identical companion bill to that which Senator KEATING is today introducing in the other House. It is on a subject about which both Senator KEATING and I feel strongly, the welfare of our elderly citizens. The legislation would end the present injustice of the law whereby older people may actually have to pay for the privilege if they wish to work.

At present, as is common knowledge, a person receiving social security benefits can end up with less income by working than if he or she stayed home and lived on social security. If a person earns more than $1,200 per year he loses an entire month's benefits for every $80 or fraction thereof of additional earnings. Since social security payments may run up to $254 per month, a person earning $2,160 per year in wages might lose $3,048 in social security benefits. Such an older person would be in effect paying $888 per year for the privilege of working.

This is morally wrong and psychologically demoralizing for senior citizens who might wish to continue working after they have reached retirement age. Work is an essential ingredient for the happiness, self-respect, and dignity of many elder citizens. In a recent Gallup survey it was found that the overwhelming majority of Americans favor removing the social security earnings limit entirely. Such legislation, notably a bill by Senator KEATING—S. 1168—is at present before the Congress.

However, in default of the broader legislation, the bill I introduce today contains a proposal worked out by Mr. Dwight S. Sargent, an authority in this field, which, while it does not completely remove the earnings limitation, does provide both flexibility and incentive. The bill would raise the allowable monthly earnings increment in excess of $100 from $80 to $254. This latter amount is the maximum family monthly social security payment permitted at the present time. By making this maximum monthly benefit the same as the allowable monthly chargeback figure, we establish the principle that for each dollar earned over $1,200 per year a person drawing social security benefits cannot lose more than he would if he did not work.

Under the Keating-Barry bills the social security earnings limitation would no longer discourage an individual from continuing to work beyond retirement age. I cannot too strongly urge that the bill be given real consideration by the Ways and Means Committee.

I would conclude by inserting in the RECORD at this point a statistical explanation of the social security earnings limit proposal being introduced today by Senator KEATING and myself:

Explanation of social security earnings limit proposal

	Annual income, man age 65, wife and children receiving maximum benefit [1]
	Present	Proposed
Social security payments (12×$254=$3,048)	$3,048	$3,048
Can earn without penalty	1,200	1,200
Total possible income (including $1,200 in salary)	4,248	4,248
If he earns $1,454 a year; that is, $1,200 plus the equivalent of 1 social security check ($254):
Social security eligibility	[2] 2,032	[3] 2,794
Earnings from employment	1,454	1,454
Total income	3,486	4,248
Decrease in total income resulting from additional work	[4] 762	0

[1] Maximum benefit is $254 per month.
[2] 4 monthly benefits lost (4×$80, or a fraction thereof, in additional income).
[3] 1 monthly benefit lost under proposed bill.
[4] Represents 3 payments net loss (3×$254=$762). 1 lost benefit of $254 compensated by the extra $254 in income.

A GREAT PROFESSION MUST ACT RESPONSIBLY

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, on January 15, 1960, the Honorable J. Lee Rankin, Solicitor General of the United States, delivered an interesting and informative address at a meeting sponsored by the Wichita Bar Association.

There were about 800 lawyers in attendance of which many were court judges in that area. The title of the address is "A Great Profession Must Act Responsibly."

I believe Members of the House will be interested in reading this statement, which follows:

A GREAT PROFESSION MUST ACT RESPONSIBLY

(Address by J. Lee Rankin)

Certain basic attributes are an essential part of a profession. First, it needs to have learning. Study and knowledge of the field involved are indispensable to a practice of a profession. Second, an organization is required to support proper standards of admission, disciplinary proceedings, and concerted action on behalf of the profession. Third, and this is a primary requirement and of at least equal standing, it has to serve the public interest.

The legal profession has all of these characteristics. It is a learned vocation. In this regard it has a background of culture and idealism which encourages the exercise of the art. It is nurtured by a rich tradition. The long roots of historical continuity helps its members to recognize and support the public interest. Its history is both old and honorable. Some of the most celebrated occasions of man's struggle for freedom are those in which members of the bar have championed the cause of justice at great personal sacrifice. Many of our venerated rights were declared and vigorously defended by lawyers. The teachings of these experiences stimulate the bar to revere and support the cause of justice.

In serving the public the bar probably gives more of its resources than any other group. A recital of those engaged in public life either on the local or national level reveals how the American public has grown to rely upon lawyers for the recruitment of its public servants. The contribution to public service does not end there. It is evidenced by innumerable hours, days, and even years devoted to work for the benefit of the public in bar associations as well as lay groups. Wherever it is sought to improve the administration of justice, the legal fraternity is present and generally eager to assist.

The bar's traditional organization is best developed by a brief glance at its history. Looking back, we note that the profession can be traced to Rome. While there are those who might suggest that lawyers were in evidence in Greece, this would be true only insofar as the Roman orator, who is the prototype of the present-day advocate, took the Greek speech writer as his model. Yet, despite the Greek inspiration, it was Rome that gave us the classic law of the legal order. It furnished an authoritative body of materials for the guidance of judicial action, which was different from ethical customs, religion, and public opinion. Even St. Yves, the patron saint of lawyers, was represented with the Twelve Tables drawn from Roman Law. Furthermore, the civil law is largely a refinement on the inheritance received from Rome.

Moving on to the development of Anglo-Saxon law, it is observed that there was a distinctly different growth. In England, the Inns of Court furnished an organization both to train and discipline lawyers. These Inns helped to furnish a fine professional tradition while they were flowering. As the division between barristers and solicitors grew and separate areas of responsibility were established, the barristers became well organized. The solicitors, on the other hand, had no early organization, and when it became necessary to regulate them, the task was undertaken by Parliament and the judges, who at the same time left the control of the barristers with the Inns of Court.

In this developing process the Inns gradually established an educational program, together with standards of conduct that became a strong disciplinary influence. They formulated the rules for proper relations with the courts. From the maintenance of these contacts, within the setting of the Inns, there flowed a judicial or common law, in contrast to the law of the universities, which were the educational centers for the Roman law.

In this process of evolution there developed three branches of professional legal activity. These divisions are not peculiar to the Anglo-Saxon tradition, as their counterparts under different names are found in the civil law. But in England, the agent for litigation became the attorney and later was called solicitor. The advocate or barrister presented cases to the courts. Last, the counselor or adviser was recognized, and gradually his function was taken over by the solicitor, along with the former responsibility of acting as agent for litigation.

During this unfoldment and assignment of work, the legal profession had developed and kept its characteristic fraternal spirit. The unusual ability lawyers have had to engage in fierce forensic arguments and then lay aside all antagonisms and treat their opponents as brethren was fostered by the Inns. This practice has become both legendary and habitual.

While the barristers had the Inns as their organizations, the solicitors did not remain indefinitely without their own association. In the 17th century the Society of Gentleman Practitioners in the Courts of Law and Equity was formed. This, unlike the Inns, was a voluntary group much like a bar association in the United States. Later the Incorporated Law Society was formed and became an effective institution. Then, there followed the law society which is the solicitors' present organization.

Despite the example of these early associations, this activity necessary to the best health of the legal profession gradually waned and almost disappeared, after its first beginnings, in the United States. Following Independence, there was a decided change in attitude toward all things English, and students stopped going from America to the Inns of Court. The Inns had lost much of their influence even in England and through lack of contract, developments in English law after Blackstone had little effect on the bar in the new country.

Bar associations did not flourish nor did lawyers, at least in reputation, in the period after the Revolutionary War. Learning was not considered necessary in a judge and, therefore, not in lawyers. The clergy were thought to have sufficient erudition in the States for all the professions. The disrepute of lawyers was aggravated by their being engrossed in collecting debts and enforcing property rights after the Revolution.

Organizations of the bar were also handicapped by the leveling spirit inspired by democratic ideas. As a result there was a general disbelief in professions after the Revolution. This was reflected in a trend of deprofessionalizing all callings, which set in and prevailed for many years. Along with this tendency, the geographical conditions had a similar effect by producing a decentralization of the administration of justice and the bar that served it.

In places where the members of the Inns of Court were admitted to practice, there was a further disintegration, because those lawyers felt no loyalty to a local bar and its activities. Wherever there remained any organization of the bar, it was fostered by the control over admission, training, and qualification for the profession and in part by social meetings.

Despite all of these difficulties and the general decadence of bar associations, the time from the Revolution to the Civil War was an interval of the greatest achievement in our legal history. The price for the deterioration of the bar's organizations was paid later. But, in the meantime, over a stretch of 75 years, the English materials were built into a common law for America. This result was the work of great judges, with the help of very gifted lawyers practicing before them. Those eminent lawyers handed down a magnificent tradition but were also a product of its inspiration.

During the period of organizational decadence, the legal profession and its group activities had sunk to such a low place in public esteem that legislation was passed which took the training and admission to the practice out of the hands of the bar. Voluntary selective associations kept up the traditions of the bar as they had come over from England, but gradually became dormant or decayed.

In the last third of the 19th century, a revival of legal associations occurred. The renaissance was materially stimulated by the organization of the American Bar Association in 1878. Thereafter, there grew up strong, active associations in each State and in many an integrated bar in the 1920's. In the redevelopment of the organizational movement, there was a ready acceptance of the obligation to the public. The American Bar Association recognized this responsibility by stating in its constitution:

"In the spirit of a service of furthering the administration of justice through and according to the law."

It is difficult to exaggerate the significance to the bar and Nation of the establishment of a legal organization for the entire country. The representative character of the national association with strong, well organized State and local associations behind it, conscious of the professional character, traditions, and responsibilities, was of major importance. It had an immeasurable effect on the strengthening of the profession and devoted itself to trying to lift the practice of law above the level of an individual business. As the organizations were revived, there resulted a considerable voice of the bar in the admission and discipline procedures along with training for admission. This was a resultant fruit of strong, concerted action by those who had high aspirations for their profession.

As one advances from history to the present day, the question arises as to how the bar now discharges its responsibilities to the public. For a long period, lawyers have labored diligently and at a considerable sacrifice to further the programs of the national and local associations. Magnificent contributions have been made, both in skill and dedication to the work in committees, sections, and the general organizational activities. There are those who have given a substantial part of their professional life to such assignments.

The bar has been benefited and enriched by such exertions and, in the process, the public has gained, both from the instruction of the profession and the improvement in the administration of justice that resulted. Law Day, World Peace Through Law, legal studies, and the Awards of Merit are just a few examples of the manifold programs to serve the public in which the bar has been engaged.

However, in examining the standing of the bar's organizations, it must be acknowledged that such pursuits do not always receive the principal public notice. Often, those efforts are buried in the mass of matters which are dealt with, and the slow, patient drive toward improvement in the administration of justice is lost under the cloud of some sensational claim or charge which does injury to both the bar and the public.

In addition to being noted for remarkable accomplishments, bar associations have also become famous for their attacks upon the Supreme Court. Although any reference to the Court is only a minute part of an association's action, such campaigns catch the headlines. As would be expected, there are those who have learned that such offensives are an easy avenue to publicity. And too often, the criticism gives those involved a notoriety that could be obtained in no other way. Usually such an assault is not supported by careful and thoughtful analysis of the opinions or a comparison with prior decisions. However, they have done substantial damage to the bar's repute.

Lest there be any misunderstanding and regardless of the extent to which such criticisms should be censured, it must be recognized that careful and scholarly examinations of the work of the Court are to be welcomed. They, of course, are a different matter. Such studies are of value, since they should be an important stimulant to reappraisal and self-examination by the Court. They can be a spur to greater skill and accomplishment in the discharge of the Court's work.

The question is, however, whether it is responsible for an association of lawyers not to do all within its power to prevent an assault against an institution as precious and valuable to our country as the Supreme Court. Because of the failure to devise sound methods of control, there is the unfortunate recent spectacle of a gifted president of the American Bar Association spending an important part of his term in trying to make it clear that the association had no intention or purpose of reflecting on the Court.

The price of such an experience in public respect is too large for the bar to look forward with complacency to a repetition. As to particularly important proposals, it is time that procedures were adopted, first, to postpone consideration until there is an ample period for careful study and review of all such proposals, both as to what they are and what they may appear to be; and, second, to require a vote of the entire association before any support is given to them. Such preventive measures should go far either to preclude such offensives from gaining the endorsement of the association or being understood to be an attack when none was intended. The suggested revision should not be limited to onslaughts against the Court, however, but should be applied in all cases where the proposal might injure fundamental institutions such as Congress, the executive, or the courts.

The referendum suggested is not without precedent. A referendum under its rules was taken by the American Bar Association on President Roosevelt's proposals with regard to the Federal courts in February and March 1937. A like poll was taken by the association as to all lawyers in the United States at that time. This the association said it was doing in the belief that the voice and opinion of lawyers "should be ascertained and made known in a thoroughly representative way, upon issues vitally affecting the courts of the United States."

While such a poll of lawyers generally might not be necessary or desirable, it could well be important in some instances. Certainly a referendum of the association's members would be a protection for the preservation of our liberties where insidious and indirect reflections might have as much effect as a direct assault on our cherished institutions.

While it is recognized that such procedures would not prevent one lawyer or a group from speaking out, they would avoid the involvement of the organization, except where it carefully chose to act by a means that would demonstrate its will, and only after full study and reflection. They should help to avoid any claim that the association had not acted responsibly. The practice suggested by providing a greater participation in the decision might prevent the harm that is to be anticipated both to the Court and the bar with present procedures.

There is a related area where the associations fall short of their announced goal of furthering the public interest. In committees, sections, and other special groups, those who take part are usually specialists in the field. Too often, some are there to forward special interests of industries and others engaged in the particular activity involved. Occasionally, there are also lawyers participating to further the objectives of their clients. There is frequently a divergence between such objectives and the public interest. In some instances, there is a direct conflict.

The legal profession can hardly defend with the claim of ignorance. From daily experience lawyers are well aware of the risks involved in ex parte hearings. The courts have surrounded such proceedings with numerous safeguards for the protection of the cause of justice. They display an acute awareness of the dangers in hearing only one side.

Admittedly developments such as those described are difficult to control. It is usual and to be expected that those who engage in the practice of a specialization will gravitate to the section or committee dealing with it. It is anticipated that they will furnish much of the skill and experience required for such special projects. However, if the profession is to act responsibly, it has to demonstrate an awareness of this problem and take steps to guard against accepting proposals that would further the special interests at public expense. At least there should be additional independent screening processes.

Precautions in this area of endeavor commend themselves, especially where recommendations are made covering such a comprehensive area, including legislation, rules and regulations, involving both substantive and procedural law. Such a wide range of proposals suggests how imperative it is that all sides be carefully examined, even if a more adequate independent staff is required for its views and suggestions. It would be difficult to claim that action was faithfully taken in the public interest without some such safeguard unless the decision-making group had both the time and the experience to arrive at an independent judgment as to the technical recommendations.

There is yet another area of the bar's concern that deserves careful reexamination in the exercise of its responsibility to the public—that is the proposals which involve positions on controversial political matters as distinguished from the regular legal issues. Associations should act to avoid taking such stands. They are generally divisive and splinter the membership into opposing camps with all the conflicts that that entails.

All who have worked with lawyers know that their philosophies range the full spectrum from conservative to liberal. Their beliefs are fundamental and are developed over a lifetime. Such views are not to be abandoned because of a resolution by any association. But, the group action which reflects on their concepts is embarrassing and tends to drive the lawyers to acts of disassociation by word or deed.

It seems obvious that a result of that kind, although to be expected, is damaging to common activity, mutual respect and regard. It does not conform to the basic tenets of the profession. Lawyers rejoice in independent thinking and are devoted to the belief that ideas should compete for acceptance in the minds of the thoughtful. If the price of membership in an organization is to be conformity, it is too high even for all the other benefits. Because of their nature and the teachings of their experience, the result with lawyers is certain to be either active opposition, open revolt, or a protest by separation.

In addition to these objections to such positions, there is the further fact that in most cases they need not be taken. There is ample for bar associations to do to improve the administration of justice without becoming engrossed in philosophies of political action. Furthermore, the complexion of a political issue appears to change its face so rapidly that a proud resolution of the moment may become quite a sad affair after the expiration of a short time. The high price to an association in its reputation with the public for responsible action and the injury to mutual respect and understanding between members, remains.

In conclusion, it would seem that the standing of the bar would be materially improved by the suggested safeguards. Public esteem, which is sought and believed to be deserved, demands that the profession deal justly with its brethren and the public interest and that it adequately recognize by its actions that its public positions can do harm as well as good. It requires that support of proposals be given only after the exercise of care commensurate with the risks involved. The public rightfully expects that both conduct and appearances demonstrate that the profession's purpose is to minister to justice and especially to scrupulously avoid any injustice resulting from its deliberations. The bar's response should be that the expectation is valid and will be satisfied in accordance with the high standards of a truly great profession. Such an answer would increase the esteem in which the association is held by the public. The organization would exert greater influence by its example in accordance with the bar's professions and the association's stated purposes. It would help to prove that the legal profession had a right to the claim of a great and learned profession that is determined to discharge fully its responsibilities to the public.

WITH OR WITHOUT PEEPHOLES, LET'S GIVE POSTAL EMPLOYEES PRIVACY IN THE MEN'S ROOM

Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that each of us has had occasion to complain to the Post Office Department about something.

On Monday of this week, for instance, the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HECHLER] objected strenuously to the use by postal inspectors of peepholes in post offices. While I cannot agree with everything the gentleman said about this kind of postal inspection, I surely agree that if there has been misuse of peepholes—such as to spy on union meetings—it must be halted.

However, the complaint against the Post Office Department which I wish to set forth today has less to do with peephole inspection tactics, and more to do with this question: Are not postal employees entitled to privacy when using some parts of the men's room in a post office?

Mr. Speaker, since September of 1958 I have been trying to get the Post Office Department to recognize this right of privacy in the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee. Although it might be said that a victory of sorts was scored, the right of privacy was not really secured, and the case of the doorless water closets is not closed.

The story can best be told by a chronological presentation of key letters in my correspondence file:

SEPTEMBER 24, 1958.

Col. FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR COLONEL JOHN: I write to call your attention to a situation in the new postal station at 12th and McKinley, which for all I know may be duplicated elsewhere. In the men's washroom the three toilets are without any front covering or other privacy device. The toilet room opens directly on the room used by postal employees for lunch, smoking, etc.

I can't imagine that this invasion of what seems an elementary right of privacy is necessary for the purposes of postal inspection against defalcation, particularly since many other areas in the building, such as the women's washroom and various closets, are not accessible to the inspector. Furthermore, I understand that there are many other postal installations without such lack of privacy.

I would be very hopeful that the matter can be cleared up, and proper doors installed locally, but if someone in Washington is responsible for this indignity, I will be obliged if you will tell me the man responsible. I shall appreciate your cooperation in this.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

OCTOBER 1, 1958.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to your letter of September 24, 1958, regarding toilet facilities at Hilltop station. The toilet room door opens directly from the swing room, however, there is a solid screen inside the toilet which eliminates any view of the toilet room and occupants from any person in the swing room.

The buildings leased for postal purposes are secured by the office of the regional real-estate manager. The details are, we believe, worked out by that office on standard specifications from the Post Office Department. We have no local control over contracts for, or construction detail of building for post office purposes. We are consulted as to location, space needed, etc. The matter of toilet stalls is probably one of nationwide policy and would not be changed at this level.

Your letter is being forwarded to the regional operations director, Minneapolis, Minn., for consideration.

Yours truly,

FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster.

OCTOBER 7, 1958.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: Reference is made to your letter dated September 24, 1958, addressed to the Postmaster, Milwaukee, Wis., wherein you raise a question as to the toilet enclosures not having doors at Hilltop station, Milwaukee, Wis.

The Post Office Department specifications require that open toilet enclosures be furnished for men and for that reason the existing facilities in Hilltop station are provided.

The purpose of this specification is to permit depredation inspectors to observe the activities of suspects in the case of pilfering of mail.

Sincerely yours,

C. E. KNUDSON,
Regional Operations Director.

OCTOBER 24, 1958.

Col. FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster, Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR COLONEL JOHN: This is in reply to your letter of October 1, 1958, to mine of September 24, in which you say, with reference to the toilet facilities at Hilltop Station, that "there is a solid screen inside the toilet which eliminates any view of the toilet room and occupants from any person in the swing room." I have been up to inspect the Hilltop station twice within the last few weeks. Of the three water closets, two are in full view, whenever the door is open, of people in the swing room; only the third and easterly water closet is protected by the screen in front of the door. I really think that the numerous Federal employees who must lunch in the room deserve something better. For a few dollars, a screen could be erected a few inches north of the water heater. This solution would not in any way interfere with the operation of inspectors. There are probably other perfectly good solutions, though this one would cost only a few dollars.

I'll much appreciate your cooperation.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

OCTOBER 29, 1958.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. REUSS: Your letter of October 24, 1958, regarding the swing room toilet facilities has been referred to the regional operations director, 512 Nicollet Avenue, Minneapolis 2, Minn., for necessary attention.

Sincerely yours,

FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.,
January 16, 1959.

Hon. HENRY REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Some time ago I approached you regarding the toilet facilities at the new Hilltop station post office. I was assured by you at that time that something would be done about it.

You made several visits to the new station and concurred that I had a just complaint.

To this date the situation remains the same, and the carriers at the station are asking when this condition is to be corrected.

As we all realize you were a very busy man during the campaign and the Post Office officials were also busy with the Christmas rush. I have not pursued the matter. Now that the rush is over, I hope something can be done about this situation.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER C. OHM.

JANUARY 19, 1959.

Mr. C. E. KNUDSON,
Regional Operations Director,
Post Office Department,
Minneapolis, Minn.

DEAR MR. KNUDSON: On October 24, 1958, I wrote Col. Frederick C. T. John, Milwaukee postmaster, concerning the inadequate toilet facilities at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee. I addressed a copy of this letter to you, and Mr. John by his October 29 letter indicated that my letter had "been referred to the regional operations director, 512 Nicollet Avenue, Minneapolis 2, Minn., for necessary attention."

Since more than 2 months have elapsed, and since the corrective measure I have suggested is such a simple one, I should appreciate a reply to my letter.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

JANUARY 21, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: Referring to your letter of October 24, 1958, addressed to Col. Frederick C. T. John, concerning the toilet facilities at Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee:

Inasmuch as your letter was addressed to Colonel John, this office did not reply, but returned the letter to Colonel John for his reply to you.

After talking with Real Estate Officer Knapp, who supervised the building of Hilltop station and who is thoroughly familiar with it, a recommendation, as per attached letter, was sent to Colonel John, as a means of eliminating the view of any toilets which might be seen from the swing room if by chance the door is left open.

In your letter of October 24, 1958, you suggested a screen could be erected a few inches north of the water heater. The assistant postmaster and superintendent of mails in Milwaukee advise that this is not feasible as it would cause undue congestion in the morning just prior to the time the carriers are due to leave the office and, further, it would block the entry to the location of the washbowls.

Additional study is being given this matter, and if a further solution can be reached you will be so advised.

Sincerely yours,

C. E. KNUDSON,
Regional Operations Director.

NOVEMBER 5, 1958.

POSTMASTER,
Milwaukee, Wis.:

Reference your letter of October 29, 1958, with enclosed letter from Congressman HENRY S. REUSS, concerning the need for a screen to provide privacy for the toilet facilities in the above postal station.

In view of the information you have furnished concerning the size and arrangement of the washroom in question, and after consultation with Real Estate Officer Knapp who is familiar with that building, it is suggested that lockers in the swing room outside of the washroom could be arranged in such a way as to form a screen in front of the washroom door. This would not take up any additional space in the swing room as the lockers have to be located there in any event.

I am returning the original copy of the Congressman's letter addressed to you.

JOHN K. STORR.

JANUARY 26, 1959.

Col. FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR COLONEL JOHN: I have now heard from Mr. Knudson of the Minneapolis regional office concerning the toilet facilities at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee. Mr. Knudson pointed out the recommendation made on November 5, 1958, after consultation with Real Estate Officer Knapp.

I am anxious that something satisfactory be done, whether in accord with the Knapp recommendation or otherwise. May I hear from you on this, please?

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

FEBRUARY 12, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: With reference to your letter of January 26, 1959, regarding the toilet facilities at Hilltop station. I have again gone over the situation at that point. Mr. F. E. Knapp, regional real estate officer, advised that a row of lockers could be placed in front of the door. He apparently overlooked the fact that the swing room is only 12 feet 6 inches by 18 feet 6 inches and has barely enough room to care for the two tables and necessary chairs and food vending equipment. No lockers have been placed in the swing room and it is not possible to place any at that point without discontinuing use of the swing room for eating purposes.

We are in a quandary as to just what can be done with the present physical arrangement of the building. We can, of course, remove the tables, employees' vending machines, etc., from the swing room and place this equipment in the northwest corner of the workroom floor. As many lockers as will fit into the swing room can be removed from the workroom floor to accomplish this.

We are loath to take this action however, as a somewhat unsanitary and at times unsightly condition could possibly be viewed by the public using the lobby. There is always, of course, the possibility that some of the employees' sensibilities will be offended even more by moving the swing room to the workroom floor than under the present arrangement.

We are reluctant to make any changes, particularly as the clerical as well as the carrier force are affected. We have had no complaints made to us by the clerical personnel regarding the present arrangement. The expense to the Department of any physical change in a new building does not appear warranted in this instance.

Yours very truly,

FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster.
By M. G. EBERLEIN,
Assistant Postmaster.

FEBRUARY 16, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: I enclose herewith a copy of the letter of Regional Operations Director Knudson of January 21, 1959, and a copy of Mr. Eberlein's letter of February 12.

Needless to say, I am most unsatisfied with the present position. I would like to be in a position of recommending something definite, and feel that first it should be a recommendation that meets with the approval of the carrier force and clerical personnel at the Hilltop station.

Would you give this some thought, discuss it with various others, and then be good enough to make some sort of recommendation to me, that I may follow through on it?

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., February 24, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: This is in reply to your letter of February 18 suggesting I consult with the carrier and clerical force in finding some solution as to what can be done about the toilet facilities at Hilltop station.

After careful discussion with the personnel we have come to the conclusion that the only remedy is doors.

If the toilets had been installed on the east or west walls, no doors would be necessary, but since the toilets are the first thing that faces you as you enter it is only fair and just that doors be installed. To install these doors would cost about $5 if plywood were used.

As all personnel do wash their hands before leaving the office I am sure you can understand what an awful sight it is to see three toilets in use staring you in the face in entering that washroom.

If the doors should take away the view from the walk above, I am sure that could be remedied by the lowering of the partitions between the toilets.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER C. OHM.

FEBRUARY 26, 1959.

Col. FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster, Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR COLONEL JOHN: This is in reply to your letter of February 12, 1959, through Mr. Eberlein, regarding the toilet facilities at Hilltop station.

From my discussions with both the carrier and clerical personnel at Hilltop station, I believe a reasonable and inexpensive remedy for the ignoble situation in the Hilltop swing room and washroom would be to install plywood doors in front of the three toilets. If these plywood doors should in any way obstruct the inspector's view from the walk above, that could be remedied by lowering the partitions between the toilets.

I am sure that these doors would not cost more than around $5 apiece, but if there is any difficulty about paying for them, I should be delighted to do so myself.

May I hear from you on this?

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MARCH 16, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: With reference to your letter of February 26, 1958, regarding the toilet facilities at Hilltop station. A personal visit was made to the office by the regional space requirements officer, regional real estate officer, the assistant postmaster, and general superintendent of mails. It was the considered opinion of the group that the complaint was hardly justifiable because of the fact that it is almost impossible to look into the toilet room from the swing room.

I believe the regional operations director has previously explained to you the reason that doors are not placed on the toilet room stalls in post office buildings.

Yours very truly,

FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster.
By M. G. EBERLEIN,
Assistant Postmaster.

MARCH 24, 1959.

Hon. ARTHUR E. SUMMERFIELD,
Postmaster General,
Post Office Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. POSTMASTER GENERAL: I regret that it has become necessary to write to you about such a matter as the toilet facilities at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee, Wis. However, since September 24, 1958, I have conducted a lengthy correspondence on this matter with the postal authorities in Milwaukee and the Minneapolis regional office of the Post Office Department. So far my efforts have resulted in nothing more than a fat file of no-action letters.

Let me say that I am fully aware of the need for postal inspectors to be able to see into toilet enclosures to observe the activities of suspects in the case of pilfering of mail.

However, I am sure you will agree that postal employees are entitled to reasonable privacy when using toilet facilities. You will agree, too, I believe, that other postal employees who are not using the toilet facilities should not have to look at those who are.

I have visited the Hilltop station in Milwaukee—a new station, by the way—and can assure you that there is no privacy in the men's toilet enclosures there. There are no doors on the three enclosures. Perhaps this would not be so bad, except that the men's toilet room opens directly on the so-called swing room where the postal employees eat their lunch, smoke, etc. The lunch eaters can hardly help but see the toilet users. This is a situation not calculated to improve digestion.

In my correspondence with the Milwaukee and Minneapolis postal authorities, mention has been made of a number of suggested remedies, but all have been discarded, on grounds of impracticability, expense, or what have you. Finally, in my letter of February 26, 1959, to Postmaster Frederick C. T. John, I offered to pay the cost of installing plywood doors on the three toilets. I quote from my letter to Postmaster John:

"From my discussions with both the carrier and clerical personnel at Hilltop station, I believe a reasonable and inexpensive remedy for the ignoble situation in the Hilltop swing room and washroom would be to install plywood doors in front of the three toilets. If these plywood doors should in any way obstruct the inspector's view from the walk above, that could be remedied by lowering the partitions between the toilets. I am sure that these doors would not cost more than around $5 apiece, but if there is any difficulty about paying for them, I should be delighted to do so myself."

The postmaster's reply of March 16, 1959, was another rejection of any suggestion for solving the situation.

I insist that there must be a satisfactory way to respect the privacy of postal employees without depriving postal inspectors of an adequate view of toilet enclosures. Something can, and in fact must be done about this situation. I urge you to see that something is done, promptly. May I hear from you?

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MARCH 26, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Thank you for your letter of March 24 concerning proper toilet facilities at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee, Wis.

I am requesting the Bureau of Facilities to look into this situation and write you direct as promptly as possible.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR E. SUMMERFIELD,
Postmaster General.

APRIL 15, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: The Postmaster General has requested this office to reply further to your recent letter concerning proper toilet facilities at the Hilltop station in Milwaukee, Wis.

Arrangements will be made to install an L-shaped partition to provide privacy when using toilet facilities.

Thank you very much for your interest.

For Assistant Postmaster General Barnard.

Cordially,

JACK E. GRANT,
Special Assistant to the Assistant Postmaster General.

APRIL 29, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: I am delighted to report that my last letter to the Postmaster General concerning proper toilet facilities at the Hilltop Station in Milwaukee is producing results.

I quote the following from a letter I have received from Jack E. Grant, special assistant to Assistant Postmaster General Barnard (Bureau of Facilities):

"Arrangements will be made to install an 'L' shaped partition to provide privacy when using toilet facilities."

I trust that this improvement will be made soon, and that it will be satisfactory to all concerned. Please let me know if this is not the case.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., May 4, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am sure happy to hear that progress is being made to rectify the toilet facilities at Hilltop station post office.

I also wish to thank you for all your efforts. Without your help I am sure the cause would have been a loss.

The last action took place about a month ago when a representative of the Minneapolis regional office came down and took some pictures, but I am sure that something is being planned.

I shall inform you of the progress as soon as they start.

Again, my heartfelt thanks.

Sincerely yours,

WALTER C. OHM.

MAY 5, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: Thanks for your letter of May 4. It was a long fight, but we seem to have won.

Please do let me know when they install the partition they spoke of. I think we ought to have a celebration when it happens. And if there is more delay in installing it, I'd like to know that, too.

With best regards.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., June 11, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I have been holding off writing to you in the hope that the toilet facilities at the Hilltop station would be corrected in a short time. It has now been a month since some worker came down and took measurements, but since that time nothing has been done.

May I again call on the assistance of your office in getting this job done. I am sure that a letter from your office would clear up this bottleneck which has been in our way for nearly a year and get the wheels of health and dignity going again at the Hilltop station.

After all the publicity in the papers I must answer the question I hear every day, "When is this situation going to be corrected?"

Hoping that your letter may again get us action, I remain,

Sincerely,

WALTER C. OHM.

June 12, 1959: Telephone call to Post Office Department by Reuss office protesting failure to install partition. Return call from Jack E. Grant, special assistant to the Assistant Postmaster General, stating that the partition was about to be installed. Several days later, another call from Grant stating the partition had been installed.

JULY 7, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: Some days ago I was advised by Jack Grant, special assistant to Assistant Postmaster General Barnard, that the partition had been installed at the Hilltop station. This was after I had again contacted the Post Office Department, following your last letter to me.

Since I have received assurances before from the Post Office Department which were not quite accurate, I am writing you to make sure that the partition has been installed, and to ask whether the solution is satisfactory. I certainly hope that it is, and only regret that it could not have been accomplished in far less time.

Sincerely,

HENRY R. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 10, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: I am in receipt of your letter of inquiry as to what has been done at the Hilltop station post office to rectify the still existing condition of our toilet facilities. I wish to inform you that nothing has been done as of this date.

Some weeks ago there was a man here representing the regional office and he suggested that our superintendent, Mr. Pautsch, consult with the personnel. Mr. Pautsch approached me and I suggested a partition be installed, and I also made a diagram of the kind of partition the boys would like installed, all to no avail as of this date.

Mr. Congressman, I realize your time is very valuable and the boys at the Hilltop station have a letter of thanks and appreciation ready to mail out as soon as they start on this great(?) small project.

Thanks again for your great interest in the welfare of the letter carrier.

Sincerely,

WALTER C. OHM.

July 16, 1959: Mr. Grant of Post Office Department stated in a telephone conversation that the Hilltop station partition would be in today without fail.

JULY 16, 1959.

WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.:

Post Office Department assures me that installation of Hilltop station partition will definitely be completed today. If it is not, please wire me collect. If it is, let us all say a prayer of thanks for eventual victory over bureaucracy.

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS.,
July 18, 1959, 5 p.m.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: As of this day and hour, no partition has been installed at the Hilltop station post office.

The owners of the building were in yesterday, July 16, and again took some measurements, but that was all that was done.

The partition they plan to install is not in the interest and welfare of the employees. The only remedy, as I suggested, is a partition in front of the lavatories or doors on the lavatories. As the toilet bowls were installed in front of the entrance I think the Department should go along and install a partition or doors in front of the toilets. As you know, there are 102 men using the washrooms and when they go in to wash their hands they still must set their eyes on these three toilets in use.

Mr. Congressman, we are still counting on you to see this through to a successful conclusion.

Sorry I could not answer by wire as my explanation would be too lengthy.

Enclosed find drawing of proposed partition.

Sincerely,

WALTER C. OHM.

JULY 20, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: I have your letter of 5 p.m., July 18, 1959, reporting that, despite the promises of the Post Office Department to me, nothing has been done at the Hilltop station except the taking of measurements for a partition that won't solve the problem.

Enclosed is a copy of a letter I wrote today to the Postmaster General (a copy of which also went to Mr. Grant, the man who has been giving me all of the false assurances of action).

Thanks very much for sending me the diagram. It refreshes my memory of the whole situation and makes more clear than ever that the real solution is doors.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

JULY 20, 1959.

Mr. JACK E. GRANT,
Special Assistant to the Assistant Postmaster General, Bureau of Facilities, Post Office Department, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. GRANT: I enclose a copy of a letter written today to the Postmaster General, concerning the continuing failure to provide privacy for persons using the toilet facilities at Hilltop station, Milwaukee.

I am sending you a copy in the hope that it may help to expedite the matter. I particularly call your attention to the fact that the partition which apparently is scheduled to be installed would not be a satisfactory answer to the problem.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

JULY 20, 1959.

Hon. ARTHUR E. SUMMERFIELD,
Postmaster General,
Post Office Department, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. POSTMASTER GENERAL: On March 24, 1959, I wrote to you, as a last resort, in an effort to get action on a matter that had even then been pending for 6 months—namely, the installation of doors or partitions to provide privacy for persons using the toilet facilities at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee, Wis.

Under date of April 15, 1959, Mr. Jack E. Grant, Special Assistant to Assistant Postmaster General Barnard, wrote me as follows: "Arrangements will be made to install an 'L' shaped partition to provide privacy when using toilet facilities."

This led me to believe that the situation would be remedied within a reasonable time. Imagine my shock, then, when I was told on June 12, 1959, by Hilltop station employees that nothing had been done. My office quickly contacted Mr. Grant. A day or two later he replied by telephone, stating that he had checked with Milwaukee and been advised that the partition had been installed.

Again I thought our troubles were over, Just to make sure, I wrote one of the Hilltop station employees on July 7, 1959, asking if everything was satisfactory. I could hardly believe it when I heard on July 13, 1959, that still nothing had been done. Again we called Mr. Grant. This time he replied, a couple of days later, that an absolute deadline had been set for completion of the installation of the partition at Hilltop station. That deadline was July 16, 1959. It was not met.

This morning I received another letter from a Hilltop station employee. What happened on July 16 was that some people came into the Hilltop station and took some measurements. Furthermore, I am advised that the partition for which they measured would not—even if it were ever installed—provide privacy for persons using the toilet facilities.

As I stated in my previous letter to you, I have visited the Hilltop station myself. I have observed this situation at firsthand.

For the life of me, I cannot see why it is not possible to install on each of the three toilet enclosures an inexpensive door that is low enough for the postal inspectors to see over, yet high enough to provide some privacy to persons using the toilets. I point out that the postal inspectors' observation post is elevated, so that they can look down upon the proceedings. Low doors or partitions would not block the inspector's view. But they would make it possible for someone to walk into the men's room to wash his hands without seeing three toilets totally exposed and in use.

If we can't solve this small problem to the satisfaction of all concerned, I really fear that we are all doomed. May I hear from you promptly?

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., July 23, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: Once again I must report to you on the toilet facilities at the Hilltop station.

The partition 30 inches wide was installed as per my diagram. When the boys look at that partition they get sick at heart and wonder just what kind of people can install such a monstrosity. I am sure that within a very short time someone will hurt his hand in opening and closing that door. When the washroom door is fully opened there is only 1⅜ inches between the door and the partition.

I hope that when Congress adjourns we may have the pleasure of once again having a visit from you to the new Hilltop station.

Sincerely,

WALTER C. OHM.

JULY 23, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: The Postmaster General has asked me to reply to your letter of July 20, with further reference to the Hilltop station in Milwaukee, Wis.

The installation of an L-shaped partition between the swingroom and the toilet room in the Hilltop station was completed on July 20. We regret the delay in completion of this partition from the time that Mr. Jack E. Grant in my office advised you that the action would be taken. However, as you know, this is a privately owned building and it was necessary for negotiations to be made with the owner of the property to install the partition and the owner's own arrangements to complete the work.

In your letter to the Postmaster General you have stated that you do not feel this type of partition provided adequate privacy. In this regard may I say that as a general policy in postal facilities throughout the country, completely private enclosures for toilets are not made. All facilities that have several toilets in the men's lavatory are provided with dividing partitions between the toilet locations, but doors are not installed in front of the toilet itself.

Your original correspondence pointed out the fact that men in the swingroom who were relaxing or eating their lunch could easily see into the toilet room and also see the occupants thereof. We certainly agree that this type of situation should be corrected.

The L-shaped partition which has been installed provides a baffle between the swingroom and the toilet room and provides the privacy which is found in similar facilities elsewhere.

Thank you for your continued interest.

Cordially,

ROLLIN D. BARNARD,
Assistant Postmaster General.

JULY 28, 1959.

Mr. ROLLIN D. BARNARD,
Assistant Postmaster General,
Bureau of Facilities,
Post Office Department,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BARNARD: I have your letter of July 23, 1959, concerning the toilets at the Hilltop postal station in Milwaukee, Wis.

I am advised that a partition of sorts (it is not "L" shaped but "I" shaped) has been installed in the swingroom, in front of the door to the men's room. No doubt this partition does block the view into the men's toilet room of those in the swingroom, satisfying in principle one of my complaints about the Hilltop station situation. (I am told, however, that between this partition and the open door of the men's room there is only a clearance of 1⅜ inches. If a Hilltop station employee should hurt his hand opening the door with this slim clearance, I would not be a bit surprised. I suspect someone's measurements were made with a yardstick that was short on one end or the other.)

With reference to your letter, I am pleased that the Post Office Department agrees with me that men in the swingroom relaxing or eating their lunch should not be able to see easily into the toilet room and also see the occupants thereof. Having agreed on this, can we not strive for a meeting of the minds on even more basic men's toilet policy in postal facilities?

The question as I see it is this: Must everyone entering this men's lavatory, just to wash his hands for example, be confronted with a full and wholly unimpaired view of the toilets and the occupants thereof?

You state that "as a general policy in postal facilities throughout the country, completely private enclosures for toilets are not made." There are dividing partitions between toilets, "but doors are not installed in front of the toilet itself."

At no time have I requested completely private enclosures for toilets. I understand, and have agreed, that postal inspection requirements rule out completely private enclosures. I assume that these inspection requirements are the only thing which rule out completely private enclosures. If there are other reasons, I should like to know them.

I hope we can agree that, under normal conditions, persons using toilets are entitled to privacy whether in a post office or anywhere else; and also that other persons using the same room are entitled not to see the occupants of toilet enclosures.

If I assume correctly that the one abnormal condition in a men's lavoratory such as at the Hilltop station is the inspection requirement, the question then becomes: How can we provide some privacy to toilet occupants; and some restriction of the view of other washroom users, without interfering with the postal inspector's view?

I do not think this an impossible question. At the Hilltop station, for instance, it was my own observation that the postal inspector's lookout point is elevated, near the ceiling of the washroom. While a full-size door, its top at a height of perhaps 6 feet above the floor, would no doubt block the inspector's view, it is my distinct impression that a half-size door, its bottom perhaps 15 inches from the floor and its top perhaps 40 inches high, would not hinder inspection, but would provide reasonable privacy. If necessary, the dividing partitions between the toilets could also be lowered. I am sure there would be no objection to this. The problem is really one of establishing some barrier between the toilet enclosures and the other areas of the washroom. Aside from half-doors along the lines I have described, an alternative is a partition inside the washroom, not outside. It could be set a minimum distance in front of the toilet enclosures, allowing entry to them. It, too, could be considerably less than six feet high, yet provide reasonable privacy without preventing inspection.

The Hilltop station in Milwaukee is one place where I am certain that one or the other measure suggested above is workable. I urge your full and prompt consideration of this matter, and ask a reply as soon as possible.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

JULY 30, 1959.

The Honorable HENRY S. REUSS,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. REUSS: On August 10, 1959, between the hours of 7 p.m. and 9 p.m., a dedication ceremony and open house have been planned for the new Hilltop station of the post office, located at 1301 North 12th Street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Because of your great interest in postal affairs, we feel sure that you would want to celebrate with us and the citizens of Milwaukee on this occasion.

You are cordially invited to attend.

Yours very truly,

FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Postmaster.

AUGUST 6, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN REUSS: Thank you for your letter of July, with further reference to Hilltop station of the Milwaukee, Wis., post office.

We regret that the partition which has been installed in the swingroom pursuant to your original request does not meet with your complete approval.

Your further suggestions with regard to installation of doors or other material to provide more privacy have been carefully reviewed. We find, however, that it is not possible to give favorable consideration to these suggestions. As mentioned in previous correspondence, divided partitions between toilets are considered to be adequate privacy. Closures are not installed on the front of the toilet area. We do not find reason to alter this policy in the case of Hilltop station.

Cordially,

ROLLIN D. BARNARD,
Assistant Postmaster General.

AUGUST 10, 1959.

Postmaster FREDERICK C. T. JOHN,
Care of Hilltop Postal Station,
Milwaukee, Wis.:

Regret congressional business keeps me from joining in dedication of Hilltop station. I heartily approve of the new station, except for lack of privacy in men's washroom, and intend to continue my efforts to correct that situation.

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

AUGUST 10, 1959.

Mr. WALTER C. OHM,
Milwaukee, Wis.

DEAR MR. OHM: This is with further reference to the men's washroom situation at the Hilltop postal station.

First, I enclose a copy of a telegram I sent to Postmaster John today for the dedication. I am much interested in knowing if Mr. John read the telegram at the ceremonies.

Second, enclosed is the latest letter from Assistant Postmaster General Barnard, which appears to be a total rejection of any suggestions for providing even a minimum of privacy in the men's washroom.

I continue to feel that the Post Office Department is being unnecessarily rigid in this matter. I intend to compile a full record of this case, and place it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that the full story will be told. Whether this will produce better results I do not know, but I hope so. If you have any other suggestions, please let me know.

Sincerely,

HENRY S. REUSS,
Member of Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., August 13, 1959.

Hon. HENRY S. REUSS,
House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: With reference to your letter of August 10, our dedication ceremony at the Hilltop station was quite a success, but the full content of your telegram was not read, only the congratulations and your regrets at not being able to be there. It was read by Supervisor Doyne (master of ceremonies). The speakers were two county supervisors, the postmaster, president of the Vliet Street Advancement Association, and a member of the Minneapolis regional office. Some of the boys took the supervisors around and showed them the conditions we have to contend with in using the washroom facilities. The officials here say it is out of their hands, to "see the regional men."

Mr. Congressman, in my 35 years as a letter carrier, I have always found the Post Office Department very eager to carry out the wishes of a Congressman. I think there is some single person who is at fault and I hope you will be able to single out that man and never forget him.

I think our request is a fair and just one. After all, this is not the Army at war. In private industry they certainly would not tolerate any man who plans toilet facilities as we have at the Hilltop station. It is my genuine opinion that the regional men drew up the plans, and they have no alternative but to put up a partition or doors to hide their mistake and give the men back their dignity and self-respect. It may be a good idea to invite some high post office official down here to see for himself.

Thanks again for your time and effort to correct this situation.

Sincerely,

WALTER C. OHM.

Mr. Speaker, there rests the battle of the Hilltop station men's room. If other Members of Congress have suggestions as to where we go from here, I would be delighted to receive them.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. LINDSAY, for 30 minutes, tomorrow.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK), for 10 minutes, today, and to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. PATMAN (at the request of Mr. MCCORMACK), for 30 minutes, on Wednesday and Thursday of next week, to revise and extend his remarks and to include extraneous matter, vacating his special orders for today and tomorrow.

Mr. JOHANSEN (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM), on January 25, 1960, for 1 hour.

Mr. VAN ZANDT (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM), on February 10, for 1 hour.

Mr. CONTE (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM), on January 21, for 10 minutes.

Mr. PUCINSKI, for 1 hour, on January 27, 1960.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. O'NEILL (at the request of Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts) and include extraneous matter.

The following Members (at the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM) were granted permission to extend their remarks in the RECORD and include extraneous matter:

Mr. BLATNIK.

Mr. BREWSTER and include extraneous matter.

Mr. RODINO.

Mr. ANFUSO.

Mr. SHELLEY.

Mr. SANTANGELO in two instances.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 19 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, January 21, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1707. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Civil Service Commission, transmitting the 38th Annual Report of the Board of Actuaries of the Civil Service Retirement System for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1958, pursuant to section 16 of the Civil Service Retirement Act (H. Doc. No. 316); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service and ordered to be printed.

1708. A letter from the Deputy Director, Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, Executive Office of the President, transmitting the quarterly report of Federal contributions for the quarter ending December 31, 1959, pursuant to the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1709. A letter from the Secretary of Defense, transmitting the annual report on the status of training of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and the progress made in strengthening of the Reserve components during fiscal year 1959, pursuant to section 279 of title 10, United States Code; to the Committee on Armed Services.

1710. A letter from the General Manager, U.S. Atomic Energy Commission, relative to the disposal of foreign excess property during fiscal year 1959, pursuant to section 404, 63 Stat. 398; 40 U.S.C. 514; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1711. A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting a report on the review of the financial assistance activities in five field offices of the Small Business Administration (SBA) made during the latter months of calendar year 1958; to the Committee on Government Operations.

1712. A letter from the Chairman, Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting copies of the final valuations of properties of certain carriers, pursuant to section 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1713. A letter from the Administrator, Federal Aviation Agency, transmitting the 14th annual report describing the operations of the Federal Aviation Agency under the Federal Airport Act, as amended, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1959; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

1714. A letter from the Administrative Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting the annual report of positions in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 under provisions of law other than section 505 of the Classification Act of 1949, as amended, pursuant to Public Law 854, 84th Congress; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

1715. A letter from the Chairman, U.S. Tariff Commission, transmitting the 43d Annual Report of the U.S. Tariff Commission, pursuant to the Tariff Act of 1930; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

1716. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report relating to the payment of claims for damage occasioned by vessels of the Coast Guard, which have been settled by the Treasury, pursuant to section 646(b) of title 14, United States Code; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1717. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report showing the payment of a claim to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. of Baltimore, Md., pursuant to 14 U.S.C. 646(b); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1718. A letter from the Commissioner, Immigration and Naturalization Service, U.S. Department of Justice, transmitting copies of orders entered in cases where the authority was exercised in behalf of such aliens, pursuant to the Immigration and Nationality Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 340. Resolution providing two additional assistants for the document room, Office of the Doorkeeper; without amendment (Rept. No. 1209). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 410. Resolution to amend House Resolution 136, 86th Congress, as amended by House Resolution 181, 86th Congress; without amendment (Rept. No. 1210). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRIEDEL: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 413. Resolution to authorize the expenditure of certain funds for the expenses of the Committee on Un-American Activities; with amendment (Rept. No. 1211). Ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHMORE:

H.R. 9761. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase from $1,200 to $2,400 the amount of outside earnings permitted each year without deductions from benefits thereunder; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9762. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to reduce to 30 the age at which an individual may become eligible for disability insurance benefits, and to provide that such benefits will be paid at a reduced rate to any individual who has not attained the present minimum age of 50; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BARRY:

H.R. 9763. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act so as to relax the severity of existing provisions with respect to deductions from benefits on account of earnings; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BERRY:

H.R. 9764. A bill to authorize the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to negotiate a new contract with the city of Sturgis, S. Dak., with respect to the use of the sewage facilities of such city by the Fort Meade Veterans' Hospital, Sturgis, S. Dak.; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. BASS of Tennessee:

H.R. 9765. A bill to provide for liberalized benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act for certain emergency workers and their survivors; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. CARNAHAN:

H.R. 9766. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DOYLE:

H.R. 9767. A bill to authorize the establishment of a Youth Conservation Corps to provide healthful outdoor training and employment for young men and to advance the conservation, development, and management of national resources of timber, soil, and range, and of recreational areas; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. GEORGE:

H.R. 9768. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to extend the period within which veterans may pursue programs of education and training based upon Korean conflict service, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. HECHLER:

H.R. 9769. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California:

H.R. 9770. A bill to provide increased retired pay for certain members of the uniformed services retired before June 1, 1958; to the Committee on Armed Services.

H.R. 9771. A bill to increase the authorized maximum expenditure for the fiscal years 1960 and 1961 under the special milk program for children; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. McDOWELL:

H.R. 9772. A bill to provide that withdrawals and reservations of public lands for nondefense uses shall take effect only upon certain conditions, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. CLEM MILLER:

H.R. 9773. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any Department or Agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. MOULDER:

H.R. 9774. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to increase benefit amounts, liberalize the work clause, provide disability insurance benefits without regard to age, and improve the earnings of the social security trust funds, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9775. A bill to amend title I of the Social Security Act to increase the amount of Federal funds payable thereunder to States which have approved plans for old-age assistance and which maintain their expenditures for such assistance at or above the 1959 level; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MULTER:

H.R. 9776. A bill for the relief of the city of New York; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. O'HARA of Michigan:

H.R. 9777. A bill to require air carriers to inspect for destructive substances all articles taken aboard certain aircraft operated by them in air transportation; to permit persons injured by failure of an air carrier to so inspect to bring an action for damages against the air carrier; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PUCINSKI:

H.R. 9778. A bill to amend section 601(a) of the Federal Aviation Act of 1958 so as to require air carriers to maintain route maps in conjunction with certain weather information for the benefit of their passengers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. RHODES of Arizona:

H.R. 9779. A bill authorizing the construction of certain improvements in the interest of flood control and allied purposes on the Gila and Salt Rivers, Ariz., from Gillespie Dam to Granite Reef Dam; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. RIVERS of South Carolina:

H.R. 9780. A bill to stabilize support levels for tobacco against disruptive fluctuations and to provide for adjustment in such levels in relation to farm cost; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. ROBISON:

H.R. 9781. A bill to repeal the laws imposing Federal control on agriculture; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. REUSS:

H.R. 9782. A bill to amend the National Housing Act to establish a new program of mortgage insurance designed to assist the financing of residential housing located in older urban neighborhoods; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SIKES:

H.R. 9783. A bill to determine the need for a canal across Santa Rosa Island, Fla., in the vicinity of Navarre to connect Santa Rosa Sound with the Gulf of Mexico; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. TEAGUE of Texas:

H.R. 9784. A bill to amend sections 706 and 744 of title 38, United States Code; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9785. A bill to provide for equitable adjustment of the insurance status of certain members of the Armed Forces; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9786. A bill to amend sections 511 and 512 of title 38, United States Code, to permit Indian war and Spanish-American War veterans to elect to receive pension at the rates applicable to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9787. A bill to amend section 314 of title 38, United States Code, to provide that an aid and attendance allowance of $150 per month shall be paid to certain paraplegic veterans during periods in which they are not hospitalized at Government expense; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9788. A bill to amend section 3104 of title 38, United States Code, to prohibit the furnishing of benefits under laws administered by the Veterans' Administration to any child on account of the death of more than one parent in the same parental line; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9789. A bill to amend chapter 19 of title 38, United States Code, to provide that a double indemnity feature may be included in policies of national service life insurance; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. TEAGUE of Texas (by request):

H.R. 9790. A bill to extend to veterans of the Spanish-American War, including the Philippine Insurrection and the Boxer Rebellion, eligibility for hospital care at Veterans' Administration facilities for any disability to the same extent as outpatient medical services are now furnished them; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9791. A bill to amend section 4108 of title 38, United States Code, to provide that persons rated as specialists in the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration shall not receive the 15-percent special allowance unless the specialty in which rated is usable in Veterans' Administration facilities; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 9792. A bill to amend section 4111 of title 38, United States Code, with respect to the salary of managers of Veterans' Administration hospitals, domiciliaries, and centers; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. ULLMAN:

H.R. 9793. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to broaden the definition of "disability" for individuals 60 years of age or over, to eliminate the requirement that an individual must attain age 50 to qualify for disability insurance benefits, and to provide that disabled individuals may become entitled to widows' or widowers' insurance benefits without regard to age; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HOGAN:

H.J. Res. 564. Joint resolution designating the fourth Sunday of September as Senior Citizens Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RODINO:

H.J. Res. 565. Joint resolution providing for the revision of the Status of Forces Agreement and certain other treaties and international agreements, or the withdrawal of the United States from such treaties and agreements, so that foreign countries will not have criminal jurisdiction over American Armed Forces personnel stationed within their boundaries; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts:

H. Con. Res. 463. Concurrent resolution favoring a general conference to review the United Nations Charter; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CELLER:

H. Res. 425. Resolution to provide funds for the Committee on the Judiciary; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. FARBSTEIN:

H. Res. 426. Resolution expressing the sense of the House with respect to the need for rapid and complete atomic disarmament; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TEAGUE of Texas:

H. Res. 427. Resolution to provide for the further expenses of the investigation and study authorized by House Resolution 101; to the Committee on House Administration.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ALBERT:

H.R. 9794. A bill for the relief of Chien-Min Wu; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9795. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Nellie Tilford; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BARRY:

H.R. 9796. A bill for the relief of the National Aircraft Maintenance Corp. and Howard E. Cox and the estate of Archibald Watson, deceased, sole stockholders of the National Aircraft Maintenance Corp.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. COHELAN:

H.R. 9797. A bill for the relief of Tom Fook Tin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mrs. GREEN of Oregon:

H.R. 9798. A bill for the relief of Joanin P. Demas; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOGAN:

H.R. 9799. A bill for the relief of Cynthia A. Patton; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. McDOWELL:

H.R. 9800. A bill providing for the award of the Congressional Medal of Honor to Dr. Thomas Dooley; to the Committee on Armed Services.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

315. By Mr. STRATTON: Petition of a group of employees of the Schenectady plant of General Electric urging the adoption of legislation providing for lowering of the age that a person may voluntarily retire and draw a full social security pension to 60 and exempting such pension from income tax; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

316. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the State central committeeman, Young Democrats, Long Beach, Calif., supporting S. 1138, the peacetime GI bill; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

Application of State Antidiscrimination Law—The Issue of Federal-State Relationships

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. E. L. BARTLETT
OF ALASKA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, on several occasions in the 1st session of the 86th Congress I expressed concern that the Department of State was represented as having advised the New York State Commission Against Discrimination that a ruling by the commission applying the fair employment law of New York to the hiring policies of the Arabian American Oil Co. in New York State would adversely affect U.S. interests abroad. My concern was for the maintenance of appropriate Federal-State relationships and for the human rights aspects of the matter. Accordingly, I initiated correspondence with the Department of State. Thereafter, and expressly in the light of this correspondence, a New York judge decided that New York fair employment law should be applied, holding that the Department of State had taken no stand on the case. To complete the story, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that three letters not previously published in the RECORD, which are an intrinsic part of the correspondence to which I have referred, be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 3, 1959.

The Honorable E. L. BARTLETT,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR BARTLETT: I have for reply your further letter of June 29 on the subject of the case of the American Jewish Congress v. The Arabian American Oil Company which has been under consideration before the New York State Commission Against Discrimination.

I appreciate the interest you have shown in discussing the Department's role in this matter during the course of our recent correspondence. As Mr. Josephson of your staff has undoubtedly informed you, he and representatives of the American Jewish Congress also examined the question in some detail in a meeting with Deputy Assistant Secretary Parker T. Hart on June 30.

It is my understanding that the matter will be heard before the Supreme Court of the State of New York on July 6. It is our feeling in the Department that it would not be appropriate for us to comment further on this case when a hearing of it before the New York courts is thus imminent. I am certain from your letter that you appreciate our position in this matter.

I assure you, however, that it is our desire to be appropriately helpful in resolving problems which arise out of actions by foreign governments which appear to discriminate against U.S. citizens. We shall, of course, be prepared to provide any further information on these problems which the commission or the court in New York may seek. I personally would also be prepared and pleased to discuss the Department's role in this case, as well as the general problem, directly with you at any time at your convenience.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

JULY 20, 1959.

Mr. WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary of State, Department of State, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MACOMBER: Thank you for your letter of July 3, to which I have withheld my response pending a decision in the New York litigation. Now that the court has held Aramco's questioning of job applicants in the city of New York about their religious beliefs to be a violation of the State law, it would seem that a personal conference between us on this subject would be unnecessary. Perhaps, indeed, the question of the Department's role has been rendered moot.

The opinion by the New York Supreme Court demonstrated the distinction between an order forbidding religious questioning and an order requiring the employment of Jews in Saudi Arabia. This distinction, which I sought to make in my correspondence with you, is essential. An order of the latter type was not sought in the New York litigation. The order of the former type, which was sought and granted, presented no conceivable damage to U.S. interests in the Middle East.

If the Department had not been involved deeply in the New York litigation, by reason of correspondence to the New York commissioner, your statement in your letter of July 3 that comment by the Department on the case "would not be appropriate" would have been unassailable. But because of the Department's involvement, I was seeking disengagement by the Department from the position in which it had been cast. Although I recognized the fact that the Department has never expressed itself on the precise issues involved in the New York litigation, I was aware that the Department had appeared to some to have assumed a policy position in the matter.

Sincerely yours,

E. L. BARTLETT.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 29, 1959.

Hon. E. L. BARTLETT,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. BARTLETT: I thank you for your letter of July 20 discussing the findings of the Supreme Court of the State of New York in the case brought by the American Jewish Congress against the Arabian American Oil Co. and the New York State Commission Against Discrimination. The Department has throughout the hearing of this case been appreciative of your comments and concern, particularly since we share your conviction that the proper policy of our Government must be to work for the elimination of any procedures adopted by foreign states which tend to discriminate against our citizens in any way, including discrimination on the basis of race or religion.

As stated in our earlier correspondence, this Department has consistently maintained the position that it would not be proper for it to comment on a case being heard in a State court. We did not do so in this case. Nor did we assume a policy position in the matter, our only connection having been to reply in a general sense, as we consider ourselves properly obliged to do, to a request for information received from the authorities of the State of New York.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

Revision of the Social Security Law

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Speaker, I think all my colleagues will agree with me when I say that one of the major, if not the major, issues facing the 2d session of the 86th Congress is revision of the social security law. Researches and on-the-scene surveys conducted throughout 1959 have demonstrated beyond question that our elderly citizens have suffered a steady deterioration so far as their income positions are concerned, and that this trend is certain to continue unless this Congress takes remedial steps.

In this connection, I should like to call my colleagues' attention to an anniversary that is being remembered and celebrated this month by millions of elderly citizens throughout the vast reaches of this great land.

Dr. Francis E. Townsend, who pioneered the pension movement in America, and still heads the organization he founded, was 93 years of age on January 13. Still hale and hearty despite his advanced years, the doctor is even at this moment engaged in a vigorous speaking tour on the west coast, urging upon his audiences the acceptance of the plan he fathered.

That plan is before this Congress in the form of my bill, H.R. 4000. It calls for universal retirement benefits to persons age 60 and older, and to certain other groups including the disabled and widows with dependent children.

This program, to be financed from the proceeds of a modest 2 percent tax on gross incomes, would result in monthly benefits of about $140, and would be paid as a matter of right. H.R. 4000, unlike the social security program, calls for genuine pay-as-we-go financing.

The genius of Dr. Townsend lies in the appeal of a dream which captured the imagination of millions of his fellow citizens some 25 years ago and today commands increased respect, not only among the aged people of this country, but now, too, among the students of the social security problem, and among those of us in this Chamber who have been elected to serve the best interests of our constituents.

It is fitting, therefore, that we pay tribute to Dr. Townsend on the occasion of his 93d birthday. It is given to few men to live so long and accomplish so much and earn the devotion of so many fervent followers. May he live to celebrate many another birthday—and to realize at long last the fruits of his efforts on behalf of his fellow Americans.

Senator Symington's Views on U.S. Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. DANIEL B. BREWSTER
OF MARYLAND
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Speaker, the safety and survival of the United States and its friends and allies in the non-Communist world surely overrides all other issues facing the 2d session of this 86th Congress.

I share the concern of many of our colleagues over the adequacy and wisdom of our present defense policies. We are all concerned over the extent of the lag in missile production and space technology. Certainly we must continue to work for an enforceable disarmament agreement, but in the interim—the United States must remain strong.

Senator STUART SYMINGTON, of Missouri, has dedicated much of his time to the study and evaluation of our defense posture. He is one of our country's outstanding experts in this field. Recently, on January 10, 1960, Senator SYMINGTON appeared on the "Meet the Press" program. Much of the program was devoted to exploration of the Senator's views on the state of U.S. preparedness. I am pleased to commend to our colleagues the transcript of that interview by a panel of veteran Washington correspondents.

Under permission to extend my remarks, I submit the transcript of the Sunday, January 10, 1960, "Meet the Press" television program. It is my hope that we will be able to approach this all-important issue without resort to partisan recrimination and with the emphasis on how best to keep America strong and free.

"MEET THE PRESS," SUNDAY, JANUARY 10, 1960

(Moderator, Ned Brooks; guest, Senator STUART SYMINGTON, Democrat, of Missouri; panel, Roscoe Drummond, New York Herald-Tribune; May Craig, Portland (Maine) Press Herald; Marquis Childs, St. Louis Post Dispatch; Lawrence E. Spivak, regular panel member.)

The ANNOUNCER. Ladies and gentlemen, we invite you to "Meet the Press," the unrehearsed program which has won every major award in its field.

Our guest today is Senator STUART SYMINGTON, of Missouri, chairman of the Special Agriculture Investigating Subcommittee which begins hearings early this week.

In just a moment Senator SYMINGTON will Meet the Press.

Now "Meet the Press," produced by Lawrence E. Spivak.

Remember that the questions asked by the members of the panel do not necessarily reflect their point of view. It is their way of getting the story for you.

Now here is the moderator of "Meet the Press," Mr. Ned Brooks.

Mr. BROOKS. Welcome once again to "Meet the Press."

Our guest today is Senator STUART SYMINGTON, of Missouri. He is one of the five Democrats most frequently mentioned as possible nominees for President.

In the new session of Congress, Senator SYMINGTON will play an important role. He has earned a reputation as a critic of administration defense policies and he is now proposing a program for reorganizing the Defense Department.

He is the chairman of an investigating committee which on Tuesday will begin a far-reaching examination into the operations of the Government's farm program.

Senator SYMINGTON was appointed as the first Secretary of the Air Force when that position was created in 1947. He was first elected to the Senate in 1952. Senator SYMINGTON recently returned from an extensive trip which included Africa and the Middle East.

And now seated around the press table ready to interview Senator SYMINGTON are Marquis Childs of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch, May Craig of the Portland (Maine) Press-Herald, Roscoe Drummond of the New York Herald Tribune, and Lawrence E. Spivak, our regular member of the "Meet the Press" panel.

Now, Senator, if you are ready, we will start the questions with Mr. Spivak.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, I would like to assume what everyone else in the political know takes for granted, and that is that you are being seriously advanced for the Democratic presidential nomination, and I would like to ask you some questions on some of the major issues that face us. First, the question of disarmament. While the rest of the world is talking about and hoping for disarmament, you keep hammering away on the question of armament.

Will you tell us where you stand on the question of disarmament?

Senator SYMINGTON. Mr. Spivak, in 1955 I introduced a resolution which was passed unanimously by the Senate, and the resolution was one of universal disarmament. Nobody can be more for disarmament than I am. On the other hand, I believe it would be wrong and not in the best interests of my country to disarm unilaterally in the face of growing Communist strength.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, do you think we can make any kind of disarmament agreement with the Soviet Union today that would be safe for the free world?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, I would hope that we could, and I think that it is important that we continue to try. But on the other hand, I think that we have to do two things: First, work for general disarmament, and secondly, be careful that in our desire to obtain a real disarmament agreement we don't sign one that might leave us in a position where it could be violated without our knowing it.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, specifically on nuclear weapons testing we have carried on negotiations now for over a year and the Russians seem to be getting exactly what they want and that is a test ban without inspection.

How long would you continue these negotiations if they continue in this present vein?

Senator SYMINGTON. For 14 months we haven't been testing and for 14 months the Russians have not been testing. It worries me a great deal because as the months go by our experts say continuously that we cannot tell increased size tests on their part if they want to cheat.

I am willing to leave this matter in the hands of the President who says that he has now abandoned the idea of just agreeing to an indefinite extension.

I would hope that we reach an agreement soon because the American people should realize that the longer it is that we have no agreement and yet do not test, the longer, provided the Russians are cheating, the longer we are giving up and therefore in effect disarming unilaterally.

Mr. SPIVAK. You think, then, if we don't get an agreement soon we ought to go back at least to underground testing?

Senator SYMINGTON. I do think we ought to go back to underground testing, yes; provided in the reasonably distant future we don't get an agreemeent that we consider the right agreement.

Mr. DRUMMOND. To touch on one more aspect of the test ban thing, in your judgment and in your knowledge, is there any method of verification that would be adequate to detecting underground testing?

Senator SYMINGTON. Mr. Drummond, the amount of blast that could not be detected has increased to my certain knowledge in the minds of the experts, 20 times in the last year. Now we are talking "underground," in addition to which there is a great new field of testing in which there is a growing apprehension that we would not be able to detect and that is the field of space. For example, something that was tested halfway to the moon.

Therefore, again I say that all of us are looking toward peace and believe that the best way to get peace is through some form of agreement in this field and all the fields of armament. On the other hand I do think that based on the record we have to proceed with care.

Mr. DRUMMOND. Speaking of space, former President Truman and Senator MANSFIELD this afternoon said that they thought that the Soviet use of the Pacific for rocket testing was an act of arrogance.

Now I'd like to ask whether you think the Pacific is a proper area for rocket launching and what do you believe is the purpose of the proposed Soviet rocket test?

Senator SYMINGTON. Without getting too much into possibly classified territory, I think it shows that fairly soon, based on the orbit they get in the place that they now plan to test, fairly soon they plan to put a man in space. Where they plan to throw these missiles, now, is about 1,100 miles from Pearl Harbor. They are getting closer in their relationships in the space field to our newest State. They are not, however, nearly as close, perhaps, as they are in some other places in the world where the governments appear to be leaning their way.

Mrs. CRAIG. Senator, the President gave us a rather optimistic picture of our defense in his state of the Union message. Does that agree with your knowledge of our own military position?

Senator SYMINGTON. No, Mrs. Craig. I think the President was misinformed in some of the things he told the American people with respect to our defenses.

Mrs. CRAIG. For instance he spoke of our Atlas situation. How much ready intercontinental missiles do we have, do you know?

Senator SYMINGTON. Yes; I do know, but I don't think I should say so on this program. I do think, however, that his statement as to what our position was was oversanguine.

Mrs. CRAIG. Could you give us some idea then perhaps in relation to what you know the Russians have?

Senator SYMINGTON. It has been acknowledged by this administration a year ago, after we corrected some of the statements that were made by some officials, it was acknowledged, admitted that the plan was to allow the Russians to get a lead of 3 to 1. That is what they said the lead would be. Personally I feel that the plans mean that their lead will be greater than 3 to 1. Inasmuch as we have not deviated from our announced plans by the Secretary of Defense at that time, it should be clear to all Americans that we are further behind than we were a year ago in the defense missile field.

Mrs. CRAIG. The President was rather optimistic about the Polaris nuclear subs. How many of them do we have ready?

Senator SYMINGTON. Again I wouldn't want to give the exact figures but I do agree with you that he was misinformed with respect to the statements he made about that weapon also.

Mrs. CRAIG. Well, if he isn't informed, who misinformed him?

Senator SYMINGTON If I was in his position I would be interested in finding out.

Mrs. CRAIG. Well, Senator, that is an extraordinary statement to say the President the Commander in Chief, is misinformed and doesn't know what he is talking about.

Senator SYMINGTON. I didn't say the latter; you did. I did say that I was sure he had been misinformed in some of the statements that he had made in his talk.

Mrs. CRAIG. Does it not follow if he is misinformed, that he doesn't know what he is talking about?

Senator SYMINGTON. You made that statement, not I.

Mr. BROOKS. Senator, could you cite a specific example of where he was misinformed?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, Mrs. Craig brought up two. One was in what he said about the missiles and the other was what he said about the Polaris submarines

Mr. CHILDS. Well, just to push that a moment further, Senator, how long can the American public take this screen of security—I know you referred to classified information. Shouldn't the public know if the President is misinformed and isn't it your duty to tell us?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Childs, in our form of government, one in a position like mine—a Senator from Missouri—has to be very careful about releasing classified information.

However, I want to say this: The American people now know from this administration that we are well behind in the missile field, even further behind in the space field, and that our plans are to remain that way and get worse.

Now I am amazed that the President in his statement points out that we are going to have the most prosperous year in our history next year, that we are going to have a $4½ billion surplus and at the same time these plans to let the Russians continue their relative growing strength against ours continue. And I'd like to just also say that I don't argue about the fact that under our form of government they have the right to consider the balancing of the budget more important than national security, but I do think that it is unfortunate that the people are not given the facts as to the nature of their actions to that end and the degree that we are falling behind.

Mr. CHILDS. I would like to ask you about that surplus, too, Senator. I gather you would not use that to reduce the national debt, that $4.2 billion, if such a surplus does materialize, is that right?

Senator SYMINGTON. I don't think there is anything more important in the world today than this country, the last great bastion against communism, keeping equal in strength with the Russians. Physically, economically, technologically, psychologically—of course spiritually where we already have a great advantage. Therefore unless they want to reorganize the Department of Defense, to wring out the waste over there that everybody knows is there, and get a new setup, which I am introducing a bill on as soon as I can get the floor, you might say, and unless they want to correct some of the other places in government where we are not having good administration and get the money that way, I most certainly would take that excess the President talks of, that surplus that he talks of, and put it into increasing our defenses.

Mr. CHILDS. Don't you then lay yourself open to the charge of being a spender and willing to unbalance the budget and contributing to our inflation?

Senator SYMINGTON. I don't think that whether we balance the budget, or many of our other plans, will mean much in this world unless we maintain our guard. Nobody wants peace in the world more than I do. Nobody wants peace more than any citizen with common sense. Your only problem is as we move to the summit next May, for example, with the great psychological, technological and physical accomplishments recently of the Soviet, do you have a better chance to negotiate that just and lasting peace we hope for at the summit for example, if you negotiate from a position of relative weakness or one of relative strength. To me that is the most important avenue to peace that we have in the world today.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, you have said there is a great deal of waste in the Defense Department. Am I to understand, then, that if you were President of the United States you wouldn't spend more for defense, that you really would spend less for defense?

Senator SYMINGTON. I would spend more for defense right now. But on the other hand, I would have a single war plan. I'd try to eliminate the constant bickering and arguing and differences between the services by having a single Chief of Staff. I'd have a single war plan, I'd change the service Secretaries to Under Secretaries under the Secretary of Defense so as to build up the latter's authority and I would have a personnel transfer in grade. In other words, I would run the situation on the basis of good business practice instead of letting it drift the way it is today, in tradition.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, when you speak of waste in the Defense Department, is that just a generalized charge or do you know pretty specifically that there is sizable waste and that something could be done about it?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, Mr. Spivak, you know that. You could name item after item, that because of the disagreements, has been canceled or held back, started and stopped. Things like the Bomarc, things like the Seamaster, the Navaho—here we are today canceling hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars of development and research items because each service is being allowed to try to fight the next war by itself.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, Senator, in fact isn't the whole Defense Department a wasteful Defense Department as long as it keeps this in peace—isn't there constant obsolescence? I mean don't you have to research and maybe waste money in research?

Senator SYMINGTON. That is true, that is true, of course. On the other hand, there is no reason why the organizational setup shouldn't be on a basis where the taxpayer gets the most return for his dollar. And in answer to the way you asked the question in the beginning, I would immediately start spending more, for example, in the space field. The degree that we are behind in thrust is almost incredible and yet last year we cut by tens of millions of dollars the one big thrust program we had, the Saturn. I would spend money quick there and I would accelerate these important programs and I'd modernize SAC.

On the other hand, I also would attempt to streamline that Department so that as soon as possible you are beginning to get true defense for your dollar.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, you have spent a great many years studying defense. Do you have any idea how much you could save and how much you would spend if you were the President?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, I think you could save—and I am on the record as having said I thought you could save 30 percent of the budget. That was when I was pretty close to the Department. If that was only half right today you would save $100 million a week.

Mr. DRUMMOND. Senator, on this program last Sunday, Senator KENNEDY said that if any Democratic leader was unwilling to submit his candidacy to the test of a representative primary, that that Democratic leader would not deserve well of the next national convention.

I'd like to ask whether you share that view.

Senator SYMINGTON. Mr. Drummond, some time back when some of my friends in New Hampshire asked me if I would go into that primary, I had to make a decision: namely, would I go into primaries or would I not.

Now I know something about primaries. When I first ran for the Senate I was in a primary for 7 months, I believe, and I was in it 7 days a week. My State doesn't have presidential primaries. Only about a third of the States do have these presidential primaries, and less than 10 percent of the States have presidential primaries that are binding.

Anybody can have their own ideas as to the importance of primaries. I have decided not to go into any primaries, at least at this time. And as to whether they should be abolished or not, I wouldn't want to criticize anything that another State had set up. In my State we don't happen to have it and in two-thirds of the States they don't happen to have primaries.

Mrs. CRAIG. Senator, Cuba is only 90 miles from Florida. Do you think that the present Government of Cuba is under Communist influence, dangerous to us?

Senator SYMINGTON. Mrs. Craig, I have it on good authority that Communist influence in Cuba is growing steadily and I know that those people in our Government who should be worrying about it are very worried indeed. As you say it is 90 miles from the United States and that is getting pretty close. It also has one of the world's greatest naval bases at Guantanamo and of course anything that they are doing there could be supplied by submarines anyway.

Mrs. CRAIG. Yes. I wanted to ask you about that. Do you believe that there are submarines hiding on the Cuban coast now?

Senator SYMINGTON. I have heard that but I haven't heard it from such source that I could answer your question formally.

Mrs. CRAIG. Do you think there are missile bases there?

Senator SYMINGTON. I would rather not comment on that question, frankly.

Mr. CHILDS. Senator, getting back to this matter of politics, I checked up a few figures and found you traveled in the fall 32,000 miles and spoke in 22 States. I wonder if it would be fair to call you an active but unavowed candidate. Could that be?

Senator SYMINGTON. First let me answer this way, if I might. In 1958 I had another decision to make also and that was did I speak out of my State or did I not, and I decided not to go out of Missouri, and I didn't during the entire year.

Many of my colleagues and many other good Democrats came in to help me. Therefore when I am asked to go around and help the Democratic Party at fund raising dinners and others, why I do.

Now specifically answering your question, I am not actively seeking delegates at this time. I am interested in the general subject.

Mr. CHILDS. I would like to ask you about another unavowed candidate, if I may use that phrase. When we had Governor Brown on this program, he was asked about Senator LYNDON JOHNSON. He said he thought he would have a handicap in the North because of oil and gas and the integration issue.

I wonder if you would agree with that?

Senator SYMINGTON. I think that a man can only speak for his own State. In my State where Senator JOHNSON talked recently and met with the leaders, he had a great deal of support.

Mr. CHILDS. You believe he could carry Missouri?

Senator SYMINGTON. Well, he can certainly carry Missouri over any Republican.

Mr. CHILDS. Does this mean, Senator, that you don't think the North-South division in your party is important and you could nominate a southerner to run for President of the United States?

Senator SYMINGTON. I don't think there is a North-South division in my party. Only once has the South left the party since I have been reasonably active in politics. In that case President Truman still won the nomination and the election and I would hope that geography woudn't play too prominent a part or be a decisive matter in the choosing of a President. I would hope the way the world is today that the United States as a country will stay together and that we will pick the best man for the job regardless of where he lives. I think never more true was this statement of Benjamin Franklin's as we watch this situation, as I have noticed it over the world in recent weeks: "If we don't all hang together now we are going to hang separately."

Mr. CHILDS. Wasn't that Patrick Henry?

Senator SYMINGTON. I think it was Benjamin Franklin.

Mr. SPIVAK. You have said you are not a candidate for the presidential nomination. Would you tell us whether you would like to be President in 1960?

Senator SYMINGTON. I certainly would like to be President in 1960. I think anybody in politics would like to be President in 1960. It is going to be a rough job but the way things are going now I would hope we could put a brake and turn this country on the right keel from the standpoint of making us strong so that we can stay free.

Let me emphasize by strength I don't mean just physical strength, I mean all the other strengths.

I believe the one way that we can assure peace in the world is for the United States and its allies to get together and remain strong.

Mr. SPIVAK. Senator, I would like to ask you another question, which I hope you won't consider a too personal question, but your critics are saying that you are all things to all men and are able therefore to get equally strong support in groups in sharp controversy with each other: the segregationists and the anti-segregationists; labor and capital; conservatives and liberals. How do you answer that charge that has been made against you, and it has been made as a charge against you?

Senator SYMINGTON. First, Mr. Spivak, they don't say it to me and secondly, I know of no issue that I haven't voted on and taken a position on and I think the charge is totally unwarranted. My voting record I believe proves it and I naturally am sorry that people say it. There is no justification, no proof of any kind for it. I regret that some people have said it.

Mr. SPIVAK. Well, Senator, do you think that it is necessarily bad for you to be endorsed by the ADA and to be a favorite of the Chamber of Commerce, for example? This is for example from Harpers: "He is at home with the ADA and is far from unwelcome at the same table at the luncheon of the Chamber of Commerce."

Another one from the New York Post: "He can also apparently persuade liberals that he is a chip off the New Deal block and conservatives that he is as solid as a Hoover dollar."

Senator SYMINGTON. One of the last things my father-in-law said to me before he died, and he was a great American as well as a great Senator, was that politics was not a science, it was an art. It was the art of getting along with people. I do my best to get along with as many people as I can. Never once has that changed my convictions on an issue.

Mr. DRUMMOND. Senator, recently two political people, Governor Rockefeller and Senator Kennedy, have made it clear that they simply wouldn't consider, have anything to do with the vice presidential nomination. I am not going to ask whether you would accept the vice presidential nomination because I think nearly everybody could know the answer.

What I want to ask you is, do you think that either party ought to nominate a vice presidential candidate who is not qualified to be the presidential nominee?

Senator SYMINGTON. I do not.

Mr. DRUMMOND. Do you think that there is much prospect that either party will do that?

Senator SYMINGTON. I would not, Mr. Drummond. Naturally as you know, the vice presidential decision is one that is generally made, you might say "at the last minute."

On the other hand I would hope that the Vice President of the United States next time is a man who is fully capable, the way the world is, of being a good President.

Mr. BROOKS. I think with that future in mind, Senator, I will have to call a halt to the proceedings. I am sorry to interrupt but I see that our time is up.

Thank you very much, Senator Symington, for being with us. We will be back with Meet the Press in just a moment. First this message.

The ANNOUNCER. Meet the Press brings you leading world figures at a time when what they say or do is important in the news.

Next week only, Meet the Press will be seen over many of these stations at one p.m. eastern standard time because of the pro ball game. Consult your local TV listings for exact time in your area. Our guest will be the Secretary of Agriculture, Ezra Taft Benson, the most controversial member of the Eisenhower Cabinet.

If you have enjoyed today's program, you may wish to receive a printed copy of the questions and answers. In just one minute, we will tell you how you may get your transcript.

For a printed copy of today's discussion send ten cents in coin and a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Merkle Press, 801 Rhode Island Avenue, Northeast, Washington 18, D.C.

And now goodby for Senator STUART SYMINGTON and Meet the Press.

Meet the Press was produced by Lawrence E. Spivak; directed by Frank Slingland; associate producer, Betty Cole; technical director, Leon Chromak; production supervisor, Doris Corwith.

This is Lee Dayton speaking.

Need for Revision of Status of Forces Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF

HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a bill requesting the President to revise existing treaties to preclude foreign countries from taking jurisdiction over members of our Armed Forces stationed overseas.

This is hardly a new proposal in the Congress. I personally have been urging this resolution since 1955. Two years later the Girard case came to public attention and there was renewed support for a revision of our policy.

This is now 1960. Our boys are still subject to foreign jurisdiction under treaties which have remained the same despite congressional protest.

I feel very strongly that it is time we renewed that protest. The Girard case, which pointed up the problem so dramatically, was hardly an isolated incident. The list of less-publicized examples continues.

I am requesting the Department of Defense to supply me with data on the number of our servicemen who are currently serving jail terms in foreign countries, and I shall make that data available as soon as I receive it.

The reasons for my resolution have been too often described for me to discuss them in detail at this time. It remains basically unfair, regardless of constitutionality, to draft our young men into military service and then unceremoniously abandon them to the vagaries of foreign jurisdictions, which may or may not adhere to our concepts of justice and fairplay.

I was personally familiar with a case of a young serviceman from my district who, several years ago, narrowly escaped British execution on evidence which turned out to be not only flimsy, but inaccurate. As I said in a statement at that time, the fact that this could happen in a judicial system so much like ours suggests strongly what coud happen, and does happen, under systems which are far more dissimilar.

Perhaps the greatest problem which the serviceman who is tried in a foreign court must face is the hostile sentiment which often makes conviction inevitable. Further, this conviction, which may be based as much on the hostile temper of the court as on available evidence, is frequently the basis for discharging that man from the service under less than honorable conditions.

I feel very strongly that we cannot, in all conscience, permit this situation to continue.

I do not believe that these treaties, as is frequently alleged, are necessary to the conduct of our foreign policy. To the contrary, I feel that the passions which are periodically aroused, whenever a foreign court tries a serviceman accused of a serious crime, do far more to strain our normal relations with our allies than would result were these cases turned over as a routine matter to our own military authorities.

Again, I want to emphasize that, although the Girard case is a thing of the past, this issue is as pressing today as it was in 1957. I therefore urge that this matter be given the serious and immediate attention it deserves.

Putting in Your "2 Cents Worth"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.
OF MASSACHUSETTS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege and a pleasure for me to bring to the attention of my colleagues in the House an article which appeared in the December 1959–January 1960 issue of Topics which was authored by our distinguished and beloved majority leader, the Honorable JOHN W. MCCORMACK.

It is a simple yet eloquent statement on a subject which is very close to all of us written by one of the most sincere and splendid Americans ever to sit in this Chamber. I am sure that you will find the following of great interest, and I am more than happy to be able to place it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

Americans have a way of expressing their views in down-to-earth, simple terms, and one of these phrases is: "I put in my 2 cents worth."

Putting in our 2 cents worth, or expressing our individual opinions, can be vitally important to the future of our country.

Americans have a God-implanted love of free speech, but I have observed during my service in Congress that too few of our citizens take advantage of this privilege of speaking up on Government matters.

A reason may be that many people believe their Congressman does not welcome a letter or a telephone call from a citizen who has an opinion on some past, pending or future matter. May I correct this mistaken idea as simply and as clearly as possible? Every Congressman welcomes the opinion and counsel of our citizens because his primary job is to do just that: represent our people in the Government of our country. To do this well, the Congressman must know what his people are thinking, and the more opinions he gets the better will be his decisions. Public opinion is a very important factor in a democracy.

The very basis of our Government is built around people. What we call politics, elections, legislation—all are attuned to one great determinant, the voice of the people or public opinion.

The people created America, and the people—you and I—must continue to watch over and improve the country our forefathers built and our contemporaries are building. This is our duty and our greater obligation.

As a country, we decided long ago to place this responsibility upon our citizens. Freedom for all was the fruit of this decision, but freedom carries with it the cost of widespread citizen interest and participation in the affairs of Government.

One of the best ways to fulfill your duties of active citizenship, of course, is to help elect the man or women of your choice to public office. But do not stop there. Let me encourage you to take the next step. Keep the persons who represent you in Government informed of your views throughout the year. This is an equally important responsibility in our democratic form of government.

Sometimes I think it might be well if we erected a large sign over Congress which contained this thought: Here the opinions of all Americans are heard—and should be heard—with equality. As a result, the sense of their proposals becomes the law of the land.

Or perhaps we should put it in more typical American language: Here your 2 cents worth does make a difference.

JOHN W. MCCORMACK,
Member of Congress.

National Safety Council and American Merchant Marine Institute Honors MSTS Crew of USNS "Pendleton"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN F. SHELLEY
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. SHELLEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter I have sent to Admiral Gano, commander, Military Sea Transportation Service, commending his gallant crew on their great seamanship during the rescue of 24 Japanese fishermen who survived the sinking of their ship a year ago. I also include the names of the crewmen who reside in San Francisco and clippings detailing this great exploit in the annals of maritime history. I am now and always have been proud of our MSTS service and their brave officers and seamen. May I commend to your attention these items:

Vice Adm. ROY A. GANO,
U.S. Navy, Commander Military Sea Transportation Service, Department of the Navy, Washington, D.C.

DEAR ROY: With the presentation of the National Safety Council and American Merchant Marine Institute Special Award of Merit to the skipper and crew of the USNS Pendleton, national attention has once again been drawn to the magnificent seamanship of the men under your command.

The rescue of all 24 of the Japanese fishermen who survived the sinking of their sampan Chiyo Maru a year ago December has already become a legend of the sea. It is rightly fitting that the National Safety Council and the American Merchant Marine Institute should single out Capt. Hans C. von Weien and his brave and skillful crew for this honor.

I wish I had been back in my hometown of San Francisco when the award was presented and been able to have taken part in honoring the splendid seamen whose courage and devotion to duty exemplify the highest standards of seamanship which are characteristic of the Military Sea Transportation Service.

JOHN F. SHELLEY,
Member of Congress.

CREW MEMBERS ON BOARD USNS "PENDLETON" ON DECEMBER 18, 1958

PRESENT ASSIGNMENT

Name and address

Fred S. Crowley, Jr., radio officer, 49½ Caselli Avenue, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Modesto L. Lauriano, Carpenter, 639 Excelsior Avenue, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Enicirio A., Adam, able seaman, 5 Porter Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Archie F. Moromisato, ordinary seaman, 1990 Sutter Street, San Francisco; RIF January 1, 1960.

Chee T. Wong, ordinary seamen, 2248 Mason Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Hom B. Pon, ordinary seaman, 728 Montgomery Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Murray W. Jewett, first assistant engineer, 903 Pine Street, San Francisco; receiving section.[1]

Hugh I. Morrison, third assistant engineer, 121 Yukon Street, San Francisco; receiving section.[1]

Shee H. Yip, fourth assistant engineer, 1170 Powell Street, San Francisco; Miller.

Wayne F. Wagner, licensed junior engineer, 938 Geary Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Gasper F. Ferro, oiler, 576 Geary Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Carroll L. Main, oiler, 1955 Quesada Avenue, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Donald Chew, oiler, 1464 Leavenworth Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Aurelio Ducosin, fireman-watertender, 654 Capp Street, San Francisco; receiving section.[1]

Damian A. Aguilar, fireman-watertender, 1351 Stockton Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Cornelio M. Manay, wiper, 1503 Scott Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Salvador P. Gancero, wiper, 281 Santos Street, San Francisco; Patrick.

Water L. Reed, second cook-baker, 235 Prague Street, San Francisco; Patrick.

Cornelio Villafuerte, assistant cook, 350 South Van Ness Avenue, San Francisco; retired May 31, 1959.

Rofino C. Forges, messman, 935 Kearny Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

Cleto J. Mercado, messman, Post Office Box 1028, San Francisco; Pendleton.

[1] Awaiting reassignment.

Donato H. Visico, utility, 1478 Hudson Avenue, San Francisco; Breton.

Henry C. Verano, utilityman, Post Office Box 7073, San Francisco; Patrick.

Manuel G. Carreon, utilityman, 234 Linden Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

George, Cowans, utilityman, 1084 McAllister Street, San Francisco; Pendleton.

ADRIFT 29 HOURS—"PENDLETON" RESCUES 24 JAP FISHERMEN

In June 1944, the Mandan Victory slid down the ways to join the fleet of supply ships which helped win the war in the Pacific. Later, renamed the Sgt. Jack J. Pendleton, she worked for the old Army Transportation Corps, and in January 1950, she joined MSTS. Little of excitement or special note happened to her from then until last December when she picked up this message from Pac:

"Fishing boat Chiyoh Maru, 148 tons, 25 crew, large hole in hull, flooding seriously. S O S received. Position 17–48 N., 161–25 E. Divert to position. Render assistance as necessary."

The U.S.N.S. Pendleton acknowledged the message and altered course while her crew made preparations for picking up survivors. Next word from the Pendleton came 28 hours later when her new skipper, Capt. Hans C. Von Weien, sent this message:

"* * * picked up entire crew Chiyoh Maru. Twenty-four members all aboard at 18130Z. No apparent injuries. Men taken from makeshift raft. * * *"

With the 24 fishermen safely aboard, the U.S.N.S. Pendleton set course for Guam. Their raft, which was left adrift, was described by Captain Von Weien. It consisted, he said, of four oil drums, various wooden boxes and fishing balls, held together by a fish net. It provided standing room only and rode the waves in sections. Once aboard the Pendleton, the Japanese, who had been adrift for 29 hours, luxuriated in fresh-water showers and were given cigarettes and $5 apiece by the crew.

At Guam the Pendleton and her crew received heroes' welcome, including a Navy band at dockside and a 25-foot banner hailing the rescue.

Captain Von Weien and his crew received official accolades from COMSTS, Admiral Will; from commander in chief, Pacific Fleet; and from commander, Hawaiian Sea Frontier—all of whom sent dispatches—while Rear Adm. W. L. Erdmann, commander, naval forces, Marianas, waited at the dock in Guam to greet them.

U.S. SHIP RESCUES JAPAN CREW ADRIFT

YOKOHAMA (KYODO).—All 24 crew members of a Japanese tuna boat, which sent out an S O S Wednesday southwest of Wake Island, were rescued Thursday by a U.S. military transport.

News of their rescue was contained in a report received yesterday by local maritime safety authorities from Wake Island.

The report said the 148-ton Chiyo Maru of Misaki, Kanagawa Prefecture, had been abandoned after it sprung a leak.

Skipper Kazuyoshi Taniguchi and the crewmen took to a raft and were picked up about 500 kilometers (300 miles) southwest of Wake at about 10:40 p.m., Thursday by the U.S. military transport Jack Pendleton.

The rescued fishermen were reported to be heading for Guam aboard the American transport, one of a number of U.S. and Japanese ships which rushed to the aid of the sinking boat. Planes also took part in the search for the craft.

MSTS SHIP RESCUES 24 FISHERMEN

YOKOSUKA, JAPAN.—The U.S. Navy said Friday a Military Sea Transportation Service cargo ship rescued 24 survivors from a stricken Japanese fishing boat at midnight Thursday about 1,800 miles southeast of Japan.

The MSTS ship Sgt. Jack P. Pendleton, a modified attack cargo ship, rushed to assist the fishing boat Chiyoh-Maru Wednesday after the Japanese vessel reported it had a hole in its hull and was flooding.

A Navy spokesman said word was received from the rescue ship that all members of the fishing boat's crew were rescued, including the Japanese skipper.

The Navy spokesman said the brief rescue message reported the Japanese vessel had sunk but did not elaborate on how the survivors managed to stay afloat.

The message quoted the Japanese captain as saying all persons aboard had been saved and that the boat was lost.

MSTS TO RESCUE—JAPANESE CREW SAVED

GUAM.—Twenty-four crewmen of an ill-fated Japanese fishing boat rescued Thursday by an American cargo vessel were transferred at sea Sunday off Guam to another fishing boat for return to Japan.

The Japanese fishermen had drifted 29 hours on an open raft with standing room only after sending an S O S Wednesday that their ship, the Chiyoh Maru, was sinking.

They were picked up by the U.S. Military Sea Transport Service cargo ship Sgt. Jack J. Pendleton. The Pendleton rendezvoused with the Sazamu Maru, a sister ship of the Chiyoh Maru, 3 miles off Apra Harbor, Guam.

The Japanese were transferred by Navy crash boat.

Vice Adm. John M. Will, commander of the MSTS in Washington, described the rescue as upholding the finest traditions at sea.

Capt. Hans C. von Weien, the Pendleton's master, had high praise for the Japanese survivors.

He said they had been adrift on a makeshift 8-by-10-foot raft assembled from four oil drums, wooden boxes and fishing float balls held together by fishing net.

The survivors said the raft rode the waves in sections.

The Japanese fishermen took long and vigorous showers aboard the Pendleton and were treated to haircuts by the ship's barber. The crew furnished them with clothing and rubber sandals.

Just before their transfer the Japanese were given $5 and a carton of cigarettes each as a farewell gift.

The Pendleton received a hero's welcome when it returned to Guam after the transfer. Rear Adm. W. L. Erdmann, commander, Naval Forces Mariannas, and the Navy band were on hand to greet the rescuers.

[From the Japan Times, Dec. 22, 1958]

CREW RESCUED BY U.S. VESSEL BOARDS JAPAN SHIP OFF GUAM

YOKOSUKA.—Twenty-four Japanese fishermen rescued from a makeshift raft in mid-Pacific by an American naval craft, were transferred Sunday to a Japanese fishing boat off Guam, the U.S. Navy reported.

The survivors, who were aboard the Chiyo Maru which sank Wednesday night 350 miles west southwest of Wake Island, were transferred from the attack ship Sgt. Jack J. Pendleton to the No. 7 Sasayama Maru 3 miles off Apra Harbor at 8:30 a.m. Sunday, the Navy said.

The Sasayama Maru was one of two Japanese fishing boats directed by Japan's Maritime Safety Agency to pick up the survivors at a rendezvous point off Guam. The No. 3 Azuma Maru was also reported heading for the same place.

The Pendleton, a U.S. Navy attack cargo ship was en route to San Francisco from Guam when it received an S O S call Wednesday night. She diverted her course and picked up the fishermen some 1,000 miles northeast of Guam Thursday night.

The survivors were found adrift aboard a makeshift raft that consisted of four oil drums, various wooden boxes and fishing glass balls securely enclosed in a fishing net, the Navy said. They were adrift for 29 hours.

The Chiyo Maru, a 1,481-ton tuna fishing boat, flashed a distress signal at 5:50 p.m. Wednesday and sank 55 minutes later.

Anti-Semitic Vandalism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. VICTOR L. ANFUSO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, the wave of anti-Semitism which has swept over Germany in recent weeks is most deplorable. Perhaps the most unfortunate thing is its spread to various lands in Europe, the Americas and elsewhere, where irresponsible young people and lunatic fringe followers are defacing synagogues, churches, institutions and private homes with swastikas and other symbols of hatred.

These anti-Jewish and antireligious demonstrations have occurred in various places and communities in this country and abroad where this form of social virulence has never before been a serious factor. I have no way of knowing whether these demonstrations have been organized by certain rightist or leftist elements for political or other purposes. I have no way of knowing whether they are being financed by certain elements in Communist or Arab countries, or by Nazi remnants still operating abroad, as is being suspected by many people.

One thing I do know, and that is: The free world, America included, has been dealt a heavy blow in the eyes of upright, liberty-loving and peace-loving people everywhere. In the midst of a great ideological struggle, when the nations of the free world are actually fighting for freedom and survival, our attention is diverted to acts of prejudice and intolerance which only tend to divide our forces and to sap our strength. The smearing of swastikas on houses of worship is not the path to survival in the struggle against communism, as some blind fanatics and cranks may believe, but is the road to ruin and destruction of our civilization, our common heritage and our very freedom.

Attacks on houses of worship are direct attacks upon freedom itself. Those who hate one religion, hate all religions. They also hate everyone whose beliefs may differ from theirs, whose national origin may be different, whose color of skin is different, whose political or social views are different. They prefer totalitarianism of one kind or another, based on hatred against all those who disagree with them. We fought World War II to eradicate this dangerous concept which brought so much misery upon humanity and resulted in the death of millions of innocent people.

Now, we are witnessing a resurgence of these evil forces. If left to pursue their evil deeds, we shall sooner or later be faced with a new world tragedy. This is a warning which should not be ignored. There is no room in American life for these demented fanatics who let themselves become tools of others who seek to destroy us. Similarly, there should be no room for them in Germany if the German people and their leaders are earnestly interested in casting their lot with the free world.

We should make it clear to the German people that we expect them to adopt the strongest measures to eradicate these fanatics. We should also make it clear to them that if there is a revival or resurgence of nazism there, they should understand that the free world, America included, will be forced to renounce its alliance and support of a German state which tolerates or encourages neo-nazism in any form. At the same time, let us give the German people every assurance of support if they show a genuine desire and effort to uproot anti-Semitism and those preaching bigotry and intolerance.

Let's Help the Small Tobacco Farmer: Statements of Representative Ken Hechler and Senator Randolph Emphasize West Virginia Problems

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH
OF WEST VIRGINIA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, there are some 4,500 farmers in West Virginia who harvested tobacco in 1958. The growers in our State produce on a small scale.

My colleague from the Fourth District, Representative KEN HECHLER, has most of these farmers in the area he serves—and serves so well.

It is my privilege, Mr. President, to ask permission to have printed a recent statement by Representative HECHLER before the meeting within the U.S. Department of Agriculture, Tobacco Division, to discuss the outlook for supply and demand of burley tobacco.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LET'S HELP THE SMALL TOBACCO FARMER

(Remarks of Hon. KEN HECHLER, Democrat, of West Virginia, before the Tobacco Division, U.S. Department of Agriculture, January 14, 1960)

Gentlemen, when I appeared before you last year, I urged the Tobacco Division to resist attempts to reduce quotas in burley tobacco which would have reduced further the small incomes earned by many of the Nation's small tobacco farmers.

I was delighted that the Department of Agriculture did indeed resist this unwise and unwarranted pressure and retained tobacco allotments for the 1959 crop year at their 1958 levels.

The visible proof that your decision was a wise one is contained in the projected figures for the 1959–60 marketing year, which show that total supply—instead of increasing disastrously, as some feared—actually has declined in the past year from about 1,750 million pounds to an estimated 1,735 million pounds. I also understand that disappearance will show an increase this year which, based on a reasonable projection of existing market trends, may be in the neighborhood of 12 million pounds, or from 515 million pounds in 1958–59 to possibly 526 to 528 million in 1959–60.

This is ample evidence to me that tobacco, under the wise guidance of your Division and the cooperative spirit of the growers, remains our most intelligently marketed crop.

I believe both the farmers and the policymakers in the Tobacco Division deserve the commendation of all citizens.

Now I would like to speak for a moment on the 1960 crop year and the manner in which it relates to my district, which lies in the Ohio Valley and embraces the major tobacco-growing area of the State of West Virginia. In fact, 4,191 of the 4,565 tobacco allotments in West Virginia—or more than 91 percent, are in the Fourth District, which borders the Ohio River.

These 4,565 farmers in West Virginia harvested only 2,211 acres of tobacco in 1958. The small size of the average quota is obvious—it amounts to only forty-eight one hundredths of an acre. All West Virginia growers are raising tobacco on a very small scale.

I would like to bring you up to date on a few additional facts about the State of West Virginia.

The State's unemployment continues high, and the rate of unemployment is the highest in the Nation. Nearly one out of seven members of the work force is unemployed. And there is no relief in sight for the depressed condition of the State's economy.

Many of the quota-holders in West Virginia have, in the past, held part-time or full-time jobs, with the income from their farms supplementing these earnings. Today, many of these farmers have lost outside employment. There simply are no jobs to be had, and they are attempting to subsist entirely on the pitifully small income from tobacco farming.

For many of these farmers, the cash income from tobacco often provides the only dollars they see during an entire year. It is their only cash crop. Therefore, I cannot emphasize too strongly the importance of this crop to these small landholders. It frequently marks the difference between proud, self-sufficient living and the dependence upon public assistance funds to keep body and soul together.

The economic situation in West Virginia has improved only slightly since I reported to you in January 1959. Therefore, it is still just as urgent that the small farmer be given every reasonable protection under the law.

I would also like to suggest that some consideration be given to trying to increase quotas for small tobacco farmers in areas which the Department of Labor rules as "chronically depressed areas," with persistently high rates of unemployment.

Last year I was happy to support a tobacco bill which retained the principle of quotas and marketing supports but corrected a flaw which has developed in the modernized parity formula. This was a step to preserve and protect our export markets for tobacco, and I voted for it because I knew that tobacco farmers all over the Nation—in the spirit of cooperation and responsible citizenship which has characterized their statesmanlike attitude to the tobacco problem for many years—would be behind me in this fight.

Unfortunately, this bill, like many other good measures in 1959, met with a poorly explained and unjustified Presidential veto. Now I have been advised that a compromise measure has been evolved and again will be offered to the Congress. It is my hope that an effective and workable tobacco bill can be enacted into law this year.

Legislation is not the only item on the tobacco horizon at this time. I have been advised that there is a move under way to request a general raising of tobacco allotments for the 1960 growing season.

It seems to me that the matter of increasing tobacco quotas must be approached with greatest caution. This should not become a political football for profitable kicking around during an election year—with the tobacco farmer left to reap the horrible consequences after November 8.

The tobacco farmer does not want to sell his long-range, effective program down the river for a few short-range benefits, and I recommend that any decisions, to alter the allotment structure in any way be made with this thought firmly in mind.

But I believe that the time has come to raise quotas for those small tobacco farmers now growing less than six-tenths of an acre. There is ample authority for such preferred and just treatment under the law. The Secretary of Agriculture is specifically granted such authority, in fact.

May I cite section 313(c) of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended, which provides:

"The Secretary shall provide * * * for the allotment not in excess of the national marketing quota * * * for further increase of allotments to small farmers."

I hope that under the terms of this section of the law which governs tobacco growing and marketing that the Division could provide some relief for the struggling small farmer. I further respectfully submit that such a formula could be instrumented without creating undue hardship upon the larger farmer and without exceeding the provisions of section 313(c).

May I propose for your consideration the following program:

For each farmer presently assigned an allotment of less than 0.2 of 1 acre, an increase of a flat 0.2 additional acreage shall be granted.

For farmers now growing from 0.21 to 0.3 of an acre, a sliding scale of increases not less than 0.15 acre but not in excess of 0.2 acre shall be granted.

For farmers with allotments from 0.31 to 0.4, an increase not less than 0.1 and not in excess of 15 shall be granted, again on a sliding scale dependent on previous acreage.

For farmers with allotments from 0.41 to 5 acres, an increase not less than 0.05 acre and not in excess of 0.1 shall be granted on the same sliding scale.

For all farmers with allotments of more than 0.5 acre, a flat increase of 10 percent of the 1959 allotment.

This would be a workable plan, within the framework of a 10 percent increase which I understand may be under active consideration within the Division.

This would be an altogether reasonable formula which would not deny deserved increases to the larger farmer, would not upset the marketing and support program, and would provide benefits where they are most needed.

In addition, it would not even require the Secretary of Agriculture to utilize the full 5 percent benefit provision contained in section 313(c).

Under my formula, slightly less than 3.5 percent of the total national marketing quota would be set aside to benefit the small farmer.

If a 10 percent increase should be feasible, this would mean that the present marketing quota of about 310,000 would rise to about 341,000 acres.

Now, if the Secretary should choose to utilize only seven-tenths of the 5 percent "increase of allotments to small farms" provided under the law, this 3.5 percent increase would provide for the distribution of an additional 11,935 acres in increased allotments.

Sharing in this increase would be 25,000 farmers across the Nation who now hold allotments of 0.2 acre or less. A flat 0.2 increase would add 5,000 acres to their present production of only 3,095 acres.

The 13,700 farmers now raising from 0.21 to 0.3 acre could add 2,408 acres to their present production total of 3,425, under the formula I have outlined here. The 14,100 farmers now raising 4,935 acres would increase their production by 1,763 acres. This is the number of farmers with allotments ranging from 0.31 to 0.4 acre.

The 27,900 farmers with 0.41 to 0.5 acre would add 2,093 acres to the 12,555 acres they now grow.

And how much would this increase the national marketing quota?

I am happy to say that it would amount to a total increase of 11,264 acres—less than 600 acres of the 11,935 acres which would be provided for the small farmer if the Secretary will use the authorization of section 313(c) to increase allotments for small farmers not 5, but only 3.5 percent.

I firmly am convinced that in this way allotment increases could be apportioned among farmers who need them most. Every dollar added to their income would go toward providing a more stable way of life for them—and coincidentally would be pumped immediately back into the Nation's economy as the purchasing power of these deserving farmers increases.

This would be a humanitarian approach to the problem, and would render the maximum good for the largest number of people.

This, I believe, should be the underlying motive and governing factor if it is deemed possible to increase 1960 quotas.

The tobacco farmer wants these increases, if they can be granted without damaging the program which has proved the most successful and effective of an otherwise dismal farm administration.

They want to increase production and earn more dollars, but they do not want to return to the roller-coaster days of tobacco marketing, when a year of boom was followed by several of inevitable bust. The present program was an outgrowth of the problems raised by this damaging cycle, and the tobacco farmer is determined that it shall never return again.

The tobacco farmers of West Virginia have shown their patriotism by their record. They have stood with other farmers in defending and protecting their program even when it meant drastic reduction of their allotments in the face of falling markets a few years ago.

Consequently, the tobacco industry today is sound. Export markets apparently are weathering a serious storm and have risen about 30 percent over 1958. Disappearance is increasing and we all hope that its steady upward curve will continue.

It is most heartening that an increase appears to be justified this year or in the near future. For this I am truly thankful.

We must, at all costs, preserve the tobacco program which has been proven so effective.

If it does prove feasible to raise quotas for 1960, we should consider it only a matter of simple justice to distribute the major portion of this increase among the small allotment holders who depend so strongly upon tobacco to provide them with life's necessities.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I ask further consent that there be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD correspondence between Director Joe R. Williams and myself in reference to the subject of Representative HECHLER's address.

There being no objection, the correspondence was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
COMMODITY STABILIZATION SERVICE,
TOBACCO DIVISION,
Washington, D.C. December 18, 1959.

Hon. JENNINGS RANDOLPH,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR RANDOLPH: A meeting will be held at 9:15 a.m., e.s.t., on Thursday, January 14, 1960, in the Jefferson Auditorium, South Building, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C., to discuss the supply and demand outlook for burley tobacco and to obtain views and recommendations on the amount of the 1960 national marketing quota.

We shall be pleased to have any comments which you may wish to give us either by letter or telephone or to have you attend the meeting.

Sincerely yours,
JOE R. WILLIAMS, Director.

BURLEY TOBACCO SUPPLY AND DEMAND SITUATION

The carryover of burley tobacco on October 1, 1959, beginning of the current marketing year, totaled 1,236 million pounds, farm sales weight basis. This represented a decrease of about 50 million pounds, or about 4 percent, from a year earlier.

The 1959 crop of burley tobacco was estimated as of December 1, 1959, to be 500 million pounds, about 35 million pounds, or 7 percent, larger than the 1958 crop.

The total supply of burley tobacco (i.e., carryover plus estimated production) for the current marketing year is 1,736 million pounds, down 15 million pounds from a year ago. For the fifth successive year, the total supply has declined. The total reduction from the 1954–55 peak supply of 1,866 million pounds has been 130 million pounds, or 7 percent. At the current level of disappearance, the present supply is sufficient for a duration of about 3.4 years, while a supply of about 2.8 years' duration is considered normal under the formula contained in the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended.

Domestic consumption of burley tobacco during the marketing year ending September 30, 1959, was 480 million pounds, a gain of about 6 million pounds, or 1½ percent, over the previous year.

Exports of burley tobacco during the marketing year ending September 30, 1959, totaled about 35 million pounds, farm weight. This was a gain of about 7 million pounds from the level of the past 2 years, but about the same as during the 1955–56 marketing year. For the calendar year 1959, burley exports are running about 1 percent below the same period of last year.

It is estimated that cigarette production during the calendar year 1959 will reach an alltime high of about 488 billion, or 3.8 percent more than in 1958 and 12 percent more than the previous high of 1952. The quantity of domestic tobacco utilized in cigarettes has gained little in the last few years despite this substantial increase in the number of cigarettes manufactured.

It is estimated that the production of smoking tobacco during the calendar year 1959 will total about 73 million pounds, about 3 million pounds, or nearly 4 percent, less than in 1958. The production of chewing tobacco in 1959 is expected to be about 1½ million pounds, or 2 percent, less than in 1958.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
TOBACCO DIVISION, CSS.
DECEMBER 1959.

JANUARY 13, 1960.

Mr. JOE R. WILLIAMS,
Director, Tobacco Division, Community Stabilization Service, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: Thanks very much for your letter and the enclosed analysis of the tobacco supply and demand situation. The comprehensive statistics included are informative and helpful.

To my regret, previous commitments will prevent my attendance at your meeting but I appreciate the opportunity to express my views concerning the tobacco program for 1960.

I wish to commend the Tobacco Division of the Commodity Stabilization Service for maintaining stable growing and marketing conditions in the tobacco industry during the past year. I shall hope that this stability can be maintained throughout 1960. In allocating quotas for the present year, it is my opinion that special consideration should be given to the small tobacco farmer whose allotment is less than half an acre, and I respectfully urge your Division to take this action. There is ample authority for such action under section 313(c) of the Agriculture Adjustment Act of 1949, as amended.

There are thousands of small tobacco farmers in our State of West Virginia whose average allotment is only 0.48 of an acre. Many of them depend on tobacco as their only cash crop and an acreage increase would be of genuine assistance to them. This adjustment would be particularly important because of the areas of unemployment in our State which significantly affect its economy.

I would not, however, advocate any increase which would impair the tobacco program administered by your Division. If it is feasible to grant increases for this year, I strongly recommend that they be distributed to the small farmer, including the constituents which I am privileged to represent.

With kind regards and best wishes, I am,
Sincerely,
JENNINGS RANDOLPH.

An Eastern Big City Congressman Looks at Resource Development

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ALFRED E. SANTANGELO
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, January 20, 1960

Mr. SANTANGELO. Mr. Speaker, on January 19 I had the privilege of speaking before the Electric Consumers Information Committee at the Hotel Willard in Washington, D.C. I am thankful to Jack Curran, a member of the ECIC executive committee, who extended to me an invitation to participate in a luncheon session of a legislative workshop with people from all over the United States who are interested in the problem of power and our natural resources. Mr. John Edelman, legislative representative of the Textile Workers, was the chairman.

The subject of my talk was "An Eastern Big City Congressman Looks at Resource Development." In view of the erroneous impression that a conflict exists between the interests of the farm people and the city dwellers, I believe that my talk might eliminate some of the erroneous impressions held by many people.

I found the question and answer period after the speech very stimulating and the comments reaffirmed my deep-rooted feeling that whether we live on the farms or dwell in the cities that we are Americans all and that our natural resources have been granted to us for the benefit of all mankind, and not for the aggrandizement of power by a monolithic state or for the financial benefit of a select few.

The text of my speech follows:

SPEECH OF CONGRESSMAN ALFRED E. SANTANGELO BEFORE ELECTRIC CONSUMERS INFORMATION COMMITTEE, TUESDAY, JANUARY 19, 1960

Mr. Chairman, Mr. Ellis, Jack Curran, members of the Electric Consumers Information Committee, and ladies and gentlemen, I have been asked today to speak to you on the subject of how "An Eastern, Big City Congressman Looks at Resource Development." I am happy to participate in this workshop program.

When one talks about resource development, a person, whether he comes from the city, such as I, or from the farm belt, one immediately thinks of natural resources, farms, forests, fish and wildlife, minerals and sources of energy. Some city dwellers think of hunting, fishing, and swimming. The thought that comes to me, and which is sometimes overlooked, is the world's greatest natural resource—its population. This is so whether it be where population is exploding or where it is controlled by natural or artificial means. When I talked of natural resources, I mean both groups—the animate and the inanimate and the relationship between them.

As a human being and as a Catholic, I believe in the dignity of the individual and in his inherent worth. Just as I believe governments are created for the protection of the individual and the development of a spiritual, economic and political being, so do I believe that our natural resources have been placed on earth for the benefit of all peoples, all human beings, and not for the aggrandizement of power of a state or the financial benefit of a select few.

I am not a hedonist who believes that pleasure is the primary objective of life or summum bonum, but sometimes when we attend congressional parties, labor luncheons, or house parties, one can validly draw the inference that the guests believe in the mammalian philosophy—live for today for there is no tomorrow.

As a member of the Appropriations Subcommittee on Agriculture, I have been compelled to think about the soil, the trees, our streams, electric power, and their use, their development and their preservation. I have been extremely interested in these resources because I know that they affect my life, my constituency, and my Nation.

We all know that no nation is any stronger than its resources permit it to be. Because America has been fortunate in the blessings of nature bestowed upon it in the shape of all varieties of natural resources we have become strong. We have attained our preeminent position in the world today because we have had the energy, the ingenuity, and the purpose with which to convert natural resources in their many aspects to useful products. In the process, we have been shamefully prodigal as well as admirably efficient. Some nations have not been blessed with nature's bounty and consequently look to us with pitiful glances for help or with green eyes in envy.

Of all the natural resources needed to support even so complex an industrial structure and sophisticated a society as ours is today, there are only a very few which we do not possess in some quantity. Those few which we may need we have, of course, been able to secure elsewhere by exchange for others of which we have a surplus or for products made from them. And so we have our exports and imports and our trade agreements.

The first of the natural resources we come to is water. Certain elementary facts must be recognized. Water is vital to every form of life. We have a fixed or finite quantity of water in this world. Some have too much for their needs, such as Siam, Panama, and other countries in the Far East, which I have had the extreme pleasure of visiting within the past several months. Other areas have too little, such as Hong Kong, where running water is used only for several hours a day, or in parts of southern Italy, which suffers from the lack of water. Certain areas which have sufficient for their needs, do not have it at the time when they need it. So for them, it is a problem of storage and use in time of need. Then it becomes a matter of distribution. We have seen such conservation in the Tennessee Valley, in the far West at the Columbia River, or at the Wilson Dam.

I understand that Russia is developing the largest water dam in the world which will provide electric power and irrigation. This damsite is located at Bratsk north of Lake Baikal on the Angara River, and when completed will be more than 40 times as large as our largest reservoir at Hoover Dam. We almost had a war because the present administration withdrew its support to Egypt in the building of the Aswan Dam. I was pleased to see that Formosa with the help of our Government is building the first multipurpose water resources development undertaken by the Republic of China as part of an overall program to make Chiang Kai-shek's country self-sufficient. Its purposes are irrigation power, flood control, and public water supply.

Some areas have sufficient for their needs, but people in the use of it pollute, contaminate, or waste it, so that others cannot use it sufficiently or profitably. Riding across the 14th Street Bridge in Washington over the Potomac River, you will see this river being contaminated by industrial useage and those who live downstream are denied a proper use.

Water serves mankind in many ways. It helps provide food from the soil or from gravel as I saw in the hydroponic systems in Japan. It turns the turbines which furnish hydroelectric power and provides cheap electricity, as in the hills of Puerto Rico where the Rural Electrification Administration has brought light to darkness and bearable living conditions to the denizens of the hills.

When I first came to Congress I did not know what the words "Rural Electrification Administration" meant, and I had no conception of the kind of work it was accomplishing or the scope of its activities. The first real understanding I had of the REA's accomplishments was during my visit to Puerto Rico where I met Clyde Ellis and participated in a week's seminar conducted by the Puerto Rican Water Resources Authority. I traveled into the hills and inspected the powerplants and saw with my own eyes the wires leading to the shacks and hovels which some of the Puerto Ricans call their homes. In some instances the cost of the installation of the electricity was greater than the value of these homes. More than 50,000 families enjoyed for the first time the use of electricity and the darkness of the hills was illuminated. Refrigeration, preservation of food, electrical appliances, and modern conveniences were theirs for the asking by reason of the inspiration of a far-sighted Governor, Muñoz-Marín. Without the REA loans at 2-percent interest, these people would have remained in darkness, relegated to misery. Their health and their way of life were greatly improved.

Today we see an administration seeking to raise the interest rates to be paid by the REA from 2 percent to the going rate of interest paid by Government bonds. This means that the rate of interest would reach 5 percent and higher. This means that backward areas could not avail themselves of the great opportunities afforded by a program initiated under Franklin Delano Roosevelt which has brought electricity to 98 percent of the farm families throughout the United States and telephones to 90 percent of the people on the farms.

I, for one, will oppose a program which will grant 3½ percent additional interest to financial institutions to the detriment of the people and the destruction of one of the greatest programs our country has ever adopted.

Water serves as drink for man or beast, either in its pure state as H_2O or in its mixed state as in hooch. It also has less utilitarian purposes, such as perhaps for sartorial perfection as in washing and bathing or as a locus near the sands, attracting either a sunburn or the opposite sex.

As dependent as we are upon water then, we must learn to keep our demands within the available gallonage which is not infinite. As we approach the absolute limits we must learn to utilize it in the most efficient manner possible.

Wherever possible it must be used over and over. The same water that generates hydroelectric power can be used again. None is lost in the process. Wherever possible arid lands lying waste and unproductive should be given an opportunity to produce food and other products of the land. This will become more and more necessary as our population continues to grow.

Since the finite limits of water are known, at least in approximation, it is up to someone to take the lead in seeing that the available supply is most efficiently utilized. That someone could very well be the Federal Government. By that I do not necessarily mean that every drop should be nationalized and every bucketfull be doled out by a more or less benevolent Federal Government upon sufficient justification by potential consumers or users. I do mean that it would probably be a good thing that the utmost protection be given to the Nation's watersheds, that soil erosion be eliminated insofar as possible, that water pollution be prevented, or corrected when it occurs unavoidably.

I mean that potential hydroelectric power sites should be determined and the right to develop them be in the hands of those who can do so at the least cost, most efficiently and for the benefit of the most people. If these potential power sites are located where no one can or wants to undertake the job the Federal Government might undertake them. Not, however, unless there is at least a potential need for them.

As we well know, it would be a wasteful practice to build large power dams just for power. It is also possible to upset the natural regime of a stream and disorganize the economies of communities downstream dependent upon the water about to be impounded for domestic and industrial use, and possibly irrigation. The modern-day multiple-purpose planning for a coordinated development for all purposes is infinitely more desirable.

Yesterday our President forwarded to the Congress his budget message. In it he recommended $1,938,000 to be spent in fiscal year 1961 for natural resources, more than has been spent for this purpose in any previous year.

We have before Congress, apart from his recommendations, a measure which would establish a Council of Natural Resources and Conservation Advisers. The purpose of this council is to study the current status of natural resource conservation and development and to develop, in terms of national policy for the President and the Congress, a program which will best meet the human, economic, and National defense requirements of the Nation and the enhancement of the National heritage for future generations.

A truly comprehensive program should encompass, each in its proper relationship to the other and to the whole program, all natural resources. These would include soil, water, timber, grazing land, fisheries, minerals, wildlife and, not to be neglected at all costs, recreational, scenic, and scientific values. The assistance and cooperation of all responsible parties should be enlisted. This I think should include industry, agriculture, government on all levels as well as individuals. Only thus could the interests of all citizens be given the proper consideration. That is the democratic way.

It would be well to have a central clearinghouse of information concerning the current status of our storehouse of nature's bounty. We should know of what plans there may be for its conservation, development, and utilization. If there are dangerous trends apparent, steps may be taken in time to arrest them. If there are forseen shortages developing, steps may be taken to head them off.

As a member of the Agriculture Subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, I am acutely aware of the accomplishments of the Rural Electrification Administration. I believe that some of my listeners may have some small interest in that program. That governmental undertaking is illustrative of the good that can be accomplished by the Government when others cannot or will not undertake the job.

Several other measures which protect our resources are such projects as the TVA, Bonneville Power Administration, marketing system, in the Pacific Northwest, other Federal power projects in various sections of the country and the rural electrification program. They have stimulated higher consumption of power at low wholesale rates. The results of this policy, which has its roots in the Reclamation Act amendments of 1906, have not only aided the ultimate power consumer in the regions affected, but have had an effect toward decreasing power rates in areas not in the watershed effected by the project even in large cities. (This is the F.D.R. yardstick of public power against which to measure rates of private utilities.) For example, the 1958 average annual domestic use of electricity in the TVA region was 7,800 kilowatt-hours, about double the national figure. The cost per kilowatt-hour of power among TVA distributors is about 60 percent of the average for the Nation. As a result the purchase of electrical appliances in the home and on the farm in the TVA is the highest in the Nation.

Since 1945 citizens of this region have purchased $2.5 billion worth of appliances and the same is true in the Pacific Northwest although adequate statistics are not available. Rural electric cooperatives, more than 900 in number throughout the country, form a $1 billion annual market for 20-odd household electrical appliances. These data were obtained from a study conducted by the National Rural Electric Cooperative Association in 1959. It is obvious that low-cost power contributed to increasing usage which in turn contributed to purchase of more electrical appliances which help keep industries producing goods and workers employed.

From the standpoint of the national interest, I, as a big city Congressman, approve of the role that has been played during World War II, during the Korean crisis and by the TVA and Bonneville Power Administration in supplying power for defense during the present program of protecting the United States against aggression. Aluminum for the planes that helped to defeat the axis in World War II was produced by industries located in the TVA and on the Columbia. Only in those areas were there supplies of low-cost power available for the process of aluminum and other electro-process industries important to the war effort. As of now, more than half of TVA total power production goes to service the Atomic Energy Commission's facilities in that area. A substantial proportion of power generated by the Columbia River Basin dams is used to service the AEC facilities at Hanford, Wash.

The success of the programs that have been here described have stimulated areas elsewhere to look at their resources situation, particularly in the eastern part of the country where I live, in relation to meeting the problems of water pollution abatement, water supply navigation, and other uses of rivers.

The League of Women Voters, which enjoys respectability in the East, and perhaps is in disfavor in Louisiana, has set up as its goal the conservation of natural resources and the elimination of pollution. Whatever success they might achieve, of one thing you can be sure—that with such support, we will find this topic kept alive and legislators informed of its need and its importance.

I, for one, have supported the rural electrification program with vigor because I see its benefits and I recognize that all in our country, whether it be on the farm or in the city, have common interests. I have supported with pleasure the expansion of the Tennessee Valley Authority's jurisdiction because I believe that the people of that area are entitled to cheap power and a right to receive the benefits which hydroelectric power provides for the residents in the area. If we in the city support programs which farmers feel are their private domain, we do so because we recognize their intimate relationship with us. We, on the other hand, have high hopes and confidence that the farmer be aware of and sympathetic to the problems which we cliffdwellers face in our urban centers. Newspaper reporters call this mutual assistance—"I scratch your back; you scratch my back theory of politics."

Our problems in the city are legion. We desperately need decent housing, and we would like to enjoy the fresh air which the farmers receive in their daily lives. We clamor for minimum wages because we feel that we should have the wherewithal to purchase the necessities of life and obtain those foods which we cannot abstract from the soil. If we recognize that we are our brothers' keepers and that there is no class warfare between the farmer and the city dweller, if we appreciate that education is the common concern of all, that decent housing, good health, are rights of mankind, then we have recognized the truth which has come down from all religions. When we recognize that truth, that Nature's bounty were planned for the benefit of mankind, then we can live as human beings and be proud of our way of life.

SENATE

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1960

The Very Reverend Omelan Mitzik, rector, St. Mary's Ukrainian Orthodox Church, Chester, Pa., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ the Prince of Peace, we heartily thank Thee for the precious heritage of the life we share and love in this land.

We humbly beseech Thee so to guide and bless the President of the United States, the Senate here assembled, and all others in authority, that justice and truth, peace and freedom, may be established among us and all people.

We thank Thee, O Lord, for the Presidential proclamation of the "Captive Nations Week," enacted by you the U.S. Congress, which ever reminds both the free and the enslaved that our Nation is ever the champion of the persecuted and oppressed.

We pray and humbly beseech Thee to grant unto the people of Ukraine that they may soon regain their liberties of old, and once again unfurl their flags, and fly them gloriously in freedom and liberation from the yoke of enslavement.

Let Thy spirit enter into our hearts and minds to inspire us to rededicate ourselves anew on this January day to the glorious cause of justice, freedom, and peace for all people. Cheer with hope all distressed peoples. Grant health and strength to our leaders. Help us to labor abundantly for freedom and peace. In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, January 20, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had returned to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (S. 1282) relating to acreage allotments for Durum wheat.

COMMITTEE MEETING DURING SENATE SESSION

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary was authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CRASHES IN THE AIR—DEATH OF SON AND DAUGHTER-IN-LAW OF SENATOR CAPEHART

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, stark tragedy again has hit the family of one of the Members of the Senate. Early this morning, in a plane crash at Montego Bay, in Jamaica, Thomas Capehart and his wife, Nancy, the son and daughter-in-law of our dear friend and able colleague, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], were killed.

Mr. President, the hearts of all Members of the Senate and their families go out now to Senator CAPEHART and Mrs. Capehart and their four grandchildren, as was also the case not long ago when the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AIKEN] and the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. MCCLELLAN] also suffered tragic loss.

Mr. President, I merely bespeak for all of us the deep feeling of sympathy which is shared by each one of us.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by the distinguished acting minority leader, the senior Senator from California [Mr. KUCHEL], about the passing of the son of Senator CAPEHART. I know that it is a great blow to the distinguished Senator from Indiana, not only because it takes away from him a loved one, but also because this newest tragedy seems to fit into a pattern at the present time of airplane crashes which have taken the lives of so many good people in different parts of the world.

I wish to say that I, too, and all other Members of the Senate, I am sure, join in expressing our deep condolences and sympathy to the Senator from Indiana on his terrible loss.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, I wish to join the able Senator from California in expressing deep regret to the family of our colleague and friend, the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], at his tragic loss.

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I rise with a heavy heart today. The news of airline crashes about which we have all read and heard so often in recent days has struck close to all of us.

Today Tom Capehart, son of my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from Indiana, lost his life in the crash of an American-built airplane in the Caribbean area. Young Mrs. Capehart also was killed and so was one of Indiana's leading food processors, John H. Marhoefer. In addition the dead included my good friend and prominent civic leader, David L. Krupsaw, past chairman of the Arlington County, Va., Board of Commissioners.

To my colleague and to his family and to the Marhoefer family and the Krupsaw family, I extend my deepest and most sincere condolences. When Mrs. Hartke and I heard the tragic news of Tom Capehart's death in this new airline crash, our whole home was indeed saddened. More Americans had met unexpected and tragic death in the air.

At this moment, on the news wire comes news from Kansas City that another airliner is in trouble. This is a Trans World Airlines Constellation. The last report is:

Officers at the Olathe, Kansas, Naval Air Station, southwest of the city, were making preparations for an emergency landing.

It was at the naval station that a TWA plane made an emergency landing a year ago with 33 persons aboard. Its landing gear failed to lock down and the plane landed on its belly on a foam-covered runway. No one was injured.

TWA officials went to the naval station to assist in preparations for a possible emergency landing, tentatively set for 11 a.m. central standard time.

These and similar news items, Mr. President, have struck terror in the hearts of many Americans.

We have been accustomed since the advent of sputnik to second place in space exploration. We have become accustomed to second place in military power.

Must we also become accustomed to second rate airline safety? Will we take our new fear of airplanes and let it slowly build into a cynicism? Will we soon say "So, what? It is just another of those things?" Is terror in the air to be the accepted concept for America in the sixties?

I wonder, Mr. President, if we have become so accustomed to national defeat, so accustomed to cheating, so accustomed to rigging, so accustomed to moral decay that we simply accept relaxed airline safety as a matter of course. I wonder whether we are developing a national "ho hum" attitude?

It is true, Mr. President, that in terms of passenger miles our commercial safety record has been good and remains good. But it is in danger of becoming bad. Besides, we must strive for a record of no passenger deaths.

Last year in this country we counted 257 airline passenger deaths. We are off to a worse record in this new year.

We recognize that some of the deaths appear to have been caused by deliberate malice beyond the control of the airlines. We recognize that many Americans die on the highways. But on the highways most people feel they hold their own fate a bit more in their own hands. And, none of us wants the airways to become the death traps that our highways have become. We do not want the threat of death on the highways to become the threat of death on the airways.

There have been suggestions that airports are inadequate, that more rigid weather restrictions should be enforced, that safety inspections should be more frequent and more rigorous, that crews should have better training and more examinations.

All of these are being considered by our own aviation subcommittee, under the able and zealous leadership of my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY]. For this we should, and do, commend them.

But where is the administration and the leadership that the people are crying for? Why does not the administration determine why it is that the Military Air Transport Service was able last year to operate what has been called the world's largest airline without a single fatality, while our national record was worsening? Will the administration check with the many airlines of this country who also have posted perfect safety records. Will the administration check into the activities of the Federal Aviation Agency and on safety regulations and their enforcement. Perhaps the administration should consider halting all air travel for a few days for an exhaustive check.

In this I am sure the carefully operated airlines will cooperate as will representatives of airline employees. I am sure the airplane manufacturers will cooperate.

The careful airlines suffer with the careless. The innocent suffer with the guilty. Americans die. Their families suffer the loss of loved ones. American pride suffers.

I feel certain, Mr. President, that my colleagues would join me in saying that bettering our air safety record now would be the greatest memorial we could provide for the loss of the son and daughter-in-law of our distinguished colleague. It would be a living memorial in which all Americans could share in saving loved ones, in peace of mind, and in restoration of our sagging national pride.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I should like to compliment the Senator for his statement, to which I have listened with the greatest attention. I think it is a splendid, statesmanlike, and very honorable and characteristic statement for the Senator. There is no better memorial we could erect to Senator CAPEHART'S son, Tom, than to take precautions to see that other lives are not lost uselessly. Sometimes this is inevitable and there is nothing we can do about it, but I am confident, as the Senator is confident, that stricter measures will bring about the saving of lives.

It will require some money to tighten up the airports and provide better facilities. We must spend it. We Americans do not believe in putting money above lives.

I thank the Senator for giving me this opportunity to join with him in the fine and high-minded expression he has just made, which has an appeal to the country's conscience, to which appeal I shall do my utmost to respond, as one Senator, and to which I feel all of us will endeavor to respond in the way the Senator has described.

Mr. HARTKE. I thank the Senator from New York for the fine compliment he has paid me. I have worked with him in connection with many other matters, and I know that he speaks from the heart.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. It is a pleasure to be associated with the remarks of the distinguished junior Senator from Indiana, but it is with the deepest of sadness that we learn of the death of the son of our colleague, the senior Senator from Indiana. I wish to take this opportunity to extend to the senior Senator from Indiana, Mrs. Capehart, and other members of the family my deepest sympathy at their great loss.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I, too, wish to commend the junior Senator from Indiana for the remarks he has made on this occasion. We were all greatly shocked when we heard the news about the crash of the plane and the death of the son and daughter-in-law of the senior Senator from Indiana.

I have had the privilege of working closely with the senior Senator from Indiana ever since I first came to the Senate. He and I have been members of the Housing Subcommittee. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, he was chairman of the subcommittee. When the Democrats controlled, I was the chairman. He is now the ranking minority member. We have had very close association.

I have often said that I have found the senior Senator from Indiana to be a man who is easy to work with, and one who is completely dependable. It is a terrific burden that has come to him and Mrs. Capehart at this time, and I certainly join in extending expressions of sympathy to both the Senator and Mrs. Capehart, as well as other members of their family.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I join in expressing deep sympathy to our colleague over this shocking incident. There is very little one can say at a time like this, but I know that HOMER CAPEHART and his wife and family will be in our thoughts and prayers.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARTKE. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Our colleague from Indiana brings to our attention the sad news in connection with the accident under discussion. Sometimes when these events come close to us and to our loved ones—in this case involving the son and daughter-in-law of one of our colleagues—we are perhaps conscious of an impact which we might not otherwise feel. Senator and Mrs. CAPEHART have been cherished friends for many years. Mrs. Randolph joins with me in sharing their sorrow.

I hope the Senator from Indiana will find it possible to include in his remarks, if he does not object, a statement made last night by Bryson Rash over the National Broadcasting System. He discussed, as he often does, an analytical subject in connection with a news item of current interest. I believe that Bryson Rash placed in perspective some of the problems to which the Senator from Indiana has so emphatically called our attention.

Mr. HARTKE. I shall certainly be glad to do as the Senator has requested.

Mr. SALTONSTALL. Mr. President, as one who came into this body with the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART] and as one who has had friendship with him over the years, I wish to add my brief word of sympathy and understanding in connection with the great loss which has come to him this morning, because of the death of a son and a daughter-in-law. The son was first known to me a number of years ago, when I was in Indiana.

The tragedy our beloved colleague has suffered is even greater, Mr. President, because of the fact that the Senator's four lovely grandchildren have now lost their parents.

Certainly Senator CAPEHART has the deep sympathy of each one of us, Mr. President; and particularly does our beloved colleague have my very deep sympathy, inasmuch as I, too, lost a son some years ago, and I have an intimate knowledge of how Senator CAPEHART feels at this time.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the Administrator of the Rural Electrification Administration, for the fiscal year 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

REPORT ON FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS PROGRAM

A letter from the Deputy Director, Office of Civil and Defense Mobilization, Executive Office of the President, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on Federal contributions for the quarter ended December 31, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Armed Services.

AMENDMENT OF ACT RELATING TO CERTAIN AUTHORITY OF DEPARTMENT OF STATE

A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the act of August 1, 1956, entitled "An act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State" (with an accompanying paper); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT ON DISPOSAL OF FOREIGN EXCESS PROPERTY, ATOMIC ENERGY COMMISSION

A letter from the General Manager, Atomic Energy Commission, Washington, D.C., reporting, pursuant to law, on foreign excess property disposed of during the fiscal year 1959; to the Committee on Government Operations.

SETTLEMENT OF CLAIM OF BALTIMORE & OHIO RAILROAD CO.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, reporting, pursuant to law, the payment of $4,566 to the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., Baltimore, Md., in full settlement of its claim for damage to bridge 8–A, Marley Neck branch, Baltimore, Md., sustained on March 13, 1959; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON CLAIMS FOR DAMAGE CAUSED BY VESSELS OF THE COAST GUARD

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the payment of claims for damage occasioned by vessels of the Coast Guard, during the period January 1 through December 31, 1959 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORT ON POSITIONS FILLED IN CERTAIN GRADES OF CLASSIFICATION ACT OF 1949

A letter from the Administrative Assistant Secretary, Department of Agriculture, reporting, pursuant to law, on positions filled under the Classification Act of 1949, in grades GS–16, GS–17, and GS–18 (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Petitions, etc., were laid before the Senate, or presented, and referred as indicated:

By the VICE PRESIDENT:

A letter, in the nature of a memorial, from Pedro J. Martinez, of Vega Baja, P.R., remonstrating against confirmation of the nomination of Juan Sanches de Jesus as Postmaster of Vega Baja, P.R.; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

RESOLUTIONS OF QUEENS COUNTY COMMITTEE, INC., THE AMERICAN LEGION, NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two resolutions adopted by the Queens County Committee, Inc., of the American Legion, Department of New York.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the U.S. Post Office has been hampered by restrictions to curb obscene matter sent through the mails; and

Whereas there is a strong need for legislation to stem the tide of filth to prevent delinquency and destruction of the moral, mental, and physical health of our country: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Queens County committee of the American Legion, Department of New York, adopt this resolution, to approve and support H.R. 7379, an act to amend the act of July 27, 1956, with respect to the detention of mail for temporary periods in the public interest, and for other purposes; and H.R. 8496, a bill to strengthen the criminal penalties for the mailing, importing, or transporting of obscene matter, both introduced by Representative KATHRYN E. GRANAHAN, Member of Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded through channels for adoption by the department of New York, and national body; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senator JAVITS and Senator KEATING, and to Congressman DELANEY, Congressman HOLTZMAN, Congressman BOSCH, and Congressman HALPERN, and Representative KATHRYN E. GRANAHAN, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Postal Operations.

THOMAS STRAUSSNER,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.

Whereas the standards of decency and morality in the commercial field have been reduced to a new low; and

Whereas the character of our youth and the welfare of our country are of an important concern not only to parents but to all citizens as well; and

Whereas each State should have the right to decide, on the basis of its own public policy, questions of decency and morality, and to enact legislation with respect thereto, and not be abridged: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Queens County Committee of the American Legion, Department of New York, adopt this resolution to approve and support Senate Joint Resolution 116, which proposes to amend the Constitution, relating to the right of a State to enact legislation on the basis of its own public policy on questions of decency and morality; and be it further

Resolved, That this resolution be forwarded through channels for adoption by department of New York and the national body; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to Senator EASTLAND, chairman of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary; Senator KEATING, Senator JAVITS, Congressman DELANEY, Congressman HOLTZMAN, Congressman BOSCH, and Congressman HALPERN.

THOMAS STRAUSSNER,
Chairman, Resolutions Committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, without amendment:

H.R. 4586. An act to amend section 4021 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (Rept. No. 1033).

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, with an amendment:

H.R. 6155. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exempt from taxation certain nonprofit corporations or associations organized after August 31, 1951 (Rept. No. 1034).

By Mr. BIBLE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, without amendment:

S. Con. Res. 82. Concurrent resolution extending the Joint Committee on Washington Metropolitan Problems (Rept. No. 1035); and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

By Mr. MAGNUSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with an amendment:

S. Res. 243. Resolution authorizing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to investigate certain matters within its jurisdiction; and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

S. Res. 244. Resolution providing for a study of transportation policies in the United States; and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

REPORT ENTITLED "CERTAIN ORGANIZED FRAUDULENT SCHEMES OPERATING IN THE UNITED STATES" (S. REPT. NO. 1032)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Government Operations, pursuant to Senate Resolution 43, 86th Congress, 1st session, I submit a report made by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, entitled "Certain Organized Fraudulent Schemes Operating in the United States," which I ask may be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of a press release, which I have issued today, in connection with this report, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESS RELEASE FROM SENATE PERMANENT SUBCOMMITTEE ON INVESTIGATIONS, U.S. SENATE

Senator JOHN L. McCLELLAN, Democrat, of Arkansas, chairman of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, stated:

"Public hearings were held by the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, under the acting chairmanship of Senator HENRY M. JACKSON, in connection with Senate bill 550, which was introduced by Senator KARL E. MUNDT, cosponsored by me. These hearings were held to determine whether existing Federal fraud statutes were adequate to cope with a vicious racket involving business opportunities by which some 70 firms in the United States had been fleecing small businessmen, who wished to sell their businesses, of an estimated $25 to $50 million annually.

"These hearings showed that in addition to this particular fraud, there were many types of schemes in operation throughout the United States, which were defrauding citizens of millions of dollars. One of the largest of these involved loans to small businessmen who need funds to continue operating.

"Unscrupulous salesmen, utilizing an elaborately prepared brochure, make numerous misrepresentations to the businessmen to the effect that their company will obtain from a lending institution the money required. The businessman fails to read the fine print in the contract and pays an advance fee to the salesman. Eventually, he learns he has been victimized. All the written contract calls for is the placing of a request for the loan with a lending institution. Loans do not result, and the operators of the particular fraud become enriched by $25 to $50 million per year.

"Other schemes highlighted include vanity publishers, who prey upon elderly and handicapped people; hair growers, who falsely claim that hair can be restored to baldheaded men; skip tracing, a deceptive means used in the location of delinquent debtors; common ailments, such as cancer, rheumatism, and arthritis, and the misrepresentations that permanent cures are available; scare tactics, utilized by many salesmen in the sale of their products; work-at-home schemes, where many housewives are defrauded; easy-to-win contests, where each winner receives credit on the purchase of items which are exorbitantly priced; and vending machines, which are sold to individuals based on fraudulent representations.

"The bill was not reported to the floor of the Senate, because, under presently existing penal legislation, the U.S. Post Office Department has hundreds of investigations pending in many of the categories mentioned above, and have been successful in obtaining many convictions."

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, as in executive session, from the Committee on Armed Services, I report favorably the nominations of 31 general officers in the Army and 3 general officers in the Air Force, as well as 101 flag and general officers in the Navy and Marine Corps. I ask that these names be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nominations will be placed on the calendar, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

The nominations placed on the calendar are as follows:

Thomas Sovereign Gates, Jr., of Pennsylvania, to be Secretary of Defense, vice Neil Hosler McElroy, resigned;

James H. Douglas, of Illinois, to be Deputy Secretary of Defense, vice Thomas Sovereign Gates, Jr., elevated;

Franklin B. Lincoln, Jr., of New Jersey, to be an Assistant Secretary of Defense, vice W. J. McNeal, resigned;

Dudley C. Sharp, of Texas, to be Secretary of the Air Force, vice James H. Douglas, elevated;

Lt. Gen. Clark Louis Ruffner, Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be assigned to a position of importance and responsibility designated by the President, in the rank of general;

Maj. Gen. Harry Purnell Storke, U.S. Army, and Maj. Gen. Edward Joseph O'Neill, U.S. Army, to be assigned to positions of importance and responsibility designated by the President, in the rank of lieutenants general;

Maj. Gen. Edward Joseph O'Neill, U.S. Army, for appointment as senior U.S. Army member of the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations, in the rank of lieutenant general;

Lt. Gen. Blackshear Morrison Bryan, Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be placed on the retired list in the grade of lieutenant general;

Brig. Gen. William Henry Sterling Wright, Army of the United States (colonel, U.S. Army), and sundry other officers for temporary appointment in the Army of the United States;

Lt. Gen. Manuel J. Asensio (major general, Regular Air Force), U.S. Air Force, to be placed on the retired list in the grade of lieutenant general;

Maj. Gen. Jacob E. Smart, Regular Air Force, and Maj. Gen. Joseph F. Carroll (brigadier general, Regular Air Force), U.S. Air Force, to be assigned to positions of importance and responsibility designated by the President, in the rank of lieutenants general;

Vice Adm. Harold P. Smith, U.S. Navy, for commands and other duties determined by the President, in the grade of admiral;

Adm. Jerauld Wright, U.S. Navy, for appointment to the grade of admiral on the retired list;

Adm. Walter F. Boone, U.S. Navy, for appointment to the grade of admiral on the retired list;

Vice Adm. William V. Davis, Jr., and Vice Adm. William G. Cooper, U.S. Navy, for appointment to the grade of vice admiral on the retired list;

Rear Adm. Charles D. Griffin, U.S. Navy, Rear Adm. Fitzhugh Lee, U.S. Navy, and Rear Adm. John S. Thach, U.S. Navy, for commands and other duties determined by the President, in the grade of vice admiral;

Vice Adm. William R. Smedberg III, U.S. Navy, to be Chief of the Bureau of Naval Personnel;

Rear Adm. Edmund B. Taylor, U.S. Navy, and Rear Adm. Harold T. Deutermann, U.S. Navy, for commands and other duties determined by the President, in the grade of vice admiral;

Ephraim P. Holmes, and sundry other officers of the Navy for permanent promotion to the grade of rear admiral;

Alvan Fisher, and sundry other officers of the Naval Reserve, for permanent promotion to the grade of rear admiral;

Alan Shapley, and sundry other officers of the Marine Corps, for permanent appointment to the grade of major general;

Maj. Gen. Chester R. Allen, U.S. Marine Corps, to be Quartermaster General of the Marine Corps, with the rank of major general;

Alpha L. Bowser, and sundry other officers fo the Marine Corps, for permanent appointment to the grade of brigadier general;

James E. Howarth, Jr., for permanent appointment to the grade of brigadier general, Marine Corps Reserve;

William W. Stickney, for temporary appointment to the grade of major general, Marine Corps Reserve; and George E. Tomlinson, and sundry other officers, for temporary appointment to the grade of brigadier general, Marine Corps Reserve.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, in addition I also report favorably 850 nominations in the Army and 145 nominations in the Air Force. All of these names have already appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. In order to save the expense of printing on the Executive Calendar, I ask unanimous consent that they be ordered to lie on the Vice President's desk for the information of any Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from South Carolina.

The nominations placed on the desk are as follows:

Maj. Gen. John Cogswell Oakes, U.S. Army, and sundry other officers and persons, for temporary and permanent appointment in the Army of the United States and the Regular Army; and John S. Flint, and sundry other officers and persons, for appointment in the Regular Air Force of the United States.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MANSFIELD:

S. 2873. A bill for the relief of William H. Brownlee; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. MONRONEY, and Mr. MCCARTHY):

S. 2874. A bill to provide that private aircraft may travel between the United States and Canada or Mexico without requiring the owners or operators thereof to reimburse the United States for extra compensation paid customs officers and employees; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. MURRAY when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HAYDEN (for himself and Mr. GOLDWATER):

S. 2875. A bill to authorize the construction of certain improvements in the interest of flood control and allied purposes on the Gila and Salt Rivers, Ariz., from Gillespie Dam to Granite Reef Dam, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. LONG of Hawaii:

S. 2876. A bill for the relief of Dr. Hyun Mo Kwak and his wife, Young Soo Ha Kwak; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. JACKSON:

S. 2877. A bill to authorize the reconveyance of tribally owned lands by the Muckleshoot Indian Tribe of the State of Washington to the original allottees, their heirs, devisees, or assigns; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. ANDERSON:

S. 2878. A bill to adjust Indian and non-Indian land use areas in the vicinity of the Navajo Indian Reservation in New Mexico, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. HARTKE:

S. 2879. A bill to provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are 45 years of age or over; and

S. 2880. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to permit reduced benefits thereunder (when based upon the attainment of retirement age) to be paid to men at age 62, to permit full benefits thereunder (when based upon attainment of retirement age) to be paid to women at age 62 and reduced benefits to be paid to women at age 60, to eliminate the limitation with respect to the amount which individuals may earn while receiving benefits under such title, and to eliminate the requirements that an individual must have attained age 50 in order to be eligible for disability benefits under such title; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. HARTKE when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. KUCHEL (for himself and Mr. ENGLE):

S. 2881. A bill authorizing the improvement of Noyo River and Harbor, Calif., in the interest of navigation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. KEATING (for himself, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. COTTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. SALTONSTALL):

S. 2882. A bill to provide for adjusting conditions of competition between certain domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and the working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States; to the Committee on Finance.

(See the remarks of Mr. KEATING when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. JAVITS:

S.J. Res. 151. Joint resolution designating the 20th day of April 1960 as National Urban League Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

(See the remarks of Mr. JAVITS when he introduced the above joint resolution, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey (for himself, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BIBLE, Mr. BYRD of Virginia, Mr. CASE of New Jersey, Mr. CASE of South Dakota, Mr. CLARK, Mr. COOPER, Mr. DODD, Mr. DOUGLAS, Mr. ENGLE, Mr. ERVIN, Mr. FULBRIGHT, Mr. GREEN, Mr. HART, Mr. HENNINGS, Mr. HILL, Mr. HOLLAND, Mr. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. JOHNSON of Texas, Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, Mr. KEFAUVER, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. KERR, Mr. KUCHEL, Mr. LONG of Hawaii, Mr. LONG of Louisiana, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. MANSFIELD, Mr. MCCARTHY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. MCNAMARA, Mr. MORSE, Mr. MOSS, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MUSKIE, Mr. NEUBERGER, Mr. PASTORE, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. RANDOLPH, Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. SYMINGTON, Mr. WILEY, Mr. YARBOROUGH, and Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota):

S.J. Res. 152. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

(See the remarks of Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey when he introduced the above joint resolution, which appear under a separate heading.)

REMOVAL OF REQUIREMENT FOR REIMBURSEMENT BY PRIVATE AIRCRAFT FOR COMPENSATION PAID CUSTOMS OFFICERS

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], and the junior Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCCARTHY], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to provide that private aircraft may travel between the United States and Canada or Mexico without requiring the owners or operators thereof to reimburse the United States for extra compensation paid customs officers and employees.

Our bill seeks to abolish a most unnecessary and annoying practice. Motorists entering the United States from Canada or Mexico are not required to pay the salary of the Bureau of Customs employees who make the border inspection. Private pilots entering from either country, however, sometimes have to pay 2 days' salary—as much as $50—to the customs official who clears them on a Sunday or holiday, even though the inspection takes only a few minutes.

Here is where the situation becomes complicated: If a second pilot comes through that station on the same day, he is charged one-half as much as the first one. If a third pilot clears, he is charged one-third; and so on. If five aircraft clear on this Sunday or holiday, only the last one across is charged the correct pro rata fee of $10. The preceding pilots have probably taken off in disgust by that time, so the Bureau of Customs, in accordance with the law and its regulations, makes out refunds and mails them to the overcharged pilots, providing they can be found.

In contrast, pilots entering Canada on Sundays or holidays simply pay the taxi or car fare—about $1—of the Canadian inspector who comes to the field.

Last year, I called a conference of interested agencies, pilot organizations, and Members of Congress. I was pleased that representatives of the Immigration and Naturalization Service arrived at that meeting, prepared to absorb similar charges sometimes levied against private pilots. I was particularly pleased at the interest of the able chairman of the Senate Aviation Subcommittee, the junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY], who is cosponsoring my bill, and of two members of the committees which handle this legislation, the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. MCCARTHY], of the Senate Finance Committee, the other cosponsor of this bill, and my Montana colleague, Representative LEE METCALF, who is introducing companion legislation.

The Government will lose no great sum of money by absorbing the overtime charges now levied against private pilots. The Bureau of Customs reports that the total cost of its overtime charges levied against private flyers in the period July 1–December 31, 1958, was $59,000. I suspect that the Bureau could save a substantial portion of this amount by the reduced clerical work and paper shuffling if our bill becomes law.

The bill introduced today has the support of the Aircraft Owners and Pilots Association, the Flying Farmers' Association, the National Association of State Aviation Officials, the International Northwest Aviation Council, and other aviation organizations.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following these remarks an article from the January 1960 issue of AOPA Pilot, which details the injustice and inconvenience which our bill seeks to correct. The article, entitled "Customs Inequity: Problem For Congress," was written by Sue Timberlake.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the article will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2874) to provide that private aircraft may travel between the United States and Canada or Mexico without requiring the owners or operators thereof to reimburse the United States for extra compensation paid customs officers and employees, introduced by Mr. MURRAY (for himself, Mr. MONRONEY, and Mr. MCCARTHY), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The article presented by Mr. MURRAY is as follows:

CUSTOMS INEQUITY: PROBLEM FOR CONGRESS

(By Sue Timberlake)

There seems no hope now that Treasury administrators will end the strange inequity that last year cost general aviation some $80,000.

Working of this public injustice can be seen any weekday after 5 p.m., and any holiday or Sunday along this country's international borders where homecoming citizens in autos and private aircraft meet the U.S. Treasury Department's Bureau of Customs.

When automobiles are stopped for the usual inspection by American customs officials, the Government, day or night, picks up the check "in the public interest." Personal and executive aircraft undergo the same inspection, for the same reasons of national interest, but if their pilots are hep to the facts of border traffic, they watch the clock and the calendar. Unless willing to be hit with a sizable bill for clearing customs, they try to enter the United States during custom's regular working hours—ordinarily at international airports of entry, from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m., weekdays only. After the close of the "working day" or on Sundays and holidays, the pilot wishing clearance must pay the Government an amount theoretically equal to the inspector's overtime wage. Such a border bill may run to $40 or $50 for a 10-minute customs check.

True, the official's charge is prorated among the aircraft serviced, and, depending on the number of other aircraft sharing the cost of this same official's time, the pilot, may, or may not, get a refund. The system is, however, one of the strangest officialdom seems yet to have devised. It works like this:

If a customs official is called to inspect an aircraft on Sunday, he receives a 2 days' pay though he may be required on duty but a few minutes. First aircraft to be cleared by him that day puts up the whole amount of his wage, say, $50.24. If he is called to clear a second airplane during the day, this second plane is charged half the amount or $25.12, and should no more aircraft be cleared by this official, a like sum of $25.12 will be refunded to the first plane through. A third airplane would pay $16.75, a fourth $12.56, and so forth, with the proper refunds tallied at the end of the day for aircraft that have been overcharged. If, however, more than one official is employed to make the inspections, each one receives his full, 2 days' premium compensation.

For years pilots, and particularly those living near the borders, have protested this procedure. Since they can't ever be sure beforehand what their share of an overtime charge will be, pilots flying on business to Canada, for instance, will often feel constrained to close their own business day early, in order to slip in before overtime charges go into effect.

"It's not the money," one told the pilot, "but the feeling that I'm being penalized for flying that makes me so mad."

Tourists, flying for pleasure, must often cut short a holiday to avoid arriving at the border on a Sunday, unless they are willing to pay the Government a fee most consider excessive and discriminatory. Further embarrassment is caused by the fact that the Canadian Government pays its own inspectors, and the pilot at no time is charged more than the small transportation fee required to bring an off-duty officer to the airport.

AOPA has long opposed this customs policy, and this year is intensifying its campaign to obtain legislative relief.

The AOPA files bulge with protests, as, we suspect, do those of the Customs Bureau.

Here are some typical complaints from October correspondence:

"We felt like flying up to Toronto for lunch on Sunday. To get back into the United States that afternoon cost us $7.50."

"After a short fishing trip in Canada we had to get back before business on Monday. Customs bill Sunday afternoon: $15.20."

"I had purposely avoided returning to the United States on Sunday, but mechanical trouble tied me up until after hours on Monday. My arrival at customs was just after 7 p.m. and my bill was $24.56."

Last October one pilot wrote a letter to his Congressman that sums up the feelings of the majority of these pilots: "* * * I was returning from a trip to Canada, having just taken my boys to camp and in clearing customs at the Cleveland airport, I was informed that I would have to pay overtime fees to the customs officials inasmuch as it was Sunday. * * * Approximately a week later I again crossed the border on Sunday in my automobile, along with thousands of other motorists. Obviously I did not pay for the customs service in this instance.

Customs and immigration officials are, in effect, police officers, whose function is to protect the entire population of the United States. They are not performing any specific service to an individual when he enters or leaves the country, any more than any policeman or fireman is.

"It is difficult for me to see why I should be paying their salary and overtime on Sunday. When I am a private citizen driving an automobile I do not have to do so. This seems to be one of those hangovers of old customs which does not have any basis, and I think that overtime itself is probably an incorrect procedure. Why couldn't they schedule their days so that the men on duty on Sunday worked a regular shift, not receiving overtime pay? This is done in other 24-hour, 7-day-a-week operations in industry and, I presume, in Government."

Unfortunately the Customs Bureau itself is bound by the provisions of the Tariff Act of 1930 to pay its inspection officers premium pay for nights, Sundays and holidays, and to pass this charge on to private persons clearing customs. Automobile traffic has been exempted by law from the requirement to reimburse the Government for overtime services of Customs personnel, but not so traffic by air.

As the Customs Bureau finds justification for its charges in the statutes so it appears that general aviation will obtain relief only from legislative action. One of those best informed on the problem is Senator JAMES E. MURRAY of Montana, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, who said recently:

"The annual income from these overtime charges by the Bureau of Customs is relatively small and does not, in my opinion, compensate for the paperwork, irritation, and injustice caused by the present system which sometimes requires that a private pilot pay $48 for an inspection.

"Therefore, I intend to press during the next session of Congress for abolition of this charge against private pilots. They should receive the same treatment which our Government presently gives persons who cross the border by car or rail but refuses to give to pilots."

The basic law governing the payment of overtime wages to customs inspectors was written into section 5 of the act of February 13, 1911 (19 U.S.C. 267). This law requires the Secretary of the Treasury to fix a reasonable rate of extra compensation for customs inspectors who remain on duty after 5 p.m. and before 8 a.m. or who are required to work on Sundays or national holidays. This compensation is to be one-half day's pay for each 2 hours or fraction of at least 1 hour's duration that the overtime work extends beyond 5 p.m. Only limitation is that no employee is to get more than 2½ days' pay between 5 p.m. and 8 a.m.

Here's what this means in practical terms. Suppose you are a customs officer in Detroit. Your half-day pay may amount to $12.56. If you work overtime from 5 p.m. to 6 p.m. you make $12.56, though during this time you may have spent only 15 minutes inspecting an incoming aircraft. An aircraft arriving at 8 p.m. would be obliged to pay the Government $25.12 or the equivalent of your full day's pay.

Besides specifying this manner of calculating overtime, the law states that the extra compensation is to be paid by the "master, owner, agent, or consignee of * * * the vessel or other conveyancee" to be inspected.

According to Customs officials, when the Bureau feels it is necessary, tours of duty may be staggered, so that officers may be assigned to duty at some locations after 5 p.m. without working overtime. Prior to 1944, this was also done at some locations on Sunday.

Then January 3, 1944, the Supreme Court handed down an interpretation of the tariff law in the case of U.S. v. Howard C. Myers, making it illegal for the Customs Bureau to put inspection personnel on regular Sunday duty at their regular wage. The courts said extra compensation was mandatory and should be collected from those serviced.

That year, Congress amended the Tariff Act exempting certain groups from the requirement to reimburse the Government for overtime compensation of its inspectors. The amendment stated that the requirement "shall not apply to the owner, operator, or agent of a highway vehicle, bridge, tunnel, or ferry between the United States and Canada or between the United States and Mexico, nor to the lading or unlading of merchandise, baggage, or persons arriving in or departing from the United States by motor vehicle, trolley, car, on foot, or by other means of highway travel upon, over, or through any highway, bridge, tunnel, or ferry. * * *"

From time to time since 1944, bills have been introduced in Congress to amend this section of the Tariff Act. Latest, H.R. 4543, was introduced last spring by Representative JACK WESTLAND, of Washington. This bill, referred to the Ways and Means Committee, would have exempted "persons arriving in the United States from Canada or departing from the United States to Canada by private aircraft." It was later broadened as H.R. 6534 and introduced by Representative ANCHER NELSEN, of Minnesota. Mr. NELSEN'S bill made the exemption apply at both the Canadian and the Mexican borders.

AOPA issued a memorandum on the bill drawing attention to the changed position of aviation since enactment of the Tariff Act:

"In 1930, there were about 9,000 civil aircraft in the United States and only about 15,000 certificated airplane pilots. Today civil aircraft in the United States number nearly 100,000 and there are about three-fourths of a million certificated airplane pilots. The great majority of today's civil aircraft are used in the field of general aviation and are the most practical means of transportation by those who engage in commerce and industry beyond our Nation's borders, an activity highly important to the national economy of the United States."

AOPA pointed out that "The President's Civil Air Policy Report of 1954 states that 'the public interest requires that the benefits of air transportation in all its forms be widely available at low cost. The American people have accepted the airplane as a primary means of travel.'"

Following introduction of these bills, the chairman of the aviation subcommittee of the Senate Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee called a meeting for May 7, 1959, to be attended by various aviation spokesmen and representatives of Customs and Immigration. Included were AOPA, the International Northwest Aviation Council, Flying Farmers and others.

As Vic Reinemer, secretary to Senator MURRAY, put it in a newsletter at the time:

"Immigration and Naturalization Service got off the hook real fast, by saying it planned to put out new regulations this week so the Service would absorb the objectionable overtime payments. The Bureau of Customs promised to send up requested information on the money it would lose, and save, by adopting less cumbersome procedure. The general feeling at the meeting was that if the Bureau of Customs doesn't suggest a better procedure, Congress will."

If somewhat perfunctorily, Customs looked for another solution and considered the idea of making a flat charge for the inspection of private aircraft at night, Sundays or holidays by averaging out anticipated costs.

Overtime fees at all airports between July 1 and December 31, 1958, were compiled, and it was estimated that during the year the average charge to private pilots had been $10.42 and to commercial operators (excluding the airlines), $16.65. The Bureau calculated that on this basis a possible flat fee of $12 might cover costs.

According to David B. Strubinger, Assistant Commissioner of Customs, the Bureau was doubtful of the propriety or legality of the flat fee system. "We submitted the proposal to the formal decision of the Comptroller General," he said, "but we weren't surprised when it was turned down."

Strubinger insists that the Bureau could not take on itself responsibility for covering the expense of overtime compensation by the flat fee system without the approval of the General Accounting Office, for anticipated income might fall short of costs. "Then we'd be in trouble," he said.

The proposal was turned down by the Comptroller General on the grounds that under a flat fee system the charge to an individual would not be measured by the exact cost incurred by the Government on his account. At a busy airport where the customs fee is now small because it is shared by numerous aircraft, the flat charge would be higher than the average fee under the present system. At airports where traffic is infrequent, the Comptroller General argued, an aircraft being serviced would probably pay less than the actual cost of his inspection to the Government.

Whether this makes sense or not, the Comptroller General's decision was negative and no hope of amelioration is now to be held on this score.

Strubinger makes it clear that the Bureau would oppose any legislation exempting aircraft from customs payments in the near future, contending that it is felt the cost to the Bureau unjustified in the public interest.

"From a policy standpoint, we feel it would be an unreasonable expenditure," he said.

Favored instead is a standard overtime pay system for inspectors as proposed in Congress from time to time. AOPA supported such a Federal Employees Overtime Pay Act in 1952. The bill, which failed to get off the ground owing, to some extent to union opposition, would have cut excessive overtime costs—particularly the unreasonable 2-day pay for brief stints on Sundays and holidays.

In its reply to the Congressmen after the May 7 meeting on Capitol Hill, the Customs Bureau pointed out that Senator JOHNSTON of South Carolina, had introduced a bill (S. 1933) to provide a uniform premium pay system.

"The bill provides for payment of lower rates of overtime compensation to customs employees which, in turn, would reduce overtime charges to parties in interest," the memorandum said.

"For example," it continued, "the compensation for the services of a customs officer up to 3 hours on a Sunday or holiday would be about $17, as compared with about $46 under existing law if no other inspection service is rendered on that day.

"In addition, the bill provides, in section 2(c), for a standard rate to be charged per man-hour for special inspection service. Because of the lower overtime earnings of a customs employee, the flat rate charged for the inspection of private aircraft would be lower than the lowest flat rate shown above for private flyers ($11) [Under flat fee system.—Editor], and could be as low as $7.50."

But a discriminatory fee, no matter how low, would still harass aviation.

Customs officials make much of the fact that, if overtime customs service was provided free to general aviation, the total expenditure in overtime payments would soar.

The Customs Bureau has argued that free customs service to aircraft outside regular hours cannot be justified by public demand. Yet, they unashamedly turn the argument around, contending that a valid reason for opposing free service during overtime periods would be the rising cost to the Government as more aircraft took advantage of the opportunity to clear customs at hours convenient for them.

"Yes, we are convinced traffic would increase," Strubinger told the Pilot.

The repressive effect of excessive border charges on the movement of air commerce is cause for great concern. Hopeful that the Customs Bureau would correct the problem by fairer interpretation of the present law, AOPA said last spring:

"The Bureau of Customs was established to serve the United States by performing at public expense a number of essential services at the Nation's borders. As methods of transportation change and good international relations become increasingly important to this Nation, the Bureau of Customs is expected to modify its procedures or regulations to meet changing conditions. The service to aircraft users at our borders is not adequate and should be improved. Needed improvement could probably be made under a fair administrative interpretation of the present law. However, the Bureau of Customs and the Secretary of the Treasury have not initiated corrective action."

As they have not, and it now appears that they will not, the only remedy lies with Congress which alone can amend the Tariff Act. This is the year for general aviation pilots to speak out—to let their Congressmen know their views on a matter of equity.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION RELATING TO SOCIAL SECURITY LAW

Mr. HARTKE. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, two bills to improve and remove inequities in the social security program. Companion legislation is being introduced today in the House of Representatives by Representative CECIL KING, a member of the House Ways and Means Committee.

This legislation will:

First. Remove the present $1,200 limitation on earned income with respect to individuals receiving benefits.

Second. Provide earlier retirement at reduced benefits for men at age 62 and women at age 60.

Third. Eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained age 50 in order to be eligible for disability benefits.

Fourth. Provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are more than 45 years of age.

Mr. President, I firmly believe that this proposed legislation will improve our social security program by removing provisions and requirements which experience has shown us are both unwise and unfair.

Nation's Business, the monthly publication of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, speaks out on this vital issue. In an article entitled "Let's Take the Brakes Off Growth," in the November 1959 issue. the chamber of commerce publication says of our old-age and survivors insurance program:

> Permission for older people to work may often mean the difference between comfort and penury, self-confidence and despair, success, and failure.
>
> For both economic and psychological reasons, changes in our old age pension systems are sorely needed.
>
> REMOVE EARNINGS LIMITATION
>
> If an individual is qualified to draw benefits, under title II of the Social Security Act, he may not earn more than $1,200 a year in wages. There is, however, no such limitation on an individual who receives income from investments and annuities. Mr. Jones, who has retired and is receiving $100,000 a year in stock dividends, bonds, and so forth, in addition can receive his social security check each month while basking in the sun at some vacation resort. Mr. Smith, who has worked hard all his life but has had no opportunity to accumulate large investments cannot earn more than $1,200 a year in wages if he wishes to qualify for his monthly social security check.

Mr. President, this great social security program was enacted to provide some measure of security for our elderly citizens. So long as this earnings limitation remains we are rewarding the rich and penalizing those who really need this protection. The limitation is unjust, it is inequitable, it is unrealistic, and it is absurd. It penalizes our great American initiative. We cannot continue to penalize the health and vigorous members of our society who would like to continue working in jobs for which they are qualified and needed in order to supplement the bare subsistence income they receive under social security.

Mr. President, I believe that the earnings limitation should be completely removed. A comprehensive study by the proper committees will indicate the economic feasibility of doing this immediately. If for fiscal reasons it cannot be done immediately then a temporary adjustment should be made raising the present inadequate $1,200 ceiling to a figure which will be more reasonable, desirable and one which will take into account the high cost of living.

Recently, I conducted hearings of the special Senate Committee on Unemployment Problems in Terre Haute, Ind. One of our witnesses, Dr. Waldo F.

Mitchell, emeritus professor of economics, Indiana State Teachers College, has some very interesting comments on retirement. He said:

> Retirement policies force workers to retire or become unemployed or downgraded. This reduces production more than consumption is decreased, thus tending to cause inflation.

Dr. Mitchell went on to say:

> We need the production of older persons who are still able to work and are desirous of doing so. They need to continue the good feeling that they are useful; and public interest is served by changing the procedure of retirement.

I think that this statement is excellent and is one of the most important reasons why we must stop the trend of allowing the elderly to become one of America's forgotten class of citizens.

LOWER AGE REQUIREMENTS

In addition, Mr. President, to removing this limitation, I feel our social security laws should be such that our elderly citizens should have something to look forward to—and at an age when they can enjoy its benefits. I, therefore, am providing in this legislation for optional retirement at age 60 for women and 62 for men, at reduced benefits. After a lifetime of work and after having contributed to a retirement fund in the form of social security, I feel that our older citizens are entitled to this additional consideration.

DISABILITY BENEFITS

Another provision in present law, Mr. President, which is inequitable is that provision which requires that a person be 50 years of age before he can qualify for disability benefits. An individual may be fully paid up under present law but be less than 50 and not qualify for disability benefits. We are trying to provide for some measure of security for those unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity. Why should we limit the application of this to those over 50? If an individual is fully paid up he should be eligible for disability benefits at any age—provided, of course, that he meets the other eligibility requirements. My bill would remove this inequity.

EMPLOYMENT FOR THE ELDERLY

The second bill which I am introducing, Mr. President, would provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are more than 45 years of age. This bill is the result of some studies I have made on the hiring of individuals over the age of 45. I find that by the time a worker has reached the age of 45, in all probability, he is well settled in his chosen occupation. Generally he does not want to leave his job, and he will not voluntarily. But once unemployment does strike an older worker it creates great problems. We have become a nation of wage and salary workers with 80 percent of the gainfully employed in the hire of others. The older worker is, therefore, becoming more dependent upon the attitudes, employment policies, and economic fortunes of others. Large organizations with maximum hiring ages because of seniority system and promotion-from-within policies make it difficult for an older individual to find employment. The Federal and State Governments have encouraged the hiring of elderly citizens through certain employment practices and publicity which has been shed on the problem. I feel that the Federal Government may encourage the hiring of workers over the age of 45 in another way. That is the purpose of legislation which I am introducing today.

Employers paying into the social security trust fund for employees over the age of 45 will receive a specific tax credit equal to one-half of 1 percent of the wages with respect to which the social security tax is imposed on such employees. In other words, at present tax rates, the employer will pay only a 2½-percent tax rate for employees over 45, rather than the 3-percent tax rate which he would be required to pay for employees under the age of 45.

I believe that this will encourage the hiring of those over 45. I feel it is at least worthy of consideration as a partial solution to this problem. I hope that it, together with legislation removing the earning limitation, reducing the retirement age, and removing the age requirement for disability benefits, will receive the early consideration of Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bills will be received and appropriately referred.

The bills, introduced by Mr. HARTKE, were received, read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

S. 2879. A bill to provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are 45 years of age or over; and

S. 2880. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to permit reduced benefits thereunder (when based upon the attainment of retirement age) to be paid to men at age 62, to permit full benefits thereunder (when based upon attainment of retirement age) to be paid to women at age 62 and reduced benefits to be paid to women at age 60, to eliminate the limitation with respect to the amount which individuals may earn while receiving benefits under such title, and to eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained age 50 in order to be eligible for disability benefits under such title.

THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS TRADE ACT OF 1960

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, on September 8 of last year, I introduced a bill, S. 2663, providing relief through the Secretary of Labor for American industries which have been injured or are threatened with serious injury as a result of foreign competition difficulties growing out of the differential in wage costs between American and foreign manufacturers.

I made it very clear at that time that S. 2663 constituted a tentative and preliminary recommendation and that considerable work remained to be done in the way of reviewing and tightening up the proposal put forth in this bill.

During the several months since this bill was introduced, I have had a tremendous volume of mail from American workmen and the owners and managers of manufacturing firms who feel that legislation along the lines of S. 2663 is very much needed. Many representatives of industries and labor unions generously offered their advice on ways in which the bill that I introduced last year could be expanded and improved. In light of this very encouraging and gratifying response, I have spent the past several weeks working with interested parties and authorities in the field of trade law to revise S. 2663, with the intention of bringing a more complete and technically sound bill on this subject before the Congress.

Mr. President, I send to the desk at this time a revised copy of S. 2663. I ask that it be introduced as a separate bill and that it be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will be printed in the RECORD as requested by the Senator from New York.

The bill (S. 2882) to provide for adjusting conditions of competition between certain domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and the working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States, introduced by Mr. KEATING (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, this bill is cosponsored by Senators BEALL, of Maryland; BRIDGES and COTTON, of New Hampshire; DODD, of Connecticut; PROUTY, of Vermont; and WILEY, of Wisconsin.

I ask that the bill may lie on the table until Thursday, January 28, so that any other Senators who may wish to join in cosponsoring it may do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, the changes in S. 2663 are for the most part of a procedural and technical nature. S. 2663, as introduced last September and as revised for introduction at this time, establishes general procedures whereby injured American industries can appeal for relief to the Secretary of Labor who would then make an investigation and publish a finding in much the same fashion as does the Tariff Commission under the existing escape clause provisions of the Trade Agreements Act of 1951.

The principle to which both S. 2663 and the new bill are keyed is in my mind clear cut and straightforward. American wages are well known to be considerably higher than wages abroad. In many cases, the basic reason for the wage differential between American and foreign producers is the fact that American minimum wages are set by law by the Federal Government and by the governments of the various States. This is a matter of public policy. We have decided, and rightly so, that no American worker should be paid a wage that is so low as to prevent him from enjoying what we consider to be minimal living standards. Congress is now about to consider raising the minimum wage, and in doing so we reassert the fundamental public policy that all men should be assured of a share of the fruits of America's economic well-being.

If a manufacturer in a foreign country pays a wage equivalent in dollars to 10, 15, or 25 cents per hour, it is obvious that he is likely to have a significant competitive advantage over his American counterpart. This is especially true in industries in which wages constitute a considerable proportion of total production costs. It is generally these industries which are most seriously affected by increased foreign competition.

Let me name a few examples of American industries in which wages constitute a significant proportion of total costs and in which foreign competition has become increasingly more difficult to meet. They are: textiles, all types of apparel, kitchen utensils and various kinds of hand tools, small appliances, novelty items and toys, rugs, bicycles, umbrellas, light machinery, footwear, tile and ceramic products, athletic equipment, and plumbing fixtures.

Mr. President, I want to make it absolutely clear that I do not call for, nor do I want to see, a full-scale and sweeping reversal of America's trade policies. I am only interested in seeing that more equal justice is meted out to domestic industries which are clearly hurt by increased low-wage foreign competition. In all tariff legislation which has been passed in recent years, Congress has demanded that the needs of such industries be given every possible consideration. Many Americans, myself included, do not believe that existing procedures by which relief is obtained have effectively aided those American industries and their workers who deserve and badly need some sort of trade relief or assistance.

Mr. President, the bill which I introduced last September, and which I have introduced in a revised form today, is I believe a moderate and sensible approach to a serious problem which in recent years has not received the attention that it deserves. The trade agreements and treaties of all nations contain clauses or provisions permitting that adjustments be made to aid and relieve domestic industries in cases of clear and undeniable need. Every nation of the world watches over its own interests. So should we; although it is certainly assumed that in doing so we must not violate or abrogate existing agreements or understandings with our allies and trade partners throughout the world.

As a Member of Congress for the past 13 years, I have always supported the principle of reciprocal trade. I voted for and worked hard to initiate the Marshall plan. I know full well that it would be unwise to repudiate or reverse these policies and programs.

In this light, Mr. President, I believe that we are nearing or have now reached an important turning point. The United States is now faced with a new international economic and political situation. Many of the war-torn and hobbled nations of Europe are now riding the crest of a great and heartening recovery. Their economies are booming, their currency is sound, their people are prosperous as never before. The nations of the free world are stronger than at any time since the end of the war. The success of America's herculean postwar foreign-aid program was to a large extent responsible for this strength. Of this, the beleaguered taxpayers of a great nation can be justifiably proud.

It is clear to me that, as a consequence of these events, the United States is today faced with a considerably different situation from that of the early postwar period. We must be prepared to reexamine and readjust our trade and aid policies accordingly, and in doing so, we must seriously consider all proposals for action which, while consistent with our aspirations for world peace and freedom, are at the same time fair to those American industries and their workers who have been damaged or are seriously threatened by foreign competition. This is no easy goal. I am well aware of this fact. Nevertheless, I cannot accept the premise that the best way to understand our difficulties is to leave them alone and see if they get worse. It is in this spirit, Mr. President, that I offered my original bill, S. 2663, and it is in the same spirit that I offer the revised form of this bill today.

Mr. President, Congress must consider measures intended to strike a better and fairer balance between our domestic industries—which have not gotten a "fair shake" under existing statutes—and our international interests, which all of us realize cannot and must not be ignored.

The new bill is not very different in scope and interest from its predecessor. As I said earlier, the changes which have been made are essentially of a technical and procedural nature. Let me give some examples.

The new bill spells out a standard of injury in much clearer and more detailed fashion than did S. 2663. In the original bill, S. 2663, the Secretary of Labor was empowered to carry out an investigation and if necessary implement appropriate relief. The President had the right to disapprove this action. The new bill follows the escape clause more closely and gives the Secretary the responsibility for recommending relief which the President then either approves or disapproves. It also follows the escape clause more closely in that it establishes limits beyond which the Secretary and/or the President cannot go in recommending or implementing relief.

In general, the procedures of the Secretary's investigation in the new bill are more complete and more closely in accord with the basic statutes in this field. The new bill changes the period before which the bill or any directive thereunder would go into effect. Other similar procedural changes have been made which are of minor importance and are of a primarily technical nature.

Mr. President, I want at this time to acknowledge the assistance of and to thank the Senators who have indicated to me their desire to cosponsor this measure, many of whom have made suggestions for changes. I listed the names of the cosponsors to date, and I hope other Senators will feel inclined to join in cosponsorship of this proposed legislation.

Mr. President, some Members of the House of Representatives have indicated to me that they plan to introduce the same bill.

In closing, Mr. President, I want to extend my sincere appreciation to all the Members of Congress I have named and to all of the many others from industry, from labor, and from other places who have so kindly and competently assisted me in the revision of S. 2663, for the introduction of this bill today.

The bill, S. 2882, introduced by Mr. KEATING (for himself, Mr. BEALL, Mr. BRIDGES, Mr. COTTON, Mr. DODD, Mr. PROUTY, Mr. WILEY, and Mr. SALTONSTALL) is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Fair Labor Standards Trade Act of 1960."

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.—Sweatshop labor conditions are prohibited by law in the United States. The rapid expansion of American foreign trade in recent years, in effect, permits foreign industries in which wages and working conditions are below American standards to compete with domestic industries in which wages are significantly higher and in which minimum wages and working conditions are set by the laws of the United States and the several States. Many American industries, especially those in which labor costs constitute a high proportion of the total production cost have been injured or are threatened with serious injury as a result of such competition. The following procedures are established to provide relief for such American industries.

SEC. 3. PROCEDURES.—(a) Upon the request of the President, or upon resolution of either House of Congress, or upon application of the representative of any domestic industry or employee organization in a domestic industry, or upon application of any interested party, or upon his own motion, the Secretary of Labor (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") or his designee shall make an investigation of any situation in which it is alleged that the differential in costs, due to the existence of wage rates and working conditions significantly below United States standards, gives foreign manufacturer or producers a competitive advantage over United States manufacturers or producers.

(b) In carrying out an investigation and hearings under the foregoing procedure the Secretary shall, to the extent practicable, consider (among other factors): wages and all other forms of remuneration for work performed, labor productivity, production costs and the components thereof, levels of automation, working conditions, legislation or regulations pertaining to working conditions, and living standards in the United States and in the country or countries of origin of the imported article or articles under investigation.

(c) The Secretary shall request the views of the Tariff Commission in writing on relevant trade and international factors in all cases in which he deems such information necessary to the investigatory process under this Act. He may, in addition, request the views of any other interested agency or agencies.

(d) Should the Secretary find that a domestic industry is being or is likely to be injured by imports of goods which are produced in foreign countries under wages and working conditions below United States standards, he shall recommend to the President such new or additional duties, import quotas, or other remedies, as he shall deem necessary or proper in each case, but in no event shall such new or additional duties exceed existing rates of duty by 100 per centum or by the amount of 50 per centum ad valorem, whichever is higher, or shall such new or additional quotas exceed existing quotas by 50 per centum.

(e) Upon receipt of the Secretary's report and recommendations, the President may by order impose such new or additional duties, import quotas, or other remedies (1) as recommended by the Secretary to be necessary to afford relief to the domestic industry, or (2) as are determined by the President to be necessary for such purpose.

(f) The Secretary shall make and publish, with dispatch and in no event more than six months after the request, application, or resolution is made, a report on each request, application or resolution under this Act.

(g) Any order issued pursuant to this Act may be modified, suspended or terminated under the procedures herein established.

(h) The new or additional duties or import quotas imposed by the President or other action taken by him under this Act and any modification, suspension, or termination thereof, shall become effective on such date as he shall specify in his order and shall be treated for administrative purposes as a part of the Tariff Act of 1930.

(i) The Secretary shall within ninety days after the enactment of this Act promulgate procedural regulations to give effect to the authority conferred upon him hereunder.

SEC. 4. EFFECTIVE DATE.—This Act shall take effect as soon as practicable, on a date to be specified by the President in a notice to the Secretary of the Treasury, but in any event not later than ninety days after the date of enactment.

Mr. KEATING subsequently said: Mr. President, it has just been communicated to me that the distinguished senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] wishes to join as a cosponsor of the proposed legislation I have just introduced. I ask unanimous consent that his name be added.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NATIONAL URBAN LEAGUE DAY

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution designating the 20th day of April 1960, as National Urban League Day. Nineteen hundred and sixty marks the 50th anniversary of the founding in New York City of the National Urban League, which is the oldest and largest interracial social agency in the country. It has contributed immeasurably not only to advances in working and living conditions of Negroes, but also to an increasing cooperation among Americans regardless of race, color, or creed. It has been an inspiration for people everywhere who are concerned with problems of race relations and their solution through interracial cooperation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 151) designating the 20th day of April 1960, as National Urban League Day, introduced by Mr. JAVITS, was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, as a part of my remarks in introducing the joint resolution I present an article dealing with the work of the Urban League, written by Lester B. Granger; as well as a message of congratulations from the President of the United States on the observance of the 50th anniversary of the founding of the National Urban League.

There being no objection, the article and message were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEAMWORK: THE URBAN LEAGUE ANSWER TO THE RACE PROBLEM—THE URBAN LEAGUE, SO SMALL AND UNCOMPLICATED COMPARED TO THE SIZE AND COMPLEXITY OF THE PROBLEM, HAS WORKED OVER 50 YEARS WITH INCREASING EFFECTIVENESS

(By Lester B. Granger)

Essentially, the Urban League is a do-it-yourself operation applied to social and economic problems faced by urban communities with growing intensity as the Negro urban population continues to increase. The do-it-yourself character of the organization lies in the fact that without lecturing, without indicting, and without name-calling, the Urban League has instilled in millions of Americans of different races the desire and energy to do something themselves about cleaning up racial difficulties heaped against their back doors.

The success of the organization has puzzled some who have never quite understood what the league has tried to do. It has elicited the scorn of some who place a low priority on "the educational approach." However, it has brought a sense of fulfillment to uncountable thousands and tens of thousands of Negro families who have walked into better jobs as a result of league effort, moved from hovels into homes and strengthened their appreciation of themselves as individuals and their own importance to the community's well-being.

In tackling this job, the Urban League was, of course, a pioneer; more, it became what one board member has described as "a perpetually curious but satisfying anomaly." From the beginning the league has attacked social problems, the existence of which is often unknown to the average white citizen. It has also defined and served social needs of a Negro minority which that minority's own leadership has sometimes failed to recognize. It has operated in a set of social and economic circumstances as lawless in their way as the familiar western frontier town of TV portraiture. But, unlike the marshal in the TV dramas, the Urban League has had no sixshooter nor even a club. So it has had to develop tools—its own tools—for a special task.

The tools became those of commonsense and intelligent self-interest of cool-headed discussion around the conference table, of indisputable facts backed with persuasive arguments; and the leverage applied by the Urban League became that of specific conscience and the basic desire of the average citizen to be regarded as a good citizen.

And the anomaly of the league's role lies in the fact that though its staff members are generally trained social workers and the organization itself is listed as a social agency, one seldom finds other social agencies tackling the kinds of tasks undertaken by the Urban League.

Further, though the league enrolls the largest and most active body of white and colored volunteers to be found in the field of race relations, it cannot be classed as a mass movement. And though it is criticized by some as being nonmilitant and by others as being overaggressive, actually its educational approach makes criticism inevitable.

Not merely the urban Negro population, but Americans of all races everywhere have collected dividends earned by the Urban League method and leadership. The dividends, which have consisted of solid, steadily enlarging gains in the status and security of the Negro population, spell greater stability for the national economy and enhanced status of the American democracy. For instance, it was the Urban League that in World War I introduced hundreds of northern and southern employers for the first time to the tremendous reservoir of industrial manpower comprised of Negro workers on the South's farms. In the Second World War the league outpaced the New Deal administration in first placing Negroes in assembly line and other production jobs of the war industry. In the postwar period the league played an important role in securing those workers' retention of their jobs.

The Urban League's use of the social survey as a technique in reducing racial tensions and pinpointing their causes was applied to a dozen northern and southern cities threatened with race riots toward the close of World War II. It not only took those cities out of the riot zone, but set them far along the road toward new goals of racial amity and improved Negro health and welfare.

Another League technique has become a distinctive tool as well as product. A national Commerce and Industry Council composed of ranking officers of three dozen of the Nation's most important corporations serves the movement as critic, coach and interpreter in advancing the use of trained Negro workers throughout American industry. An example of this council's influence is the now widespread use of Negro engineers, chemists, and other technicians across the country. In the same way a national Trade Union Advisory Council brings the league closer to the labor movement in a joint effort to uncover for corrective action, by labor leaders or Government, instances of racial discrimination by international or local unions.

Less dramatic than its industrial and labor relations activities, but equally as important, has been the Urban League's role in the health and welfare field. It has served as an interpretive, advisory and prodding influence for the benefit of the whole national structure of public and voluntary agencies.

In the years ahead the Urban League is certain to etch its role more sharply than ever on the attention of the American public. The continued urbanization of the Negro population has meant: (1) spreading problems of segregated housing and slum blight; (2) slum clearance, urban renewal and tenant relocations; (3) smashing of old family patterns and disintegration of social influences; (4) individual disillusionment and frustration; and (5) cynicism and aggressive behavior of weaker personalities. These are all problems so complicated that those who are the direct sufferers are apt to be the least able to understand them. They require resources so widespread and so involved in their relationship that only skilled and experienced leadership can make use of them.

It is this kind of leadership that the Urban League has been building up for 50 years, but needs to multiply several times in order to meet the problem ahead. Such leadership, already welded together in working teams—north, south, east and west in a single organization, has been the inspiration of the Urban League slogan, "American Teamwork Works." It is essential that the Nation see to it that the slogan is made an accurate prophecy in the years immediately ahead.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

It is a pleasure to join in the observance of the 50th anniversary of the National Urban League.

Our Nation was founded on the concept of liberty and justice for all its citizens. Steady progress has been made in applying this concept in the daily life of America but the need for further work and vigilance remains.

To strengthen the individual and the general welfare of our people we must continue to advance our traditions of equal opportunity regardless of race, religion, or national origin. Moreover, the progress we make in this field of human rights is closely watched by our neighbors abroad. They look upon it as one measure of success of our form of government.

As the National Urban League champions the cause of equal opportunity, it renders a splendid service to our people and to the hope of freedom around the world.

DWIGHT D. EISENHOWER.

PERMANENT MEMORIAL TO MEMORY OF WOODROW WILSON

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, on behalf of myself and Senators ANDERSON, BARTLETT, BIBLE, BYRD of Virginia, CASE of New Jersey, CASE of South Dakota, CLARK, COOPER, DODD, DOUGLAS, ENGLE, ERVIN, FULBRIGHT, GREEN, HART, HENNINGS, HILL, HOLLAND, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, JOHNSON of Texas, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, KEFAUVER, KENNEDY, KERR, KUCHEL, LONG of Hawaii, LONG of Louisiana, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MCCARTHY, MCGEE, MCNAMARA, MORSE, MOSS, MURRAY, MUSKIE, NEUBERGER, PASTORE, PROXMIRE, RANDOLPH, ROBERTSON, SPARKMAN, SYMINGTON, WILEY, YARBOROUGH, and YOUNG of North Dakota, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution may be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the desk through January 25, so that other Senators who wish to cosponsor it may do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD and lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from New Jersey.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 152) authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey (for himself and other Senators), was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Woodrow Wilson, as twenty-eighth President of the United States, won the enduring gratitude of the people of the United States and throughout the world for his farsighted and tireless efforts to achieve a lasting peace, with justice and freedom for all; and

Whereas he so eloquently phrased the principles for which this country stands and provided, with his own high standards of integrity, vision and compassionate goodwill, an inspiration for generations to come: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) there is hereby established a commission, to be known as the "Woodrow Wilson Memorial Commission" (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission"), for the purpose of considering and formulating plans for the design, construction, and location of a permanent memorial to Woodrow Wilson in Washington, District of Columbia, or in its immediate environs. The Commission shall, in general, decide on the advisability of one of two kinds of memorials: one which would be a monument similar to those which honor Presidents Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln; or one which will serve as a building of a functional nature, or, as it is often called, a "living memorial." The Commission shall study, among others, proposals to associate the memorial with the Washington International Center program for international visitors.

(b) The Commission shall be composed of the following members:

(1) Former Presidents of the United States, at their pleasure;

(2) Two persons to be appointed by the President of the United States;

(3) Two Senators to be appointed by the President of the Senate;

(4) Two Members of the House of Representatives to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and

(5) Three members to be appointed by the President of the United States, one from each of the following:

(A) The Woodrow Wilson Foundation;

(B) The Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission (now discharged); and

(C) One member of the Department of the Interior, who shall be the Director of the National Park Service, or his representative.

(c) The Commission shall select a chairman and a vice chairman from among its members. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the Commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

(d) The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation, but shall be reimbursed for expenses incurred by them in carrying out the duties of the Commission.

(e) The Commission shall report such plans, together with its recommendations, to the President and Congress at the earliest practicable date, and in the interim shall make annual reports of its progress to the President and Congress.

SEC. 2. The Commission is authorized to—

(a) make such expenditures for personal services and otherwise for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution as it may deem advisable from funds appropriated or received as gifts for such purpose;

(b) accept gifts to be used in carrying out the provisions of this joint resolution or to be used in connection with the construction or other expenses of such memorial;

(c) hold hearings, organize contests, enter into contracts for personal services and otherwise, and do such other things as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution; and

(d) avail itself of the assistance and advice of the Commission of Fine Arts, the National Capital Planning Commission, and the National Capital Regional Planning Council, and such Commissions and Council shall, upon request, render such assistance and advice.

SEC. 3. There is authorized to be appropriated not more than $10,000 to carry out the provisions of this joint resolution.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I am not one of the sponsors of the joint resolution which the able Senator has just introduced. I have a policy against cosponsorship. But I wish to be recorded at this time as a supporter of the joint resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. I am very grateful to the Senator from Tennessee for his support of the joint resolution authorizing the creation of a committee to make a study of plans to construct a memorial to Woodrow Wilson.

FEDERAL FINANCING OF CERTAIN CAMPAIGN COSTS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILL—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR BILL TO LIE ON THE DESK

Mr. NEUBERGER. Mr. President, under the previous order, I ask that the names of Senators KENNEDY, MANSFIELD, MORSE, and MURRAY be added as cosponsors of Senate bill 2823, to correct certain abuses in campaign financing, which I introduced on January 14.

I also ask unanimous consent that the bill remain at the desk for another week in order that additional persons desiring to cosponsor this measure may have an opportunity to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the names of the additional cosponsors will be added to the bill, and the bill will lie on the desk for another week, as requested by the Senator from Oregon.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE, PLATTE, S. DAK.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 2860) to provide for a highway bridge over the Missouri River west or southwest of Platte, S. Dak., which I introduced on the 19th of January, may have a star print with a minor correction, and that the name of my colleague, the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT] may be added as a cosponsor of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SELECT COMMITTEE TO RECOMMEND LEGISLATION RELATING TO THE JURISDICTION OVER AMERICANS EMPLOYED BY, OR ACCOMPANYING, OUR ARMED FORCES OVERSEAS—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF RESOLUTION

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, at the request of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DODD], I ask that his name be added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 253, to establish a select committee to recommend legislation relating to the jurisdiction over Americans employed by, or accompanying, our Armed Forces overseas.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota:

Address delivered by Senator CARLSON before the national convention, Association of Wheat Growers, December 10, 1959.

USES OF OUR NATIONAL RESOURCES

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, last Tuesday the majority leader inserted in the RECORD a challenging article entitled "The Second Best," written by the distinguished journalist, Mr. Walter Lippmann. In the article Mr. Lippmann asked whether the drive to reduce the share of the national income spent by the National Government had not also reduced the capacity of the United States to meet the enormous challenges of the decade ahead.

Today Mr. Lippmann has followed that article with another, and equally pertinent, inquiry into the proper uses of our national resources. The article is entitled "A Satisfied Nation." I ask unanimous consent that the article be printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SATISFIED NATION

(By Walter Lippmann)

With the economic report, which has just been transmitted to Congress, the President has completed what was begun in the address on the state of the Union and the message accompanying the budget. He has described our situation as he sees it. He has outlined his program. And he has sketched in his general ideas. All is well in that the Government will ask nothing more of the people, and there is a prospect that it will ask less.

For it is the President's view that the country is secure. It is prosperous. And insofar as it is challenged by the rise of the Soviet Union, the country can rest assured and tranquil that because of our devotion to individual liberty we are destined to win the competition.

Is all this self-satisfaction justified? Are we entitled to do what these three messages unite in telling us to do? Are we entitled to concentrate our energies in our private affairs, confident that our national interests are secure and well taken care of? For myself I do not think so. I think the President's satisfaction with our situation is based on a short and small view of the historic competition in which we are challenged.

His view of the Soviet challenge is short and small because he does not distinguish between private prosperity, measured in the total production of goods and services for private use, and national power, which is measured not only in terms of armaments but also in terms of wealth directed to education, to public health, to the conservation and development of the natural and the manmade resources of this country.

What is happening is that under the leadership of the President we are promoting private prosperity at the expense of national power. As a result the influence of the United States as a world power is declining. That is why a growing number among us do not share the President's satisfaction and are worried about the future.

Given our situation in the world today, these three messages betray a dangerous complacency. This complacency derives from the deep fallacy of believing that in an era of cold war it should be the policy of the National Government to reduce the share of the national income which is spent by the Government. This fallacy can best be understood in the light of some testimony given a year ago by the Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. "As I understand an economy," he said, "its ultimate purpose is to produce more consumer goods. This is the object of everything we are working at: to produce things for consumers."

Then the chairman went on to say that "if you take total gross national production, you find that growth in recent years has lagged. But if you look at consumption—the thing which, as I say, I regard myself as being commissioned to maximize—you find that we are doing better."

There precisely is the root of our trouble. Our goal is to maximize consumption. That is a very low national goal, and altogether unworthy of a great nation which has a great part to play in human affairs. The object of our economy is not to become fat with consumer goods. It is to use the wealth and the power which the economy can produce to support the national purposes which we so frequently proclaim. There is nothing very convincing or inspiring in loving our liberty to enjoy consumer goods so much that we cannot afford to educate our children. If we really believe in the ideals and the spiritual aims about which so much is said, we have something else to do besides maximizing the enjoyment of consumer goods.

The most vocal criticism of the current official satisfaction has come from those who believe that we are falling behind in the race of armaments. To this criticism the new Secretary of Defense, Mr. Gates, and the Chiefs of Staff are now replying. They are replying to the critics who have oversimplified and overdramatized the situation and are arguing that within a few years the Soviet Union will be able to devastate and knock out this country.

There is no reason to doubt that the administration is right when it replies that the Soviet Union does not have and is not likely to achieve such military supremacy over us that an all-out attack would be undertaken. But Mr. Gates is dealing with a straw man. The soberer criticism is much more formidable. It prophesies no catastrophe. But it says that the rate of the rise of Soviet military capacity in conventional as well as nuclear capability appears to be greater than our own, and that the Soviet Union appears to be administering more efficiently than we do the resources of the new and revolutionary military technology.

That does not portent doomsday in 1963. But it does portent a rise in the world power of the Soviet Union and a corresponding decline of our own. No doubt that will not worry us too much if we can keep our minds fixed on consumer goods.

RESOURCES AND CONSERVATION BILL, S. 2549

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I desire to bring to the attention of Senators the fact that hearings before the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs have been scheduled on the proposed Resources and Conservation Act of 1960—S. 2549. The hearings open tomorrow, Friday, at 2 o'clock, to accommodate certain Governors and other State officials who will be in Washington on other matters. The hearings will resume on Thursday morning, January 28, and will continue on the next day, Friday, January 29.

There is, I know, in the Senate, a keen awareness that the United States is not keeping natural resource programs abreast of the resource needs of the growing population and the expanding economy. This expansion creates rapidly mounting needs for more water, for more forest products, for more recreational lands, and for all the other resources on which we depend. But the efforts of the Federal, State, and local governments, and of private organizations, industries, and individuals, all taken together, do not add up to resource development and conservation programs to match present and future needs. We are headed for shortages of developed resources, and at the same time we are despoiling the country and stripping it of its beauties of forest lands and fishing streams.

The gap between the natural-resource activities that now are going on and those that are needed is recognized in the Senate. Many Senators have spoken to me of their concern with our lack of progress, in spite of the diligent efforts in the Congress and the volume of natural-resource legislation considered in each session. One of the difficulties is that natural-resource programs have not been presented in relation to the rapid rise of population and industrial production. Another difficulty is that resource activities have not been presented as inter-related parts of a coordinated program—which they must be, if they are to succeed.

Based on our experiences, the resources and conservation bill—S. 2549—provides for continuing attention to be provided by the Council of Resource and Conservation Advisers, in the Office of the President, and the Joint Resources and Conservation Committee, in the Congress.

When I introduced the resources and conservation bill—S. 2549—last August, I was gratified to have a very considerable number of other Senators join as cosponsors. This action and the generous statements of the other Senators who are endorsing the bill were most encouraging to me as evidence that my legislative proposal comports with the views of so many of my distinguished colleagues.

Since the introduction of the resources and conservation bill, I have received many expressions from persons outside Congress. They represent a very wide sector of the public, from all walks of life and from all parts of the country. These expressions of endorsement and support for enactment of legislation such as the resources and conservation bill confirm the conviction held by the bill's cosponsors; namely, that the people throughout the country earnestly desire vigorous, comprehensive, and coordinated development and conservation of natural resources.

Many of the communications are from men who are distinguished in public life and have had broad experience in positions of high responsibility. There are also communications from leaders in industry, the heads of labor unions, and distinguished men in the great universities.

These communications are highly significant to me, because they express the judgment of some of the ablest men of our time. In order that other Senators may have the benefit of the views of these leaders in the economic and academic life and in public affairs, I ask unanimous consent that excerpts from their communications be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

Some of these communications include excellent suggestions for improving the proposed legislation. Additional suggestions undoubtedly will be made by witnesses at the hearings, and I hope to receive some in the comments that I have requested from the executive branch. At the conclusion of the hearings, all of the suggestions will be considered by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, and amendments will be made to improve the bill in whatever ways the committee may consider appropriate.

In order that there may be progress in this important field of natural resources, I shall endeavor to report the bill to the Senate in time for consideration and action.

It is my hope that enactment of the resources and conservation bill will be one of the enduring accomplishments of the 86th Congress.

There being no objection, the excerpts were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPTS FROM RECENT CORRESPONDENCE ON THE RESOURCES AND CONSERVATION BILL (S. 2549)

Seymour Harris, professor of economics, Harvard University:

"In view of the failure of the Government to integrate the various plans for the best use of our natural resources, and in view of the failure to make the most effective use of our resources, I welcome Senate bill 2549, a bill introduced by Senator MURRAY and 30 other Senators on August 20, 1959.

"This proposed legislation is an excellent bill and should contribute greatly to the formulation of an adequate policy which has so far not been available in the area of utilization of natural resources."

David E. Lilienthal, former director of Tennessee Valley Authority:

"The struggle to conserve, develop, and wisely utilize God's gift of natural resources is an unending one, of course. This bill (S. 2549), it seems to me, will provide a mechanism for keeping the facts about this issue current and before the public and the Congress, and therefore promote the cause of conservation to which you have devoted such great efforts during your career in the Senate."

Hugh H. Bennett, former Chief of Soil Conservation Service:

"For one thing—and I feel this is important—without some such expression (as S. 2549) of national policy we are, in my opinion, likely to continue running in the dark as regards the wisest possible use of our natural resources, particularly those in short supply. This relates to physical, biological, and recreational resources more or less alike. Such a policy kept prominently and persistently before the public is sorely needed at this time because of the danger of population growth outrunning the capabilities of our resources.

"I particularly like the wording of that part of the printed bill (lines 24 and 25, page 3, and line 1, page 4) reading: '* * * to analyze and interpret national policy, to appraise programs and activities of the Government in the light of the policy declared in section 2 * * *'."

J. D. Zellerbach, chairman of the board, Crown Zellerbach Corp.:

"Certainly the demands of our growing population on our natural resources will multiply in years to come. Unless we take continuous soundings of the situation and develop and conserve our natural resources in such a way that national needs will be satisfactorily met, we could run the serious risk of eventually outstripping the raw materials necessary to keep our national economy growing and dynamic. Indeed, as you point out, with respect to some resources our position is already critical. Consequently, I concur with your position, and I hope that Congress will put your legislative proposal into effect."

George Meany, president, A.F. of L. and CIO:

"Our organization is certainly in sympathy with the intent and purposes of your bill. While we may differ in some details regarding governmental machinery proposed in S. 2549, we would be pleased to testify in support of your objectives at an appropriate time * * *."

League of Women Voters of the United States:

"At a meeting of the national board in September in the statement of national policy contained in S. 2549 and the machinery which it would provide for keeping facts about water up to date was discussed. The board decided that these proposals meet the standards league members agree are necessary for improved procedures in water resource development and management, and that S. 2549 should have league support."

Herbert H. Lehman, former Governor and Senator from New York:

"Senator Murray's bill, S. 2549, proposing a permanent national policy on the conservation, development, and utilization of our forest, soil, water, and mineral resources fills an important gap in the tools of modern government. The rate of operation of our economy surely requires an increasing availability of raw materials of every kind, as well as concerted policies for the conservation and development of the basic sources of such materials.

"The establishment of a Joint Congressional Committee on Resources and Conservation and the presentation by the President of an annual resources and conservation report will supply the Nation with a much clearer basis for policy formulation in this field than we have had previously.

"America has been blessed with an abundance of natural resources, exceeding those of most nations of the world. During the first three centuries of settlement on this continent, this very abundance led to a widespread waste. The conservation movement was instrumental in bringing this waste to somewhat of a halt. The two Roosevelts, Pinchot, Norris, and other progressive leaders of the past several generations have fostered important conservation policies by which we benefit today. But the time has come for a new and broadened approach toward natural resource management. Senator MURRAY'S bill will do this. I hope that it receives the full support of all citizens and their Representatives and Senators in Congress."

Oscar L. Chapman, former Secretary of the Interior:

"First, let me say that you and your colleagues are to be commended highly upon this proposal (S. 2549). It is long overdue. The void which has existed since the demise of the National Resources Planning Board would be filled by the creation of a council of resources and conservation advisers, such as you propose.

"Certainly, in our defense effort we expect and demand that those charged with the responsibility for the military security of the Nation should plan in a forward looking and imaginative manner. The same demand should be made on behalf of the general national security.

"It seems to me that there can be no argument about the fact that our country will remain strong and a leader among the people of the earth, only so long as we conserve our resources and utilize them in such fashion as to make them provide the greatest good for the greatest number.

"I welcome the basic policy proposed by S. 2549.

"The problems of water, forests, soil and moisture conservation, stream pollution, energy development and conservation and the like, do require—as you point out—'a permanent mechanism in government' to give continuing attention to these subjects. The interim work that has been done, ably in most instances, by the Paley Commission, the Cooke Commission, the Hoover Commission, and others have all been tremendously important and worth while, but each has suffered from a lack of continuity, from the gap between it and the study preceding it, and had no foreseeable relationship to those which might come later.

"Conservation is not a static thing. Our population grows daily and thus our needs expand in all directions. We continue to find and to create new uses for well-known resources. We are each day coming closer to a shorter workweek so that we need more and better facilities to provide for the greater leisure which our people will have coupled with the material resource to utilize that leisure. It is obvious, therefore, that the planning of prudent resource utilization is an ever-changing and progressing activity.

"It is only through a highly skilled agency of Government, working cooperatively with State and local governments and with such private organizations or individuals as can make a contribution to this planning process that we can look forward to the maintenance and enhancement of our national welfare.

"I hope that S. 2549 will be speedily enacted into law."

Dr. Roland Renne, president, Montana State College:

"I am in complete sympathy with the overall objective of your bill (S. 2549), namely, to achieve needed coordination and assure effective promotion of conversation, development, and utilization of natural resources.

"I believe your bill would do much to improve the effective conservation, development, and utilization of our natural resources; and the creation, in the Executive Office of the President, of the Council of Resources and Conservation Advisers should be helpful in getting more effective development programs."

Chad F. Calhoun, vice president, Kaiser Industries Corp.:

"The proposals set forth in S. 2549, introduced by you and 30 other Senators, appear to be a sound approach looking to the future conservation, developments, and use of our great natural resources. The advantages of establishing continuing bodies in the executive and congressional branches of our Government to make long-range policy decisions in this field warrant serious consideration by the Congress. The Paley Commission likewise recognized this need in its report to the President.

"Sound, continuing, expert bodies to appraise, evaluate, and recommend programs and policies relative to our natural resources as proposed by you and the other Senators appears desirable."

Alvin H. Hansen, professor emeritus of economics, Harvard university:

"I heartily endorse your proposal as contained in your bill—'Resources and Conservation Act of 1960.'

"This is an excellent idea and it urgently deserves action by the Congress."

Gordon R. Clapp, former Chairman of the Board, TVA:

"It seemed clear to me that the proposed declaration of policy contained in your bill (S. 2549), the Council of Advisers for the President, and the Joint Committee proposed are long overdue. The accelerated rate of depletion of our raw material resources, the interruption of concentration upon the important and possible use of the Nation's water resources for power and for potable and industrial water supply, and the continued piecemeal portrayal of limited and special parts of these problems as they are considered by the executive branch or as they reach or originate with the Congress, cannot help but put us as a Nation further and further behind in relation to our growing population and its needs.

"As an interested citizen who has had a special opportunity over many years to take part in the development and conservation of natural resources, I give thanks for the vision and initiative of you and the Senators who have joined with you in the introduction of this legislation."

Michael V. DiSalle, Governor, State of Ohio:

"We have carefully reviewed S. 2459 introduced by you and a number of other Senators. After a careful review of the legislation and a report from our Department of Natural Resources, we have arrived at the conclusion that the legislation would be of great help."

R. V. Bottomly, judge, Montana Supreme Court:

"Your program if enacted into law and properly administered may well be the deciding factor in our Nation's survival.

"In the event your bill (S. 2549) is administered in the interest of the public, it will resurrect and restore in the various departments of Government which deal with conservation, and the educational institutions which train their personnel, that vital spark of dedication to the cause and leadership."

Robert R. Nathan, former deputy director, Office of War Mobilization:

"The purposes which the bill (S. 2549) seeks to accomplish are certainly highly desirable and important. Economic developments over the next decade and generation should bring a sustained and substantial increase in total output and this will necessitate positive measures to conserve and efficiently utilize our natural resources. Otherwise, we will find ourselves in increasing difficulties arising out of the failure to develop and implement positive policies toward these objectives.

"Occasional investigations are useful but they do not serve the purpose adequately of achieving maximum conservation. As you point out in your statement, such commissions and investigations are transitory. What we need is some mechanism for continuity and therefore I think your proposal is most meritorious and warrants widespread support. I do hope you will be most successful and you may be sure of my support and cooperation."

Morris E. Garnsey, professor of economics, University of Colorado:

"It should be a matter of concern to all of us that the United States lacks a national policy on conservation, development and utilization of natural resources. Certainly more people are noticing this failure and are becoming more fearful of its consequences.

"I wish to endorse your proposal (S. 2549) to develop such a policy through a Council of Resources and Conservation Advisers to the President. As you so correctly pointed out to the Senate in your speech both the Paley report and the Cooke report have lost much of their value because of the lack of effective followup."

Dr. J. P. Linduska, director of Public Relations and Wildlife Management at Remington Farms:

"In my opinion this could well be one of the significant pieces of legislation in our time. I hope you will press for an early enactment.

"Twenty years of dedication to resource management at the Federal level has convinced me that correction is long overdue of our policy of reckless exploitation. I compliment you for your foresight in recognizing our needs over the long pull and in offering a solution as embodied in the bill (S. 2549) which you have introduced."

Paul E. Bruns, chairman, Forestry Department, University of New Hampshire:

"In reference to your speech of August 17 on the Resources and Conservation Act that you introduced, you have and are making an outstanding contribution to the Nation and its future through your efforts in the field of wise resource use, and in this bill as a specific item.

"There is need not only for clear thought on maximum utilization of land as a management function, but in correlation of effort on the part of all agencies in the effort. Certainly your bill is a contribution toward this end."

John J. Craighead, Cooperative Wildlife Research Unit, Montana State University:

"I believe that the council and the joint committee on resources and conservation can perform a very vital function in seeing that all aspects of resource management get full consideration and that no special interest, either within or without the Government, are able to promote and sustain a narrow shortsighted policy with regard to resource development."

Adolf A. Berle, Jr., director, Twentieth Century Fund:

"I need hardly add that I am glad that you and your colleagues are seeking effective action in this area."

E. J. Workman, director, New Mexico Institute of Mining and Technology:

"It is the opinion of the members of this staff that the bill (S. 2549) which you have introduced would make an excellent law."

John H. Cover, director, Bureau of Business and Economic Research, University of Maryland:

"I hope very much that the Congress will respond to your effort at the establishment of an advisory council on resources and resource conservation, and I wish to express our appreciation of your effort."

SENATOR CHURCH AS KEYNOTER

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in the Washington Evening Star of Wednesday, January 20, 1960, there appeared an article entitled "Senator CHURCH as Keynoter." The article was written by Mr. William S. White.

Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. CHURCH] is one of the bright, young, mature stars in the Democratic constellation. I believe it would be wonderful to have a man of Senator CHURCH's maturity, presence, and ability be the keynoter at the Democratic Convention. I sincerely hope that the many nice things said about Senator CHURCH by Mr. White will be taken into consideration by his colleagues and by the national committee, and that Senator CHURCH will have the honor to represent us in that capacity at the convention.

Senator CHURCH comes from one of the smallest States populationwise, Idaho. But in his 4 years as a Member of the Senate he has made his voice heard. His views are sound and solid, and he has proved himself to be a very distinguished Senator.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to have the article written by Mr. White printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATOR CHURCH AS KEYNOTER—IDAHO DEMOCRAT, A MODERATE LIBERAL, IS TERMED IDEAL FOR CONVENTION JOB

(By William S. White)

One of the smallest of the States in population may well provide the largest and most eloquent voice at the Democratic National Convention next July.

Senator FRANK CHURCH, of Idaho—at 35 the youngest man in the Senate—is being strongly pushed for keynote speaker and temporary chairman of the convention.

The field of possibilities also numbers Senator EDWIN S. MUSKIE, of Maine and Gov. Gaylord Nelson, of Wisconsin. But on balance, Senator CHURCH seems to have much better than a 1-in-3 chance of selection.

A moderate liberal of the casual western variety, he is representative of the broadest single sector of his party. His "geography" is right. The Democrats need to pay special attention to the West, the fastest growing region of the country and also the fastest growing section of the Democratic Party.

Too, he is perhaps the most widely respected of the young Democrats of the Senate—for general ability, for fairmindedness and, what is very important here, for oratorical powers. Half a generation ago the pros considered oratory to be "making the eagle scream." His eagle does not scream; it speaks, instead, in more muted, more appealing, modern accents.

Finally Senator CHURCH is not committed to any of the Democratic presidental aspirants. Thus he would arouse no acute suspicion that as keynoter he might promote Jones over Brown or Smith or Green.

A keynoter-temporary chairman's task is to deliver the convention first major address and so to lay down the pattern of party policy for the campaign. Once he has done this, a permanent chairman is chosen to preside over the convention. Representative HALE BOGGS, of Louisiana, is out in front for this post.

The system of selecting the keynoter is elaborately traditional. Democratic National Chairman Paul Butler will appoint a committee on arrangements. This committee will recommend a keynoter to the convention. The convention will then elect him.

All this seems a dull and dusty business, and sometimes it is just that. This time, however, it will be a good deal more than routine. Because there is so large a field of real Democratic presidential possibilities—half a dozen—the tone taken by the keynoter's speech will have real meaning. What he says cannot actually bind or control whoever is ultimately nominated for President. But it can surely please or greatly embarrass that fortunate fellow.

If Governor Nelson should turn out to be the keynoter he would certainly deliver a call for far-advanced liberalism—a difficult plank for a presidential nominee to walk on unless he himself should be an advanced liberal. Senator MUSKIE, for his part, is a moderate liberal like Senator CHURCH. But Senator MUSKIE is also a Catholic.

An outstanding presidential candidate, Senator JOHN F. KENNEDY, of Massachusetts, is a Catholic. So is Representative BOGGS. And so is Chairman Butler. Therefore, there is a fairly general tendency not to have a Catholic keynoter as well.

All this has increasingly turned attention to Senator CHURCH. Then there are yet other factors: television's image and the image of youth. The Democrats want an impression of youthful vigor to go out over the TV screens in order to compete with the brisk youthfulness of Vice President NIXON, 47, the almost inevitable Republican presidential choice. Slim and dark, Senator CHURCH photographs well—and nobody could possibly confuse him with some middle-aged chap. A happy side point is that he is most pleasantly reserved about headline hunting.

The fact is that Senator CHURCH's status in the race for keynoter is an interesting commentary on how politics is changing. A few years ago the young were rarely either seen or heard at a national convention. Now the old boys are still the indispensable men in those famous smoke-filled rooms. But out front they are giving way to the young.

GRAIN STORAGE TESTIMONY BY THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, on January 12, 13, and 14 of this year, the Special Agricultural Investigating Subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry commenced hearings on the grain storage operations of the Commodity Credit Corporation. Witnesses were heard from the grain trade and from the Department of Agriculture.

Only 3 days later, the Secretary of Agriculture appeared on the NBC radio and television program "Meet the Press."

In response to a question concerning grain storage, propounded by Mr. Ned Brooks, moderator of the program, Mr. Benson stated:

> Of course the hearings are not over. You have heard one side. I presume the grain trade will be given an opportunity to be heard and I presume the Department will also.

This is indeed an astounding statement on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, for it can only be interpreted to mean that the Department of Agriculture did not have anyone appear before the Agriculture Subcommittee at its hearings in January.

On January 14, 1960, during the time the subcommittee was in session, testimony was taken from Mr. Raymond J. Pollock, Director of the Grain Division of Commodity Stabilization Service, USDA, and Mr. Robert Hanson, Deputy Director of the Grain Division. They were the day's only two witnesses.

Mr. Pollock was invited to appear before the subcommittee because the storage operations of the USDA are under his Division and under his jurisdiction.

Director Pollock's statements were most interesting in many respects.

First, he declared that the CCC owns bins for grain storage with a capacity of some 958,000,000 bushels, but that, at the present time, these are only 70 percent occupied.

Mr. Pollock further testified that the USDA started a survey last August of the cost of storage of grain in CCC-owned bins, and had further made a cost study survey to determine the cost of grain storage by commercial warehousemen under the Uniform Grain Storage Agreement. He stated, however, that the results of these two surveys were not ready yet—and would not be ready for another 75 to 90 days.

The Grain Director testified that some 32 to 33 million bushels of grain is stored in ships of the reserve fleet; also, that he did not know the cost of storing this grain in these Government ships.

He further admitted that he did not know the cost of storing grain in CCC bins, nor did he know the cost of storage for commercial warehousemen under the UGSA.

Mr. Pollock did know how much the Government paid the commercial warehousemen. Whether this was a fair payment or not, he could hardly be expected to know, since the Department did not, until the fall of 1959, undertake a cost study of commercial warehouses.

The Department of Agriculture has, in the last 7 years, spent $2,300 million for commodity storage, and is just now getting around to a cost study. But their lack of knowledge does not seem to have stopped the Department from increasing the storage rates paid to commercial warehouses.

This lack of knowledge on the part of the man in charge of the Government grain storage program is a shocking fact.

Now, it should be remembered that he is acting as chairman of the negotiating sessions, currently under way between the USDA and representatives of the grain trade, called to set a new schedule of storage rates to commence July 1, 1960. This same individual was one of the industry negotiators for the UGSA in 1956, which was the last time this contract was negotiated.

At the previous day's hearings, testimony was given by operators of commercial warehouses, who, by their own figures, were making profits on cost ranging from 50 percent to as high as 167 percent. Nevertheless, the Director of the Grain Division stated he thought the storage rates were fair.

Why this indifference by responsible officials in the USDA for expenditures of the taxpayers' money?

These Agriculture officials further testified that for a period of time, up to March 1, 1959, the CCC was not only failing to utilize all of its own bins for storage of grain, but was actually leasing these bins to commercial warehousemen and others, at a rental rate of 9 cents per bushel. They were then turning around and paying the same warehousemen 16½ cents a bushel for storage of grain in these bins.

The utter futility of this type of operation is well described in an editorial which appeared in the January 18 issue of the Washington News, entitled "Empty Bins." I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EMPTY BINS

> The Agriculture Department is paying privately owned storage companies an average of around 18 cents a bushel to handle surplus crops.
>
> Meanwhile the Government has room for approximately 300 million bushels in its own bins.
>
> Government storage cost—once it owns the storage bins—has been figured at around 3 cents a bushel, instead of the 18 cents it is paying.
>
> Why doesn't the Government use its own bins and save all this money?

Agriculture Secretary Benson points out to his senatorial critics that Congress has ordered him to "utilize the usual and customary channels, facilities, and arrangements of trade and commerce" for storage.

We are all for private enterprise, but a regulation requiring the Government to rent from private individuals and companies what it already owns is "nuts"—to the tune of some $40 million or more a year if our figures are correct.

There are, as Secretary Benson notes, many things wrong with the farm program, but there shouldn't be any argument about this. Congress should notify the Secretary promptly to forget about those "usual and customary" facilities and use his own bins.

Mr. SYMINGTON. Mr. President, the responsibility for this costly situation rests not with the farmer, not with the Congress, not with the grain trade, but with the Secretary of Agriculture, who has the sole responsibility for setting grain storage rates.

All of this money is being charged to the farm program. But the sad fact remains that the farmers are getting very, very little of this amount.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture is currently engaged in negotiations for a new Uniform Grain Storage Agreement. The importance of these conferences becomes readily apparent when we stop to think that each one cent of the rate for storage set by the UGSA represents an annual expenditure of $25 million to the American taxpayer.

Let us hope, therefore, that at long last, the Department will go into these negotiations properly armed with all of the facts, so that they can diligently work for a contract that is not only fair to the grain trade, but also insures that the country's taxpayers will get full value for each dollar spent.

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SYMINGTON. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I cannot let this opportunity pass without congratulating the Senator from Missouri for his excellent statement. Also, this may be an appropriate occasion to commend him for the very expert and excellent way in which he is acting as chairman of the subcommittee. This is the kind of investigation in which one is tempted to sensationalize, but the Senator from Missouri has been careful, thoughtful, and fair to all concerned. He has been absolutely sure of his facts before he has spoken; and I think the results of the investigation, in the long run, are going to be of benefit to all the American people, particularly the farmer and taxpayer.

Mr. SYMINGTON. I thank the able Senator from Wisconsin, who, day by day, gives more proof both to his colleagues and the country of his outstanding ability. I express my appreciation to him for his fine cooperation and support in the hearings. As he has well said, we have a problem tied up tight with accounting, ascertaining where the money went. It is a difficult task. We have an able but small staff, supplemented by the fine support of the Comptroller General of the United States. We want the truth, not the headlines. We intend to continue our work.

A SATISFIED NATION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in his column in this morning's Washington Post, Walter Lippmann goes right to the heart of the central weakness of the Eisenhower administration—its failure to ask more from the American people, and the prospect it will ask less because it envisions its mission as simply increasing the country's consumption of consumer goods—in a word, to make a fat nation fatter.

There is no answer to the crying need for more education, for improved public health, for development of our resources for meeting the challenge of the U.S.S.R., in the mind, the heart, and the soul of the American people.

Lippmann bases this indictment on the President's three major reports to this Congress: His state of the Union message, his budget, and his annual economic report.

I ask unanimous consent that this brilliant analysis be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A SATISFIED NATION

(By Walter Lippmann)

With the economic report, which has just been transmitted to Congress, the President has completed what was begun in the address on the state of the Union and the message accompanying the budget. He has described our situation as he sees it. He has outlined his program. And he has sketched in his general ideas. All is well in that the Government will ask nothing more of the people, and there is a prospect that it will ask less.

For it is the President's view that the country is secure. It is prosperous. And insofar as it is challenged by the rise of the Soviet Union, the country can rest assured and tranquil that because of our devotion to individual liberty we are destined to win the competition.

Is all this self-satisfaction justified? Are we entitled to do what these three messages unite in telling us to do? Are we entitled to concentrate our energies on our private affairs, confident that our national interests are secure and well taken care of? For myself I do not think so. I think the President's satisfaction with our situation is based on a short and a small view of the historic competition in which we are challenged.

His view of the Soviet challenge is short and small because he does not distinguish between private prosperity, measured in the total production of goods and services for private use, and national power, which is measured not only in terms of armaments but also in terms of wealth directed to education, to public health, to the conservation and development of the natural and the manmade resources of this country.

What is happening is that under the leadership of the President we are promoting private prosperity at the expense of national power. As a result the influence of the United States as a world power is declining. That is why a growing number among us do not share the President's satisfaction and are worried about the future.

Given our situation in the world today, these three messages betray a dangerous complacency. This complacency derives from the deep fallacy of believing that in an era of cold war it should be the policy of the National Government "to reduce the share of the national income which is spent by the Government." This fallacy can best be understood in the light of some testimony given a year ago by the Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. "As I understand an economy," he said, "its ultimate purpose is to produce more consumer goods. This is the object of everything we are working at: to produce things for consumers."

Then the Chairman went on to say that "if you take total gross national production, you find that growth in recent years has lagged. But if you look at consumption—the thing which, as I say, I regard myself as being commissioned to maximize—you find that we are doing better."

There precisely is the root of our trouble. Our goal is to maximize consumption. That is a very low national goal, and altogether unworthy of a great nation which has a great part to play in human affairs. The object of our economy is not to become fat with consumer goods. It is to use the wealth and the power which the economy can produce to support the national purposes which we so frequently proclaim. There is nothing very convincing or inspiring in loving our "liberty" to enjoy consumer goods so much that we cannot afford to educate our children. If we really believe in the ideals and the spiritual aims about which so much is said, we have something else to do besides maximizing the enjoyment of consumer goods.

The most vocal criticism of the current official satisfaction has come from those who believe that we are falling behind in the race of armaments. To this criticism the new Secretary of Defense, Mr. Gates, and the Chiefs of Staff are now replying. They are replying to the critics who have oversimplified and overdramatized the situation and are arguing that within a few years the Soviet Union will be able to devastate and knock out this country.

There is no reason to doubt that the Administration is right when it replies that the Soviet Union does not have and is not likely to achieve such military supremacy over us that an all-out attack would be undertaken. But Mr. Gates is dealing with a strawman. The soberer criticism is much more formidable. It prophesies no catastrophe. But it says that the rate of the rise of Soviet military capacity in conventional as well as nuclear capability appears to be greater than our own, and that the Soviet Union appears to be administering more efficiently than we do the resources of the new and revolutionary military technology.

That does not portend doomsday in 1963. But it does portend a rise in the world power of the Soviet Union and a corresponding decline of our own. No doubt that will not worry us too much if we can keep our minds fixed on consumer goods.

Q AWARDS AS A STIMULANT TO BUSINESS

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak for not more than 6 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, a few days ago, a distinguished western electronics manufacturer in California told his employees:

We are individually and collectively at war. It is a war against foreign ideology and technology and against our complacency. Aside from preparedness, it is not a war of missiles and nuclear weapons but one of philosophy and production.

Fundamentally, we are engaged in a war of workmanship. It presents us with a challenge that cannot be ignored, for if we rise to it with all our strength we can make the most powerful weapon our country can possess.

Mr. Robert S. Bell, president of the Packard Bell Electronics Corp. in southern California, said his company has begun to establish what he terms a Q award program in its factories to emphasize the need for increased production, quantity, and the necessity for the highest quality attainable in the manufacture of any product. He seeks to enlist the aid of both Government and business in promoting the idea embodied in the slogan "Produce Better—Produce More."

Today, Mr. President, it is my intention for a moment or two to discuss with my colleagues in the Senate the desirability of establishing a Government awards system, similar to the wartime E awards, which would focus attention on achievement in both the quantity and quality of a company's products.

Mr. Bell's statement to his employees referred specifically to the economic competition confronting the American people from the Soviet Union. The nature of that competition is best illustrated by noting that if the Soviet industrial growth rate persists at 8 or 9 percent per year, as now forecast, the gap between our two economies by 1970 will be dangerously narrowed, unless our own industrial growth is increased from its present pace. Mr. Bell's response to this challenge is a very heartening demonstration of faith and confidence in our free, competitive enterprise system. More than that, it is a reaffirmation that our economic system springs from faith in and concern for Americans as individuals. Here is no desire to run from a problem or ignore it. Here is a strong resolve to meet the Communist threat to our way of life head-on by insuring the continuance of a free, healthy, strongly growing economy, unimpaired in its vigor by the ravages of inflation.

Mr. President, America's potential for growth is far greater than that of any other nation at this point in history. We have entered a new decade full of bright and hopeful prospects for the future. First and foremost to all Americans, as it must be to people everywhere, is the overwhelming desire, indeed, the absolute necessity, to achieve a just and lasting peace in this nuclear age. Above all else, this is our great goal, a goal that requires the best and the finest that is in each of us. All other issues pale before the ultimate question of national survival and the honorable preservation of man's freedom. But in our continuous search for a formula by which this objective can be achieved, we must not lose sight of the kind of America we want for the future.

Let us look for a moment to the quantitative challenge ahead of us. There is much that can and must be done. In every large city in the Nation, a large part of the population still lives in slum areas or areas that are rapidly deteriorating in this direction. Our highway system is behind schedule, and public transportation systems have often lagged behind the needs of our rapidly expanding population.

Both quantitatively and qualitatively there is an urgent need to provide a better education for all our children. At the present time we need 140,000 new classrooms and 195,000 new teachers at the secondary school level. For the specially able and talented, facilities must be available to provide all the higher education they can usefully absorb. The task of meeting these needs, in my opinion, should remain essentially a function of State and local government, but the Federal Government, as, indeed, the President himself has indicated, has a vital interest in the problem, and a vital responsibility in its solution. The National Defense Education Act of 1958 is a splendid milestone along the way. Another aspect of a better America must be in the field of decent housing for all our people. Remarkable progress has been made, but much remains to be done, if antiquated structures are to be replaced with new, pleasant living quarters in the next decade. Urban redevelopment is one of the fine Federal undertakings in partnership with State and local governments.

Medical science has made astonishing strides in extending the life-span of our people. It will continue to do so. Qualitatively, medical treatment and research in the United States are the highest in the world. But there is a growing and alarming gap in the ratio between the number of medical doctors and dentists and the rising population. Medical facilities characteristic of the great urban centers are not readily or easily available in rural areas. Greater attention to the needs of these communities should be provided, and this remains one of America's great challenges.

Mr. President, I could augment the range of our quantitative needs far beyond what has been briefly suggested here. But our main focus is on the need to provide greater production of goods and services, at the most reasonable cost consistent with outstanding quality. It is to the business community we as a people, generation after generation, have turned when we think of our wider national efforts to achieve military security and economic progress. It is through effective business organization that America deals with basic economic problems in applying limited resources to unlimited needs. Business is the way we have organized ourselves to carry on economic activity. It is the way we create jobs in America. It is the way employees, managers, investors, and customers are brought together to produce and distribute the things our people want and need. It is also the way millions of Americans have been aided in meeting the problems of personal security through employee-benefit programs. To produce complex weapons for defense in the space age, to supply new and better goods for family living, to increase personal security and to provide opportunity in a thousand ways—our people look first to business, not Government.

The American people rely on some 8 million private businesses for nearly all the work of producing and distributing goods. These businesses include more than 4 million individual proprietorships, corporations, and partnerships, more than 3 million commercial farms and half a million independent professional offices. The dispersal of economic decision making, through these millions of businesses on the production side, and the tens of millions of consumers on the demand side, is a key factor in our economic progress.

A primary objective of Government policy must be to continue to strengthen and to safeguard this unique economic system with its millions of centers of initiative in businesses, farms, and professional offices. This means that the most efficient way to produce the goods Americans want is through reliance on competitive markets and decentralized decision making. It means a government that does not seek to take over the planning of economic activities, a fairminded government whose policies on taxation and on regulatory matters are designed to strengthen our system of fair competition, and to prevent centralized direction of life and livelihood from this city.

Mr. President, Mr. Bell has demonstrated the spirit and heritage of our system in his determination to have American business measure up to the challenge before it. Every segment of our economy, every citizen in our Nation, faces this challenge. "The time has come to stop retreating and start advancing," he said. "In the shooting war we had E awards. Now I think we should have Q awards. Only through quantity can we fight inflation and compete in foreign markets; only through quality can we prevail in any market."

I suggest the desirability of the Department of Commerce preparing a Q awards program to serve as a stimulus to business and industry to "produce better and to produce more" in the interests of a better and stronger America in the world community.

THE ARAB LEAGUE BOYCOTT AND BLOCKADE OF ISRAEL

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the way in which the Arab League boycott and blockade of Israel affects American enterprise as well as American shipping is illustrated by the report that the Navy is including cancellation clauses in oil cargo contracts of American owned tankers. The Military Sea Transport Service in its request for bids has advised tank owners that they will have to foot the bill for extra expenses if their tankers are blacklisted and barred from Arab ports.

This warning in the contract has been pointed out by the Navy to be a matter of "business protection." I should like to point out however that while this is a business decision, the United States is not a business firm. As the leader of the free world, its every action is looked upon in the light of how it advances the cause of peace and justice in our own time. We have insisted on freedom of the seas and we cannot, therefore, condone this interference with American shipping through Suez or by an illegal Arab boycott. At the present time, United Nations Secretary General Dag Hammarskjold is in Cairo to emphasize once more to President Nasser of the United Arab Republic that transit through the Suez Canal under international commitments must be free and unobstructed. It is tremendously important that we lend to the Secretary General in his present mission the full weight of our support.

It is a fact that the loan of $56 million recently made to the United Arab Republic by the World Bank for the improvement of the Suez Canal and our offer to help finance the second stage of the Aswan Dam have both been seized upon and publicly proclaimed by the UAR as vindication of its policies. Both Moscow and Cairo are having a propaganda field day at our expense. This may be inevitable but the whole situation calls for a more determined posture by the United States on this issue of free transit through the Suez Canal for all according to international law and President Nasser's commitments than has heretofore been apparent whatever is being said behind the scenes.

I ask unanimous consent that the dispatch in the New York Times, January 21, 1960, headlined "U.S. Contract Aids Boycott of Israel" and the editorial entitled "Moscow and Cairo," also in the New York Times, January 21, 1960, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, Jan. 21, 1960]

U.S. CONTRACT AIDS BOYCOTT OF ISRAEL

WASHINGTON, January 20.—For nearly 2 years the Navy has virtually foreclosed bidding on oil cargo shipping contracts to U.S.-flag ships that previously did business with Israel.

Navy officials confirmed today that they had included cancellation clauses in contracts with U.S.-flag ships to take into account the Arab boycott of Israel.

They have been warning prospective oil cargo contractors of certain U.S. options should the Arabs refuse to accommodate chartered vessels. In effect, owners of any U.S. ship engaged in business with Israel would be in no position to bid for such a contract.

The provisions of the warning were outlined in a letter December 18 of the Military Sea Transport Service announcing requests for shipping bids for oil cargo movements in January.

Included in the routes for shipments is one designated as Jupiter, which goes through the Suez Canal.

The letter, signed by Comdr. George W. Peterson, Jr., director of the Commercial Water Traffic Division of the Navy and contractor for Military Sea Transport Service shipping contracts, states the following special provisions of the proposed form of charter:

A. In the event the vessel is prevented from loading or discharging in any port by the local authorities because of the vessel having previously traded with Israel, the charterer (the Military Sea Transport Service) shall have the option:

(1) To cancel the charter as of the date loading is refused or after discharge at another port.

(2) To require the substitution of another vessel of similar size, class, conditions of tanks or cargo holds, and in a similar position.

(3) To nominate other loading or discharge port or ports."

The letter says further that the owner would be responsible for the expenses incurred should the Navy be forced to exercise its options.

A Navy spokesman explained that the cancellation provisions had been adopted for oil shipping contracts of this nature after an incident December 18, 1957, when the operator-owners of the tanker National Peace were refused port facilities to pick up cargo at Ras Tanura, Saudi Arabia.

The operator-owners, Pan Cargo Shipping Corp. and National Shipping and Trading Corp. of New York, are now suing the Navy for breach of contract in the southern district court of New York, Navy officials said.

A Navy spokesman emphasized that the form of charter was changed as matter of business protection.

It was pointed out that the contract covered the possibility that such ships not only would be refused port facilities but passage through the Suez Canal as well.

Israel has protested in the United Nations against the exclusion of Israeli ships and cargoes from the Suez Canal by the United Arab Republic. Israeli resentment has been stirred also by the loan granted to Cairo by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development for widening the canal.

MOSCOW AND CAIRO

The Soviet Union's decision to finance the second, as well as the first, stage of the Aswan High Dam in Egypt testifies again to the great importance Moscow attaches to the Middle East. It should not be overlooked that the Soviet Union has agreed to this step despite the fact that President Nasser has cracked down hard during the past year on Communists in the United Arab Republic. Moscow is obviously going to use this background to buttress its propaganda about the selfless character of its economic aid and the alleged lack of political strings attached to that aid.

Ignoring propaganda, however, one central point is clear: For the next decade at least, while the two stages of the dam are under construction, the Soviet Union is now assured of close economic ties with the UAR and of having large numbers of its technicians in that country. How the Soviet Union will use the power inherent in these facts remains to be seen. But history warns against the naive assumption that the Soviet Union will always be correct in its use of its economic power relative to the UAR. With each passing year the hopes of the Egyptian people about the benefits to be derived from the Aswan Dam will be rising; and increasing, too, therefore, will be the political leverage of any threat to halt the dam's construction in midpassage.

President Nasser presumably knows the political perils his decisions on the dam may pose for his country. Apparently he believes he can use Soviet generosity for his advantage without paying too high a price. But whether Moscow will use Cairo or Cairo will use Moscow is something that remains to be seen in the decade ahead.

One additional point should not be overlooked: Whatever Moscow's motives in deciding to finance the first two stages of the Aswan Dam, it is making a tangible contribution to the vast problem of meeting the capital investment needs of the underdeveloped nations. Those, like ourselves, who are suspicious of Moscow's motives cannot simply rest with pointing out the possible pitfalls. Rather, we must show by concrete accomplishments that we are aware of the underdeveloped nations' needs and are anxious to help meet those needs to the best of our ability.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will my colleague yield to me?

Mr. JAVITS. I am glad to yield.

Mr. KEATING. As my colleague knows, I protested the making of the loan by the World Bank, through the Department of State. I recognize that the decision in this matter does not rest only with the United States; there is a board of directors of the World Bank. However, I believe that the making of this loan at this time was a great mistake. I regret that it was made.

The loan having been made, it seems to me there is a very strong obligation on the part of our Government to bring every possible pressure to bear on the United Nations and Mr. Dag Hammarskjold that the latter insist that Mr. Nasser live up to what I understand were the commitments regarding free access to the Suez Canal. His continued action in blocking the canal would be a source of embarrassment, it sems to me, to Dag Hammerskjold. I can only express the hope that the most extreme and profound but also legitimate pressures be brought to bear on Mr. Nasser to see to it that he lives up to international commitments and does not continue to flout international law.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague. I wish to confirm the fine and high-minded and effective efforts of my colleague in this field. I am delighted that he has joined with me in these remarks.

Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KUCHEL in the chair). The Senator from New York.

FORTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE UKRAINE

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine is being celebrated on January 22. I have suggested that this day be proclaimed Ukrainian Independence Day and last year I introduced Senate Joint Resolution 20 to this effect. The dream of an independence of the Ukrainian people was short lived because it was swept away by the power of Communist Russia. The Ukrainian people are 40 million strong and they still keep alive the hope that some day they may again be permitted self-determination. That hope exists in their songs, in their literature, in their cultural heritage, and most of all in the spirit of resistance against oppression. I know that they will want to see freedom with peace and equal justice and opportunity for all. We can help to keep that spirit of freedom alive in the hope, which I support, that these efforts will not have been in vain and that the dream of freedom will soon be realized by the justice so much encouraged by the free world.

Mr. LAUSCHE. Mr. President, Friday, January 22, marks the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukrainia. As we remember and commemorate this event, we remain mindful of the fact that once again, Ukrainia is a captive nation, enslaved by the armies of the imperialistic leaders of the Kremlin.

The conscience of the free world cannot forget the 42 million Ukrainians whose love of liberty and freedom forms the basis of their national character. As the largest captive non-Russian nation behind the Iron Curtain, its struggle for freedom and national sovereignty is most important in the court of world opinion.

Today, we hear much of the "spirit of Camp David" and the alleged lessening of the tensions and strains between the free West and the Red Slave Empire of communism.

Yet, I would cite three instances of the Kremlin's cruelty and baseness to our Ukrainian friends during this so-called period of good will.

On October 15, 1959, Khrushchev's agents assassinated in Munich the Ukrainian nationalist leader, Stephan Bandera. His death by cyanide poisoning was attributed by the West German police and all authoritative sources to Moscow agents. His death by poisoning fits the pattern of crime established by the Russian Communists in the murders of Simon Petlurs and Eugene Konovalets in the thirties and twenties respectively. The latter two were also Ukrainian nationalist leaders who were murdered in similar circumstances in Western Europe.

Second, trials of Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists—Bandera's organization—members are being scheduled in western Ukrainia. This represents only a continuation of similar trials that have taken place in 1959. In March 1959, an open political trial in the Volyn oblast of Ukrainia resulted in the execution of five Organization of Ukrainian Nationalists members; in July, an additional five were executed after a similar trial in Stanislaviv, Ukrainia; in September, 30 Ukrainian insurgents were condemned to death after a mass trial.

Third, on December 3, 1959, Radio Lviv, monitored here, announced a "planned resettlement of Lviv region families" to the Crimea and Kazakhstan in central Asia. This trick of "voluntary resettlement" was devised and first used by Khrushchev in 1954 as a weapon against the non-Russian peoples opposing Moscow domination.

These three examples of the Kremlin's suppression of liberty and freedom in the Ukraine are proof that beyond its protestations of peace and good will, the Kremlin unrelentingly continues its rule of force and oppression against the true lovers of freedom and democracy.

The present role of Ukrainians destroys the Soviet fiction of a "united Soviet people," "integrated Soviet military might." Actually, the Soviet Union stands revealed before the moral conscience of the world as an imperialistic empire of captive nations whose citizens are the unwilling slaves of the Soviet. More than 45 percent of its military forces are made up of captive non-Russians; and they constitute a mighty citadel in behalf of the free thoughts and the free spirit of the peoples of the world.

It is my hope and belief that, like the Roman Empire and its mercenary legions, the Soviet Imperialist Empire carries within itself, through the use of the captive nations' natural resources and through the enforced military draft of the citizens of captive nations, the seeds of its inevitable decay and the resurgence of nationalist patriotism in the Ukraine and in other captive peoples.

Today we salute the patriots of Ukrainia, and we join with them in fervent prayers for their return as a free people to the council of nations.

Mr. President, water cannot naturally be made to flow uphill.

Wherever there is fire, by nature there will be smoke.

Wherever there is an action, there will be a reaction.

Whenever a government taxes the people too heavily, they will not pay the taxes.

Whenever a government imposes criminal penalties which are too severe, the juries will not convict.

There will be a reaction to the oppression, the tyranny, and the cruelty of the Soviets, and that reaction will come when dignified and free peoples, including those of the Ukraine, rise and protest, in ridding themselves of the enslavement to which they have been subjected.

Mr. KEATING obtained the floor.

Mr. HRUSKA. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to my able friend.

Mr. HRUSKA. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. President, only once in the past 300 years has the Ukraine been able to attain its long-sought goal of freedom and independence. That one occasion was January 22, 1918, when its independence was courageously declared and proclaimed. For the first time since the middle of the 17th century, this nation of some 40 million people had set out to achieve its own destiny. The cherished dreams seemed within reach. It had its own language, traditions, and history. It had its own culture and ideals. It had boundless love for homeland, a fierce desire for political independence, and a proven readiness to sacrifice all for attainment of national goals.

But the promise of January 22, 1918, did not last long; within 2 years the Communist Russians treacherously and ruthlessly suppressed the freedoms of Ukrainia, and forcibly made it a part of the U.S.S.R.

Today—42 years later—the Ukrainians are still under Communist bondage and oppression. Yet today there stubbornly persist among these unfortunate people the love of liberty and the quest for political independence which have been theirs for centuries.

On the anniversary of their declaration of independence, we honor Ukrainian patriotism. That undying national spirit continues to resist the merciless and unrelenting Communist efforts to eradicate the Ukrainian heritage of culture and human aspirations. Their plight is shared by a number of other peoples whose lands are adjacent to the Soviet Union.

In the past year a momentous event for the cause of their national freedoms took place. The U.S. Congress, in expressing the feelings of all Americans, vigorously adopted the Captive Nations Week resolution. It struck a heavy blow at Moscow propaganda. This was clearly proved by the protests and the troubled concern expressed by Premier Khrushchev.

The resolution exposed as fiction the concept—which Khrushchev and other Soviet leaders strive to have the free world accept—and the false notion of monolithic power inherent in the U.S.S.R. Constantly they spoke of a "Soviet nation," "the Soviet people," or "the integrated Soviet military might," in an effort to win acceptance of this illusion.

The fact remains that the U.S.S.R. is a basic empire of captive nations and suppressed peoples. Talk to the contrary denies the truth.

Moscow fears the destruction of this fiction. That is the reason for its vehement protests over adoption of the Captive Nations Week resolution. Official recognition by the United States of the existence of the majority of the captive nations in the U.S.S.R. is a moral blow to the myth of monolithic Soviet power.

It is vital to the defense of the free world that we focus attention on the place and the plight of the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. When we are mindful of the captive non-Russians who compose so large a proportion of the Soviet armed forces, as well as the Soviet economic productivity and social structure, we are better apprised of Soviet power and its limitations.

The constant pressure for freedom by over 40 million Ukrainians, the largest captive non-Russian nation both in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain, is a realistic deterrent to further Soviet aggression. It also promotes a highly vital part of declared U.S. foreign policy—namely, emancipation of satellite nations, to be achieved, not by the use of force from without, but primarily by the appeal of freedom to the minds of men everywhere.

It is only right and just that one of our foreign policy goals should be the peaceful but unremitting support of all people who seek to regain the freedom deprived them by communism. We are not, and cannot, be reconciled to the captivity of millions by Communist masters; nor do we regard such captivity as a permanent condition.

Communist imperialism divides the house of humanity. In the words of the man who was elected President of the United States 100 years ago, and who later became known as the Great Emancipator, "A House divided against itself cannot endure, permanently half slave and half free."

President Eisenhower has expressed the same conviction:

> There can be no true peace which involves acceptance of a status quo in which we find injustice to many nations, repression of human beings, on a gigantic scale.

To repeat:

Moral responsibility for the human rights and liberties of the captive millions within the Iron Curtain is basic American foreign policy.

The foundation of this policy is the appeal of freedom to the minds of men everywhere.

For the achievement of emancipation, our weapons are, not military in character, but ideological, psychological, political, economic, and diplomatic. However, if these nonmilitary forces are to be fully effective, our military power must be sufficient to neutralize the threat of Communist arms.

Nonetheless, our ultimate weapon remains the inherent desire of all men for freedom.

Our people and other free nations must be alert to any cracks in the empire the Communist are trying to build. We must encourage and foster any weakening of the bonds that tie the satellites to Moscow.

Eventually the spirit of freedom must overpower the force of tyranny in the Soviet Union and China. Only in this way can the peoples of the world be assured of a just and lasting peace. The route is still uncharted. A transition, which perhaps may occur over a long period of time, will eliminate the despised and dangerous features of the Communist regime and its ruthless and total domination of nations and of the individual.

The United States and its fellow nations of the free world should neglect no opportunity to bring about this transition.

The United States is the leader of the nations dedicated to freedom, it must not decline to exert that leadership.

It is in the spirit of this policy and approach that we pay tribute and honor to the valiant Ukrainians, on the occasion of the 42d anniversary of their declaration of independence.

At the same time, we can gratefully note and commend similar stands by other Slavic peoples outside of Russia, among whom are the Poles, the Lithuanians, the Latvians, the Estonians, the Czechs, the Slovaks, the Serbs, the Croats, the Slovenians, and the Byelorussians.

Nor should we overlook the non-Slavic nations which, although enslaved, have been fighting so courageously for their liberty.

May the time soon come when the natural yearning for freedom, still felt so thoroughly by these oppressed peoples, will be richly fulfilled.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator from New York for yielding to me.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I have been very happy to yield, particularly for the eloquent remarks the distinguished Senator from Nebraska has delivered.

It is my expectation to speak later in the day on the same subject. In the meantime, I commend the able Senator from Nebraska for his very forceful statement on it.

Mr. HRUSKA. I thank the Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, during the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HRUSKA] I said

I would have a few words to say today in connection with the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine.

It is altogether fitting that we mark this date in our minds and in our records. It remains a symbol of the victory of the spirit of free men, beaten down and chained by oppression, yet with the fire of freedom still alive and burning in their hearts. Some 40 million of these silent heroes, enslaved by their Communist overlords, still look prayerfully, hopefully to the day of their ultimate deliverance from this human bondage to which they have been subjected.

These are a people who have never seen the Soviet smile that has recently been abroad in the world. The dark face of Soviet tyranny is the only visage they know, and it has been etched into their hearts by time and suffering. These are a voiceless people, locked in the dungeon of Communist inhumanity, but their very silence has an eloquence that we, their brothers, hear and understand.

We should record not only the undying pledge of our concern and of our support, but also our heartfelt sympathy for our millions of Ukrainian friends who must live this enforced exile from the freedom they love. And let us rededicate ourselves, on this historic day, to the struggle that free men must unceasingly wage, so long as freedom is denied to any of their brothers.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I should like to join my good friend from New York in the splendid statement relating to the Ukrainian people, the loss of their freedom, the oppression under which they live in the totalitarian society, and our rededication as an American people and a nation, to the freedom and independence of peoples who long for it and whose great history justifies their claim to it.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator.

THE STEEL STRIKE SETTLEMENT

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. President, during recent weeks there has been much discussion of the benefits which the steelworkers received in their settlement with the steel industry as a result of collective bargaining procedures. There has been a great deal of misconception in many places about this and about the inflationary effects of the settlements, and also with respect to a possible increase in the price of steel, and the great benefits that labor received.

One of our outstanding financial writers and market research specialists of our Nation is Miss Sylvia Porter. She writes a syndicated column for many papers in the country. Yesterday's column by her, published in the Washington Post, is entitled "What Steel Workers Really Got." If I may, Mr. President, I shall read one or two paragraphs of her comments:

(1) The steelworkers did not get a 41-cent wage-benefit package as has been so widely reported, and they didn't get the 39-cent package that has been repeatedly discussed either. They got a 32.8-cent package in wages and benefits spread over 30 months.

(2) The major steel companies did not give away as much as they have been suggesting. The basis for price increases is not nearly as clear as some of the steel industrialists have been claiming.

I do not usually request that columns of this kind be printed in the body of the RECORD, but Miss Porter's article is so important an analysis of the settlement of the strike in the steel industry over wage disputes that I ask unanimous consent that it be made a part of these remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHAT STEELWORKERS REALLY GOT

(By Sylvia Porter)

The delicate stability of the economy is being threatened by the misconception and mounting befuddlement concerning what the steelworkers gained in their new contract.

Because of exaggerated notions about the steelworkers' victory, other unions negotiating contracts in coming months may make dangerously exaggerated demands. Because of the spreading "Here goes the price spiral again" psychology, the steel companies may impose price increases that are just now warranted by the costs of the settlement.

VITAL FACTS OUTLINED

Confusion compounded by ignorance can hurt us badly now. It's time some vital facts were put into simple words. Specifically:

1. The steelworkers did not get a 41-cent wage-benefit package as has been so widely reported, and they didn't get the 39-cent package that has been repeatedly discussed either. They got a 32.8-cent package in wages and benefits spread over 30 months.

2. The major steel companies did not give away as much as they have been suggesting. The basis for price increases is not nearly as clear as some of the steel industrialists have been claiming.

3. It is entirely conceivable that rising efficiency of operations in the steel plants between now and 1962 will offset increased labor costs in this period. Signs of this are emerging.

4. When increases in hourly earnings under the major steel company contracts are compared with increases in hourly earnings recently won by other workers, the big steel settlement seems the least "inflationary." The percentage increases in hourly wages are: in steel, 3.75 percent; in the Kaiser settlement, 3.82 percent; in the can industry, 4.5 percent; in the aluminum industry, 5 percent.

5. The steelworkers are getting a wage increase averaging 8.2 cents an hour beginning December 1, 1960—and no cash wage raise before then—another wage raise averaging 7.6 cents an hour on October 1, 1961. These increases are right within the pattern of 1959. The most common wage increases won in negotiations last year were in the 7–9-cent range.

6. The steelworkers' contract says they may get as much as 6 cents in cost-of-living adjustments in the 30-month period. The companies themselves figure the increase is more likely to be six-tenths of a cent than 6 cents. That's because the companies can deduct increases in their insurance costs from cost-of-living increases to which the workers might be entitled—and the companies definitely expect their medical, hospital, and other insurance costs to go up in the period.

7. The steel companies are getting a free ride of a little more than 2 months because the contract isn't retroactive. The can contract was retroactive for 2 and the aluminum contract for 4 months.

BICKERING RECALLED

Much of the befuddlement about the steel contract may be traced to the bickering that began at the very start of negotiations on how costs should be figured. The company wanted to count in every item of expense. The union wanted to figure costs only on the basis of the wage and benefit increases to the employees.

At the end, the union agreed to bargain in the companies' terms of total employment costs—which included such unseen expenses as extra bookkeeping, changes in social-security payments, payroll taxes, etc.

But the key point is that no other major contract is reported in these terms of total employment costs. When the extras not reported in other contracts are eliminated and the contracts are compared on the basis of increases in wages, insurance, pensions, holiday work pay, and the like, here is how the Labor Department estimates the gains:

For the steelworkers, 32.8 cents for 30 months; for the can employees, 34.2 cents for 36 months; for the aluminum workers, 35.08 cents for 30 months; for the Kaiser employees, 20.4 cents for 20 months.

GREAT ISSUES OF 1960

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, one of the Nation's leading newspapers, the New York Herald Tribune, recently published an outstanding series of editorials on problems facing this Congress. These pieces dealt with defense, space, agriculture, education, national emergency labor disputes, and foreign aid. While there may be other important issues before the Congress, these certainly warrant the high rank accorded to them by the Herald Tribune.

No pat solutions are suggested for any of these problems. The analysis of the factors involved, however, is of the highest caliber. There is room for honest disagreement with some of the views expressed in these editorials, but one cannot help being impressed by the thoughtfulness and care with which these views are expressed.

Mr. President, I know that many Senators will be interested in these editorials, and I ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 5, 1960]

THE GREAT ISSUES OF 1960—DEFENSE IS THE BIGGEST QUESTION MARK

The biggest question mark in the budget, the one which causes the gravest concern to administration, Congress, and the general public alike, is defense. This dubious status results from three basic facts:

1. The Defense Establishment is critical to the very life of the Nation. It is an essential tool of diplomacy, a safeguard to vital American interests in the world and if too many wrong assumptions are made in appropriating and spending for defense, it could quite literally mean the obliteration of the American people.

2. No matter how economical the approach, defense costs are high. The $40 billions—give or take a few—allotted to defense by the United States in recent years represents 9 percent of the gross national product; it is more than half of a total Federal budget of less than $80 billions.

3. The baffling aspect of the defense budget stems from the impossibility of providing against every military contingency. Some compromise must be made. And it is extremely difficult to get two authorities who would agree on the exact ingredients of such a compromise. Moreover, the development of new weapons, the changing pattern of strategy by this country's potential opponents, and shifts in the diplomatic picture can alter, radically, the bases of any program of military spending.

American fundamental strategy is based on the deterrent power of nuclear weapons. That is to say, the United States is assumed to have a capability for delivering a nuclear attack on such a scale that any aggressor would not risk an attack.

So far as the weapons themselves are concerned, there has been little worry over the quantity or quality available to the United States. The problem lies in the delivery of them to their targets and the protection of this country and its allies against nuclear blows leveled by the enemy.

In the brief span of two generations there has been a major revolution in the means of propelling explosives, a revolution which parallels the innovation of atomic and hydrogen weapons themselves. The jet aircraft had barely superseded propeller-driven types for air strikes when it was itself overtaken by the ballistic missile of great range and speed. With this came the atomic submarine, capable of launching missiles.

To keep abreast of such drastic changes in the implements and methods of war adds tremendously to the cost of the Military Establishment. In the 18th century, nations could put by stocks of flintlock rifles and place wooden warships out of commission, confident that they would not be outmoded for generations. When the Soviet Union, in 1954, displayed their new big bombers and the United States launched a crash program to match them, the long-range missile outmoded the program, if not the bombers, within a couple of years.

Ideally, the United States should have missile families in being and in development equal to the best and the most that the Soviet Union could launch. It should have a strategic reserve of jet bombers and fighters, both to supplement the missiles and to supplant them, if wartime performance does not match peacetime experimentation. It should have air-raid shelters, trained civilian defense cadres, warning systems, interceptor devices. The Navy should be able to keep the sealanes open for surface transport, to track down missile-bearing Soviet submarines, to launch attacks from its own carriers and submarines and, with Marines and surface vessels, have the capability of delivering triphibious attacks. The Army should be able to sweep up after a nuclear war, have enough strength and mobility for brushfire wars and at least be ready to expand sufficiently to fight a major war with conventional weapons if, for any reason, nuclear weapons were not employed.

This is the ideal, in the sense that it would provide against nearly all the foreseeable contingencies of modern war. The total would be impossible to achieve or sustain without a staggering dislocation of the economy. In each service there are experts prepared, passionately and with great plausibility, to argue for some special phase of such an overall program. An interesting case, for example, can even be made out for the revival of horsed cavalry. But somehow these claims have to be adjusted; a formula has to be reached, for obtaining the maximum security within practicable budgetary bounds.

This newspaper does not pretend to have such a formula. It is disturbed, as most Americans are disturbed, by the evidences of Soviet superiority in big missiles. But to state the precise portion of the budget which should be allotted to missile development and production requires far more detailed information, both as to American defenses and the Soviet threat, than is available to the public.

What we would insist upon is that the defense of America and the free world is the most important single task of Government. It certainly has not yet been reduced in significance by any diplomatic event; disarmament talk is not yet disarmament fact.

The national economy is sturdy enough to stand a greater strain than is now placed upon it—if that additional burden should be necessary. President Eisenhower has the heavy responsibility of determining, in the last analysis, what our defense demands. He need have no fear, however, that the American people will not bear their share of the responsibility if they are called upon to make greater sacrifices for their own security.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 6, 1960]

SPACE: A RACE WE MUST WIN

Suppose the Soviets landed an expedition on the moon, then declared that the arrival there of any other expedition would be regarded by the missile-armed Soviet Government as an "unfriendly act"—what would we do?

The new Congress should be asking itself this sort of question as it reviews the scope, organization, and priority of the Nation's space program.

Present indications are that unless we quickly and markedly accelerate our own efforts, the Soviets will be first on the moon—and also, despite our dramatic Mercury astronaut program, that the first man in orbit is quite likely to be Russian.

Whether we like it or not, we are in a race—a race we cannot afford to lose.

Conventional military minds may argue that we have our ICBM; that the much greater power represented by, say, the 1.5-million-pound-thrust Saturn project has no immediate military application, and that therefore its development is not of crucial importance in terms of national survival.

But the potential military significance of reconnaissance satellites, space platforms, even moon bases, is only beginning to be explored. Power of the Saturn magnitude, and greater, is needed to hurl aloft the quantity of hardware needed for real space exploration. And operating as it does on the frontiers of knowledge, concerned with the massing and control of vast energies, the venture into space holds the possibility of discoveries the significance of which we can only guess at—and even our guesses will probably fall short of reality.

The space lag could hold a far greater threat to national survival than even the missile lag. We at least have the comfort of alternate deterrents, such as SAC, to set off against Soviet missile power. But against the still unknown threat from future Soviet firsts in space we might have no defense, and not even a good counteroffense.

More than the direct military significance of space, however, is involved in our race to get there.

We live in an age in which diplomacy and propaganda, military, scientific and economic strength all are bound up inextricably together, and in which an anxious world is looking both to us and to the Soviets for leadership.

At the heart of the Soviet Union's drive toward supremacy is its effort to establish an image of the Soviet system as the wave of the future. Spectacular triumphs in space have played a key role—and a highly effective one—in this effort.

If anyone doubts the effect of such triumphs, let him reflect on how the popular image of the Soviet Union has changed in this country since Sputnik I shot aloft, shattering our ill-founded complacency, forcing us at last to recognize the dynamics of Soviet growth.

Our national Space Agency this year has a budget equal to only one-tenth of 1 percent of the gross national product, while vital space programs have been deliberately delayed for lack of funds. The U.S. space effort is still hamstrung by inadequate financing, by divided authority, by lack of a clear affirmation of national purpose.

From a late start, we have made impressive gains which should not be minimized. But they have still not been enough. We are second, and not even second among equals; we still are getting there—into space—lastest with the leastest.

We can't win unless we start running.

The free world has a right to demand more vigorous leadership than it has gotten from the United States in the competitive conquest of man's ultimate frontier.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 7, 1960]

AGRICULTURE, THE ALBATROSS

Of all the great problems facing Congress and the Nation in 1960, none is so unyielding or misunderstood as agriculture. Money can be considered, crudely, the answer to many of our ills—in education, money to build new schools; in defense, money to create new weapons. But money has proved no more than an eager futility in our public policy toward the farms.

Over the past few years, several billion dollars have been spent annually to raise the farmer's income in the form of price supports and crop and acreage controls. Yet, in the midst of enormous prosperity, the farmer's income has been declining.

In 1960, the Department of Agriculture estimates that it will drop to the lowest level in 18 years. The byproduct of this appalling paradox is almost $9 billion worth of surplus food we can neither sell nor give away, and which towers over the marketplace like a mountainside of snow, ready to engulf it. Worst of all, the present system holds no hope of a way out.

Price supports and income supports (acreage controls, for example) were supposed to help the poor or marginal farmers. Their effect is the opposite. They were supposed to provide security for the farmer in general. Instead, they have pushed him into ever more precarious positions. They have tended to wreck the relationship between agriculture and the rest of the economy. And they have fostered a pitiful waste of resources in terms of land and people.

The rest of us have not benefited either. We pay twice over for our food. We spend half a billion dollars a year just to store the surplus or to dump it abroad, an act which arouses the hostility of friendly nations. We see Congress entangled in the delusions of farm politics. Nor do we get any return for our money in lower retail prices.

The imperative in this situation is to bring farm produce back into a reasonable relationship with its consumers. For this, two things are necessary. The first is to reduce agricultural production to the point at which the farmer can earn a living comparable to the rest of the people. The second is to let agricultural prices reach a level at which the entire output can be sold in the normal way. To retire land, in other words, and to remove price supports.

As to crop reduction, the only solution is the retirement of whole farms—and whole families—from agricultural activity. Land rental would be much cheaper than surplus buying, and its owners could be helped to find other and much more profitable kinds of employment which the economy offers. In this respect, acreage control does no good, for the rest of a farm's land is then made to yield a compensatory increase.

The removal of price supports would keep pace with the reduction of crops. Some supports would be kept available for use in cases where it was clearly in the national interest to promote certain produce, or as insurance against convulsions of weather.

But the practice of letting supports (particularly when based on the absurd parity formula now in use) replace the free market in the setting of prices should be totally done away with. In all this, definite periods of time could be set up; an end would be always in sight.

There are some possibilities in farm policy which Congress ought to consider. Even if it is 1960, and because it is 1960, the time has come for an admission of failure and a resolve to begin again. The obligation to do so falls on Congress, for it is Congress, in response to mistaken convictions about what is good for the farmers, which bears the chief responsibility for the past.

We—and that means the farmers, too—shall be watching and waiting to see what effort is made to remove the albatross of our agricultural policy from the national neck.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 9, 1960]

THE SCHOOLS WE ARE NOT BUILDING

There are few questions on which political leaders of every hue and stripe are so articulately in agreement as the need for more schools.

The population wave of World War II has risen to spill uncalculated thousands of children into our educational system. Hardly a town or city in the country has not been pinched. The classroom shortage is estimated at 140,000, and the crest of the postwar generation has not yet passed.

The remedy, most people agree, is for the Federal Government to suplement the funds of States and municipalities, specifically in regard to school construction, since this represents the least opportunity for Federal interference in the educational process. But after a number of years, and a parade of Federal-aid bills, nothing has yet been done by Congress.

This is largely due to deep disagreement on the method of financing such aid. The administration last year proposed a measure to finance the servicing of bonds issued by communities which wanted to build new schools, provided Federal funds were matched by the States.

The servicing would be stretched over 20 to 30 years. A balanced budget is clearly the object behind this bill, and it has been fiercely criticized by various civic groups as inadequate. It would, however, stimulate the construction of 75,000 classrooms in the next few years.

At the other end of the scale is the Murray-Metcalf bill, which was reported last summer by the House Committee on Education and Labor. This bill would make an outright grant of $4.4 billion to the States for either teachers' salaries or school construction or both. No matching funds would be required.

In between there are a number of compromise measures, combining, in various proportions, outright grants, matching requirements and installment financing through debt service. They are slumbering in congressional committees.

A final attempt at compromise, drafted before Congress reconvened this week, would have kept the administration's two basic conditions, long-range payment and cost sharing with the States, but would have provided for grants over 2 years to particularly needy schools. However, this bill was again termed inadequate by the proponents of immediate and general school aid.

There is something else to the fate of school aid in Congress besides disagreement over financing. This is the profound, although usually hidden, conviction among a number of Representatives and Senators that the Federal Government must never be allowed any control over, or voice in, public education.

Even in the acceptance of funds from Washington for the erection of buildings, these people see a dangerous first step toward Federal dictation of educational policy. Socialism, they tell each other. Bureaucratic intervention. It has even been suggested by some of the supporters of this view that the Federal Government is so burdened by debt that it is better to let the States find the extra money for themselves.

Certainly, local control of education has been a jealously guarded tradition in the United States. Would help in building schools threaten it? Hardly. Experience has shown that when the Federal Government has had responsibility for education, as in defense projects or military bases, there has been no shade of pressure whatsoever.

But even more important, there is no possibility that the money for the vast effort in education which is required can come from anywhere else. The States cannot find it. The municipalities even less.

There must, therefore, be some sort of school-aid bill at this session of Congress. We would prefer a carefully worked out one which did the least damage to the budget to massive grants blindly given out. But the Nation should think first of all of the children who have waited and are still waiting. How much waiting is there yet to come?

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 10, 1960]

WHAT ABOUT THE NEXT STEEL STRIKE?

As soon as the steel settlement was reached last week, there was an immediate tendency to forget that the country had just endured one of the costliest and most damaging strikes in its history.

The black clouds had been lifted from the immediate horizon, and the sky of 1960 opened brightly ahead, dancing with political and economic hope.

In spite of so many grim months when our basic industry was paralyzed, our foreign markets diminished and our whole position of strength affected; in spite of the jeremiads and oratorical gloom; in spite of the eventually inflationary nature of the settlement itself, there seems to be no serious effort envisaged to make sure that such a strike and such a crisis will not be repeated.

The one thing this strike proved, everyone said until last Tuesday, was that we could never afford to have it happen again. Yet how can we prevent it?

There is obviously no great enthusiasm in Congress for legislation which would set forth precise conditions governing cases like this one, whether in terms of compulsory arbitration or amendment of the Taft-Hartley law or limiting the monopoly powers of big labor. Secretary of Labor Mitchell says that a presidential year prevents the proper atmosphere of calm in which such legislation could be attempted. Even the President's state of the Union message, while underlining the problem, offers no forceful remedy.

But the public, which watched the national economy almost fall to its knees, will have to live with the effects of the steel strike and the effects of its settlement.

Vice President NIXON surely obtained as good and noninflationary a compromise as was possible. But even so, it will add $1 billion to the costs of the steel companies over the next 2½ years, and even if steel prices do not rise immediately, they are certain to rise in 6 months or so.

Aside from inflation, the settlement will damage the position of our steel industry and the security of the steelworkers' jobs by pricing our goods even further out of foreign markets and by inviting large-scale importation of cheaper foreign steel. (Right now, foreign steel can be sold in Cleveland for $5 less a ton than steel produced in a Cleveland mill.)

Surely the fear and anxiety which the strike produced across the country created an unparalleled opportunity for Congress to enact measures which would go at least part of the way toward controlling recklessness in basic-industry free bargaining. If the strike had continued after the session reconvened, there would certainly have been some action, however temporary or expedient. But there seems to be little inclination to worry about it until the time for new contract negotiations rolls round.

This is disappointing. What the steel settlement proved, in effect, was that we had no ready recourse to stop a major seizure of economic paralysis. It also proved that the Government had no power definitely to arrest the wage-price spiral.

There should be such recourse and there should be such power if we are to continue to play our role of world leadership successfully.

[From the New York Herald Tribune, Jan. 12, 1960]

FOREIGN AID: CATALYST FOR DEVELOPMENT

Traditionally foreign aid has a rough time of it in Congress, and the pressures of an election year will make its going no easier in 1960.

But Congress, so attentive to the pleaders for pork barrel projects, farm subsidies, and veterans' benefits, should not underestimate that body of opinion which looks first to the way in which the United States meets the responsibilities of world leadership. To this growing group of voters, the way in which foreign aid bills fare will stand as a crucial test.

The focus of our foreign aid has shifted drastically since the early days of the Marshall plan. No longer is it aimed at lifting industrialized but battered allies (and former enemies) back to their economic feet. This has been achieved, with striking success.

The task today is to bring the economic and social benefits of the 20th century to millions just emerging into nationhood. Twenty new nations have been created in the last 15 years; more stand on the threshold of independence. These are determined, and rightly so, to move forward. And, impatient of the economic gulf that separates them from us, they are determined to move rapidly. It is up to us to see that they have a chance to do so in freedom.

The Soviets stand ready if we fail. The joint challenge to the underdeveloped and to ourselves is to leapfrog history before history leapfrogs us.

Last year Congress whacked $700 million out of the administration's $3.9 billion foreign aid request. This year the administration reportedly plans to ask somewhat more; Congress too should raise its sights.

Foreign aid, of course, buys not only the development in freedom of desperately needy nations. It also contributes heavily to the maintenance of that network of collective security on which the safety of the free world depends. We can't go it alone on defense, and some of our stanchest allies are unable to bear the military burden their strategic position places on them. In such cases it is up to us to share the costs.

Foreign aid is no longer solely a U.S. responsibility. Other industrialized nations, who themselves have returned to economic health with U.S. aid, have an equal responsibility. It is to their credit that they are coming to a general recognition of this, and that there seems a growing readiness to join in a vast cooperative effort to lift the underdeveloped nations to their feet.

But this does not mean the United States can slacken its own effort. The need is not diminishing, but increasing, and for years to come as the pace of development quickens the need can be expected to grow yet greater. So, however, will the resources of the free world that are available to meet that need. For economic development, like the sowing and reaping of a field and the sowing of others with the harvested grain, eventually provides for itself in increasing abundance.

The critical need in the underdeveloped countries is for long-term credits enabling them to lay the groundwork for a modern economy. And it is we, the industrialized nations of the free world, who have to stand ready to provide these—plus such technical help as may be necessary. This is a responsibility Congress, even in an election year, must meet, and generously.

NEW PROPOSAL TO PREVENT A DEADLOCK IN THE GENEVA NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, 2 days ago, I received a response to my letter of January 8 to the Secretary of State regarding the Geneva negotiations for a cessation of nuclear weapons tests.

In my letter to Mr. Herter I suggested that the United States attempt to break a possible impasse in the negotiations by proposing a test ban treaty to be carried out in stages. My proposal, which I described to the Senate in a statement on January 11, was that the nuclear powers reach an agreement to end tests of nuclear weapons in the atmosphere, underwater, and in outer space. With respect to tests underground, I suggested that if the scientific problems of detecting nuclear tests underground continue to remain an obstacle to agreement in that environment, the nuclear powers agree to conduct together a series of underground explosions for research purposes.

I point out that the position of the administration seems to be veering more in the direction of an agreement to be offered in stages. The Department's reply states:

> Should it become apparent over the next few weeks that the present Soviet position will not essentially change, then it seems clear that the only alternative, other than a complete break in the negotiations, would be to revert to some type of a phased treaty with more limited obligations in its initial stage.

Furthermore, the position of the Soviet Union itself appears to be shifting. In my speech to the Senate a few days ago, I alluded to specific changes in the Soviet position. In Premier Khrushchev's lengthy speech to the Supreme Soviet on January 14 he concedes "that sometimes modern technical equipment cannot provide absolute certainty that all underground explosions of nuclear weapons can be detected."

Mr. Khrushchev also acknowledges the possibility of the need for further research. He stated in his speech:

> The further development of science will provide the possibility of discovering and establishing all nuclear explosions with absolute accuracy.

I do not necessarily share Mr. Khrushchev's optimism, but I do believe this statement is a recognition by the Soviet leader of the need for further research in the science of detecting nuclear weapons and distinguishing them from earthquakes.

Mr. President, it is not necessary to labor further these points, but I thought that other Senators should have the benefit of seeing the Department's reply to my letter. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to have the full text of the reply published at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., January 19, 1960.

The Honorable FRANK CHURCH,
U.S. Senate.

DEAR SENATOR CHURCH: On behalf of the Secretary, I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of January 8, 1960, and the two-part proposal you offered as a means of avoiding a stalemate at the Geneva test ban negotiations.

Initially, I should like to assure you that the Department fully shares your conviction that everything possible must be done to prevent these negotiations from ending in a deadlock. As you have indicated, they are not only important to the control of worldwide levels of radioactivity, but if a properly controlled agreement can be reached, an important precedent for future disarmament negotiations will have been established.

As you know, the negotiations resumed on January 12. Our delegation has been instructed to continue to explore, at the present session, whether the Soviet position on basic technical issues remains as stated by Soviet scientists in the recent meetings of experts.

Should it become apparent over the next few weeks that the present Soviet position will not essentially change, then it seems clear that the only alternative, other than a complete break in the negotiations, would be to revert to some type of a phased treaty with more limited obligations in its initial stage.

In view of this, consideration is now being given by the Department to the form such a limited agreement might take. One possibility would, of course, be to set forth a treaty generally along the lines of the President's April 13, 1959, proposal to Chairman Khrushchev. This would entail a controlled ban on atmospheric tests while the technical problems associated with control of tests in other environments were being resolved. In addition, a similar ban on high altitude tests might also be incorporated if suitable control provisions can be agreed since, subsequent to April 13, experts from the three negotiating powers reached agreed technical conclusions on control requirements for this testing area.

You will recall that on the same date, Ambassador Wadsworth, in elaborating the U.S. position on a phased agreement, proposed that in connection with such an agreement, joint studies, and research, and negotiations, including such joint experiments as may be deemed useful, should begin immediately. Specifically, his statement was as follows:

"That joint studies, research, and negotiation, including such joint experiments as may be deemed useful, should begin immediately. These would assist us in moving toward the solution of the technical and procedural questions involved in detection and identification of underground tests and tests at very high altitudes. We should pursue these studies and negotiations expeditiously. If it appears that they cannot be readily solved, however, they need not delay the conclusion of the first agreement described above and the establishment of agreed portions of the system. Pending the establishment of the control commission it might prove desirable to assign these responsibilities to the preparatory commission. Upon establishment of the control commission it could, as the Soviet Union has suggested, have responsibility to continue working out unfinished matters relating to the detection system on a technical basis. The control system would be extended and these tests would be prohibited as agreement was reached among us, and the treaty should make appropriate provisions for the phasing of the various elements of the system in order to bring them into effect at the earliest practicable time."

This approach, as you will recognize, is very similar to the two-part proposal you have outlined. In this connection, you may be sure that the various comments you have offered in conjunction with your proposal will be carefully studied as this possible alternative, along with others, is further explored.

I should like to take this opportunity to thank you for the constructive suggestion you have brought to the Department's attention. Your interest in these extremely important negotiations is very much appreciated.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. MACOMBER, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary.

CRASH PROGRAM TO BEAT CANCER—ARTICLE BY HON. RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, OF OREGON

Mr. YOUNG of Ohio. Mr. President, for the January 1960 issue of Coronet magazine, the distinguished junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. NEUBERGER] has written a most comprehensive and compelling article about the urgent need for a crash program to cope with the terrible menace of cancer. Senator NEUBERGER, who himself has experienced this grim disease, submits to the American people a 5-point program to launch an all-out attack upon a malady which will strike 50 million Americans out of our present population of 173 million. Nobody reading this article can fail to realize the urgent necessity to place human lives first in any legislative consideration of proposals to amplify and extend cancer research—both through private channels and through the National Institutes of Health.

Perhaps the most dramatic feature of Senator NEUBERGER's article is his description of how cobalt radiation saved his own life from the menace of cancer. A great doctor wrote to Senator NEUBERGER that funds which Senator NEUBERGER himself had helped to vote for cancer research were a vital factor in developing the therapy which made possible his own recovery.

I know that all of my colleagues will want to read Senator NEUBERGER's thoughtful article, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Coronet magazine, January 1960]

LET'S BUILD A "CRASH PROGRAM" TO BEAT CANCER

(By Senator RICHARD L. NEUBERGER)

(When cancer suddenly struck this Senator, he realized gratefully that research, for which he'd voted funds, was saving his life and might save the lives of 45 million other Americans.)

What if we knew, without the slightest doubt, that a foreign foe intended to attack us with nuclear missiles or germ warfare? What if we also knew, with equal certainty, that some 30 million of us would perish in agony from this assault, while 15 million more would suffer great pain or be permanently maimed?

A menace of these ghastly proportions does imperil 45 million Americans today, although not in the form of hydrogen warheads or lethal gas. It often gives even less warning than these. The name of the menace is "cancer." From the cruel ravages of this disease, two out of every three American families in avery avenue and echelon of society are destined to suffer painfully.

The American Government would spare no effort or expense to repel any military attack that threatened 45 million of us. Our Federal Treasury would be emptied, if necessary, to pay for armaments and weapons. Our vast private wealth and resources would be thrown into the fray.

Yet, despite the terrible threat of cancer, we spend far less on research into its causes and possible cures than we do, for instance, to build half a dozen B–58 bombers. Our annual expenditure for doughnuts more than triples what we spend in search of an answer to the curse of cancer. Nor does our total outlay for lifesaving cancer research compare with what we spend on cigarettes or liquor or radio and television repairs or even chewing gum.

What is the reason for such glaring inequities?

I think I can answer that from my personal experience. It's because we all believe, down deep, that it will never be ourselves who will get cancer. It's always the other fellow. I know. I once had such feelings myself. I don't now, and for a good reason: I am a cancer victim.

I always had intellectual convictions that cancer was a dangerous enemy, and I've spent a good part of my senatorial career successfully fighting for more funds for Government cancer research. But now my feelings about cancer come from my own bitter, personal experience; and it wasn't all bitter, at that. I'm one of the lucky ones. My cancer was caught early—an accident, you might say—I'd gone to my doctor about something else entirely, and he found the growth I'd never noticed. There was no pain, no warning. My doctor's skill was responsible, of course, but it was just luck that I visited him. And it was luck that my cancer, which began in my testicle and had spread to a minor degree to the edges of my lungs, was one of the kind that responds to the new ways of treatment available.

One of my vivid nightmares is to recall the mixture of incredulity and fear which swept over me when our family doctor told me I had cancer. I just could not accept his terrifying words. This just could not be me.

And then, later, as I came out from under the anesthetic, following surgery, the doctors told me that they confidently expected me to recover. While I stared at them in doubt, they explained that my tumor had been diagnosed as a type sensitive to radiation. Further, the doctors added, cobalt and high-voltage X-ray therapy, developed in recent years, could destroy the tiny but potentially lethal metastases which, even then, lurked on the outer edge of each of my lungs.

I can tell you that the cancer victim is frequently the loneliness person in the world. He feels that nothing can help him. Friends, family, doctors, associates all seem without power to check the malignant growth that perils his life. He wishes, desperately and profoundly, for some miraculous cure which will bring a reprieve.

In the weeks and months of radiation therapy which followed, I lay beneath the X-ray cone for a few minutes every weekday and blessed the long line of men and women whose findings in medical research, over the decades, were helping to save my life. Several well-known doctors wrote me letters saying that funds, for which I had voted in the U.S. Senate, had paid for perfecting the very radiation equipment being used in my own treatment. And when such letters came, I could only think in terror of what the outcome might have been for me if such equipment had not been developed.

I recall one dramatic conversation I had with the radiologist treating me, which demonstrated my personal reliance on the results of medical research.

"The spread to the lungs of the type of tumor which you have can be destroyed permanently if an adequate number of roentgens (a measure of X-rays) can be conveyed to the lesions," the doctor had said. Then he added:

"With cobalt or high-voltage X-ray, we know we can deliver to your lungs—safely and tolerably—enough roentgens."

"What if you didn't have these things?" I inquired.

"With the early X-ray equipment we often failed," the doctor said, "because the skin and tissues of the patient were damaged too severely before the necessary dosage could be administered internally."

I wondered what my fate would have been if I had suffered from the same malignancy a few years earlier.

At the recent Senate hearings on appropriations for the National Cancer Institute, our Government-supported research center, Dr. I. S. Ravdin, of the University of Pennsylvania School of Medicine, told a gripping story which filled us all with hope. In the early 1920's, a noted doctor visited the William Pepper Laboratory of Clinical Medicine in Philadelphia and lunched with Dr. Alfred Stengel.

"How is your son Tom?" Dr. Stengel asked his friend.

"I wish young Tom were dead," his friend said, his voice heavy with sorrow. "He has diabetes. He is 13 and yet he isn't any bigger than a normal boy of 6. He can't possibly live and grow up."

Dr. Stengel replied, "Tom, you ought not to talk this way. Next month, next year or the year after, someone has got to come up with a solution for diabetes."

Within 24 hours of that prophetic conversation between the two physicians, the discovery of insulin that could be injected into human beings was announced. It brought life and hope to sufferers from diabetes all over the world. Young Tom was the second patient ever treated with insulin in the United States. Today he is married, has five children of his own and is himself a distinguished doctor. Yet what would have been his destiny if medical researchers had not been delving for years for an answer to diabetes?

My wife Maurine and I visited the Children's Cancer Research Foundation in Boston, where Dr. Sidney Farber and his associates have some 376 children under treatment for cancer, many of them victims of the dreaded cancer of the blood and bone marrow, leukemia. We saw the agonized stare of parents who cannot believe their beloved child suffers from this incurable disease. Yet, these poor little leukemia victims, who used to survive an average of only 3 or 5 months, now live almost 2 years. One boy was kept alive and vigorous for 8 years through chemical agents.

A major breakthrough has not been achieved in leukemia, but researchers are on the frontier of important advances. Dr. Farber believes that the annual screening of some 40,000 chemicals for the treatment of cancer offers the brightest prospect for a startling, new discovery. A universal blood or urine test for cancer is another goal.

But progress depends entirely upon findings in laboratories. Money is needed to train researchers, to build facilities, and furnish grants for their operation. Last year, the American Cancer Society spent over $13 million for cancer research. Much of the remainder of the society's $30 million of voluntary donations went for service to cancer patients, supported the nationwide program of education to acquaint Americans with the danger signals of cancer and to persuade them to have annual physical checkups.

Out of the $75 million budget of the National Cancer Institute, about $68 million went into some phase of research. About $4 million was spent in cancer research through the Damon Runyon Memorial Fund, the Sloan-Kettering Institute, and various pharmaceutical firms. Impressive gains have been made but the blank wall of cancer still stands.

How can we breach that wall?

Most scientists in the vital field of cancer research believe there is a direct relationship between the number of men and women engaged in their work and the time when a cure finally will be found. Listen to Dr. Howard A. Rusk, distinguished medical editor of the New York Times:

"When will the scientific breakthrough come to solve the riddle of cancer? No one knows. What we do know, however, is that the more scientists who are at work on the problem in laboratories all over the world, the greater are the odds for solution and the quicker that solution will come."

And Dr. Lowell T. Coggeshall of the University of Chicago, who retired about a year ago as president of the American Cancer Society, says: "Some people ask in good conscience, 'Isn't there a limit to the funds that could be spent fruitfully on cancer research?' Of course there is a limit, but we have not nearly reached it."

So why not a genuine crash program of cancer research? Why not place half a billion dollars—the cost of 25 B–58 bombers—at the disposal of the National Cancer Institute for grants in a realm where countless lives might be saved? Dr. Leonard Scheele, ex-Surgeon General of the U.S. Public Health Service, once told me that half a billion dollars could be used constructively for cancer research. He suggested that the sum be carried over from year to year until fully expended, thus permitting continuity in vital projects which now have only annual duration. "In addition," said Dr. Scheele, "a considerable portion of the amount should be dedicated to the training of new scientists in the health field—just as a major share of our military budget is for the training of fliers, navigators, and other fighting men."

Half a billion dollars may seem like a lot of money per se, but not when we relate it to the lives of 45 million American victims of cancer. It comes down to only slightly more than $10 per life—per irreplaceable human life.

When I speak of a crash program for cancer research, I have in mind the determined Federal action that took place in 1940 after Dr. Albert Einstein had sent his historic letter to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, with its warnings of Nazi experiments in nuclear fission. The all-out crash program to crack the atom followed immediately, with over $2 billion spent through the top-secret Manhattan project. Scientists later claimed that 50 years of research were compressed into 4 or 5 years as a result of this unstinted effort.

Why, then, are we capable of such a crash program when the menace is a foreign foe, but not when it is deadly cells running wild through our own bodies?

Yet even the increase in funds for the National Cancer Institute, from nearly $22 million (in 1955) to $110 million (for this year), has not been accomplished without the most persistent sort of congressional activity. The national administration has refused to recommend budget increases for cancer research despite the fact that illustrious supporters such as Senator Robert A. Taft, Senator Arthur H. Vandenberg, and Secretary of State John Foster Dulles all have succumbed to cancer within the last 7 years.

Furthermore, cancer recognizes neither border nor breed nor birth. It can strike down the millionaire on Park Avenue and the tribesman in his Congo hut. Our Government spends more than $3.4 billion a year in foreign aid to strengthen our alliances with other free nations. Yet imagine the worldwide thrill if some scientific breakthrough were to liberate mankind from the terrifying menace of cancer. This is why Senator LISTER HILL has promoted an Institute of International Health, to help place the necessary funds at the disposal of scientists anywhere on earth who can contribute to the control of cancer and other diseases. The sole test would be medical findings rather than national allegiances.

We look back now with pity on the recent era when pneumonia was almost always fatal, when children were struck down from diphtheria and scarlet fever, when infected throats in childhood often meant lethal Bright's disease in later years. What will be the emotions of the next epoch of mankind as it looks back upon our frequent helplessness in the face of cancer? Will it mourn that so many men, women, and children in our era perished needlessly because they lived a little too soon—before the "crash" effort which at last brought cancer to bay?

What ought to be done? I favor a five-point program:

1. The sum of $500 million for the National Cancer Institute, to be distributed in grants for cancer research to any medical school, clinic, hospital, pharmaceutical house, or private physician where a promising lead had been developed.

2. Increased support through private giving to such voluntary groups as the American Cancer Society and the Damon Runyon Memorial Fund.

3. Forgiveness of 50 percent of loans under the National Scholarship Act to any medical student or other scientist who will spend at least 5 years in medical research. This should be accompanied by grants to medical schools for the construction of research facilities.

4. The international pooling of medical discoveries through an Institute of International Health, as well as the calling of an International Medical Year in 1960 to parallel the recent International Geophysical Year. Surely the study of a killing disease is as important as the study of rocks, ice, and sea water.

5. Take our Red Cross hospital ships out of mothballs and send them overseas, staffed with American doctors and nurses and sanitary technicians, to help undeveloped nations under our foreign aid program to fight cancer and other diseases. In many less fortunate nations, infant mortality is shockingly high and blindness affects a large segment of the adult population, to some degree. These people would rather keep their babies or have reasonable vision than have their streets paved.

I may be unduly conscious of the urgency of such programs because the results of medical research have saved my life. When we were discussing in the Senate late last June the appropriations for the National Institutes of Health, I told my colleagues that I owed my very presence in the marble Chamber to findings sponsored by the National Cancer Institute. The Democratic majority leader, Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON, who suffered a massive coronary attack in 1955, declared that he could say the identical thing about discoveries made possible through the research grants program of the National Heart Institute. Because cancer and heart disease recognize no aisle between the political parties, our Republican colleague on the other side of the Chamber, Senator KENNETH KEATING, of New York, said to Senator JOHNSON and to me:

"If the appropriations for medical research have had any force in bringing about both of those results or either of them, they have surely proved their effectiveness. I shall certainly support this increased amount for medical research."

Will increased expenditures result in finding a cure for cancer? The American Cancer Society points out that earlier diagnosis and advances in treatment have increased the cancer cure rate from one out of every four cancer victims to one in three. To the cancer patient, like myself, such things are more than mere numbers. They are survival—the chance to breathe anew, to walk in the woods, to revel in the affection of family and friends, to see the glories of the sunrise and to drink in the wonders of the starlit night.

I'm happier to be alive than I've ever been. Having cancer has changed all my attitudes, all my values. When you're facing the terrible threat of this foul disease, you suddenly discover what's important. The petty discomforts and irritations that used to bother you disappear; and so do ordinary ambitions and attitudes. I don't think I'll ever cease being grateful to my wife for just being my wife; I know I'll never again consider a piece of legislation primarily on its politically partisan aspects.

As a cancer patient, I want to help others who have suffered or who may suffer this disease. I want to encourage them and their families as I was encouraged and supported by cancer progress. I want more: I want to see us lick this disease the way we've licked the infectious diseases. I sincerely believe the world would be more electrified by a breakthrough in cancer than it was by a rocket landing on the moon. As a U.S. Senator, I'm more convinced than ever that we should economize in any other sphere of government than funds for the research program of the National Cancer Institute—because economy at the expense of human life is the worst extravagance of all.

SCIENTIFIC TESTS ON THE HIGH SEAS

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at this time I may proceed for 3 minutes in addition to the regular allowance during the morning hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. YOUNG of Ohio in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, yesterday, at hearings before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, I listened with great respect and attention to an outstanding American lawyer who is an eminent authority on the law of the sea. I refer to Mr. Arthur H. Dean, who has just completed, on behalf of this country, and as a special representative of the administration, months of tedious international negotiations which led to the signing of four complex and valuable conventions and a protocol on the law of the sea.

Mr. President, these conventions, as well as numerous others to which this country has adhered at various times throughout its history, have two basic and traditional purposes. They represent attempts to get nations to enter into agreements which safeguard the maximum free usage of the seas to all nations; and, in the interest of all nations, they seek to insure responsible usage of the high seas by any single nation.

Mr. President, I listened to Mr. Dean with admiration and respect. His is a profound knowledge of the traditional policies of the United States with respect to the high seas and the problems which beset their free and responsible usage. That is why I am disturbed by some of his very revealing answers. In the conventions which Mr. Dean was so instrumental in negotiating, every effort is made to protect the right of all nations to use the high seas and the skies above them for commerce, fishing, and other useful purposes. Predatory tendencies by any nation in this connection are curbed, for they are recognized for what they are—namely, a threat to the interest of all in this single greatest common resource of mankind—the high seas. But, Mr. President, while these conventions deal with many dangers to this interest, they are silent on what is now already the greatest threat to this common resource, and is bound to become an even greater threat in the years ahead. That danger is represented by the kind of tests the Russians are at this very moment conducting in the Pacific, and which, I say in all frankness, we, ourselves, have conducted in the past, and are still conducting in both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

To make this point clear, Mr. President, let me read a brief exchange between Mr. Dean and myself, during the course of yesterday's hearings:

Mr. MANSFIELD. Have you ever given thought, Mr. Dean, to the very likely probability that within a very few years a considerable number of nations—not just Russia, the United States, and the United Kingdom—are going to want to use the oceans for the testing of various dangerous scientific devices?

Mr. DEAN. I think that is a most important question which I sincerely hope that this convention at Geneva is addressing itself to and I sincerely hope there will be an agreement on that matter because I consider it one of the most important, if not the most important, aspects of life that we face today.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you think, Mr. Dean, it is going to be a very free sea if a dozen or more nations are blocking off thousands of square miles of it at a time, and putting up "no trespassing" signs of one kind or another?

Mr. DEAN. No, it would not.

Senator MANSFIELD. Now, Mr. Dean, I do not question the value or importance of many of these tests on the high seas to science and to mankind. I doubt that you do, either. They will undoubtedly go on, and it is probably necessary that they go on.

But let me ask you this: Do you not see in the present almost complete national license to use the seas for dangerous, and sometimes destructive, tests, a possibility of a grave challenge to both of our basic concepts of the law of the sea—that is, to the concepts of freedom of the sea and responsible usage of the sea?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, I do, and that is why I sincerely hope that something along these lines will be done at this——

Senator MANSFIELD. At Geneva?

Mr. DEAN. At Geneva.

So far as I am aware, Mr. President, despite Mr. Dean's sincere hope, no impending conference in Geneva is going to deal with this problem in its full dimension. An impending meeting on further extension of the law of the sea is scheduled to treat only with the questions of the limit of territorial waters and certain fishing rights. And to the Geneva conference on nuclear testing has been referred only the question of banning nuclear tests on the high seas. That is not, as I have suggested, the full dimension of the problem, at all. What is involved here is the regulation of the use of the high seas by any nation—not necessarily the banning of its use—for scientific tests of all kinds which may infringe on the rights of other nations to their free use.

In the exchange at the hearing from which I have just read, one of the most eminent authorities in this entire complex matter of the law of the sea has recognized in unmistakable terms a problem that is a most grave threat to the equal rights of all nations and to world peace. Yet what is the administration's answer to this grave problem? The administration's answer is this: "Since we have used the seas unilaterally for testing, the Russians can do the same thing." Perhaps that is a correct answer under present international law; I have no doubt that it is. But I suggest, Mr. President, that it is no answer at all to the problem.

I repeat, Mr. President, it is not enough for us to say that because we test at will the Russians can test at will on the high seas, and for us then to let the matter drop. Throughout its history, our Nation has had a great stake in the concept of free and responsible usage of the seas, and has played a leading role in upholding it. The stake will grow greater in the future. Since that is the case, we owe it to ourselves, if not to all mankind, to act in a fashion which will preserve this concept against the newest and most dangerous threat to which it has ever been exposed—namely, the threat which is inherent in unrestrained, uninational usage of the high seas for scientific tests of one degree or another of danger or inconvenience to others. We have got to try to get written into international legal doctrine the terms under which any nation may use the high seas for this purpose. We have got to clarify, for example, how close to the shores of other nations these tests can be carried on. As the matter now stands, Mr. President, it is admissible under international law for the Russians to test missiles, not only as they are now doing—a thousand miles off Hawaii—but even within sight of San Francisco, Miami, Honolulu, or Boston. In truth, we might do the same off Vladivostok, insofar as international law is concerned.

Moreover, we have got to try to get written into accepted international legal doctrine some concept of how large an area of the seas may temporarily be reserved by any nation for the purpose of scientific tests. As of now, 1,000, 100,000 or 1 million square miles or more may be blocked off summarily by any nation. And as interpreted by this administration, international law would find this practice perfectly permissible. We also have got to get written into international legal doctrine some provision for compensation for damages which may result to persons, commerce, and so forth, of other nations as a result of the tests conducted by any nation.

The solution of the problem, as I see it, Mr. President, is not to ban scientific tests of a nuclear or any other nature on the high seas. Some of these tests may be of the utmost importance to mankind. The solution of the problem is to control and regulate such tests, with due regard for the rights of all.

Again, I say to this administration that the problem cannot be sloughed off by saying that if we can use the high seas for such tests, so can the Russians. The problem must be faced frankly and in its full dimension. Not only does unbridled usage of the high seas for testing pose a threat to the rights of all nations, it also contains, at worst, a serious potential of accidental conflict, and, at best, a serious potential of hostile provocation which does not serve the cause of peace.

In line with our traditions and with our long-range interests, I believe it is incumbent upon our Nation to take the initiative in dealing with this problem. The place to do so is in the United Nations or some agency thereof. The time to do so is now. The responsibility for doing so rests with this administration; and I hope it will not shirk it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in the RECORD, in connection with my remarks, the series of questions asked of Mr. Arthur Dean at yesterday's hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee, and his replies to the questions.

There being no objection, the excerpts from the hearing were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator MANSFIELD. Mr. Dean, I have been interested in listening to your testimony and I have read the four conventions and the protocol which are now up for ratification by the Senate.

In the convention on the territorial sea and contiguous zones, the preexisting situation prevails, in your opinion, and I quote, wherein you state:

"In our view"—the U.S. view—"the 3-mile limit is and will continue to be an established international law to which we adhere."

You hope for some changes at the next convention but that is your position at the present time?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator MANSFIELD. And in the convention on the high seas, which refers to navigation, fishing, submarine cables, pipelines, and the freedom to fly over the high seas, a proposal was made by the Soviet Union, I believe, backing nuclear tests on the high seas, and in this attempt it was defeated. And as a result, a separate resolution was passed referring nuclear tests on the high seas to the United Nations General Assembly for appropriate action and is transmitted for the information of the Senate.

It may be noted that the Soviets claim their scheduled missile tests in the Pacific will not involve nuclear energy.

That is out of your testimony, and, of course, what I said previously is in one of the conventions.

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir.

Senator MANSFIELD. Mr. Dean, do we have a national tradition of encouraging in international law a very broad concept of freedom of the high seas?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, we do, Senator.

Senator MANSFIELD. That is a very old tradition, is it not, and one which we have maintained with great vigor throughout our entire history?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, we have.

Senator MANSFIELD. In line with this tradition, we do not look kindly on nations arbitrarily extending their territorial waters beyond the present 3-mile limit; is that correct?

Mr. DEAN. That is so, Senator.

Senator MANSFIELD. We ourselves adhere as a general practice to the 3-mile limit in our own territorial waters?

Mr. DEAN. That is correct.

Senator MANSFIELD. Generally speaking, we uphold, do we not, the right of any nation to fish the high seas without arbitrary interference from another?

Mr. DEAN. That is correct, Senator.

Senator MANSFIELD. The same would apply as regards the right of a ship of any nation to navigate the seas for commerce, pleasure, or whatever?

Mr. DEAN. On the high seas; yes, sir.

Senator MANSFIELD. High seas.

And the same would apply to planes of any nation flying in the air above the sea, would it not?

Mr. DEAN. Above the high seas; yes, sir. And as I think you know, we have the Chicago convention for all the countries that are parties to that which permits us to traverse their territory.

Senator MANSFIELD. Yes; indeed.

Now, Mr. Dean, is it not a fact that in addition to the concept of free seas, which we have long held, there is a second tradition of later origin, perhaps, but nonetheless of great significance in international legal doctrine as espoused by the United States. I refer to the concept which complements that of the free use of the seas, the concept of the responsible use of the seas by all nations.

Is that not also a basic principle of the American approach to the law of the sea?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, it is.

Senator MANSFIELD. Within that concept, have we not become parties to various fisheries, navigational, piracy, and similar international conventions which, while they may curb the absolute freedom of any nation to the high seas, were designed to safeguard or regulate the usage of the seas and its resources so that the rights of the many nations are thereby protected?

Mr. DEAN. That is correct, Senator.

Senator MANSFIELD. Would you say that the four conventions which we are now considering safeguard and advance these two complementary concepts of American doctrine on the law of the sea? That is, free usage and responsible usage of the seas by the nations of the world.

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir; I think they are a great advance.

Senator MANSFIELD. Mr. Dean, is there anything in these conventions concerning the disposal of radioactive wastes in the high seas?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, there is, Senator.

Senator MANSFIELD. The answer is, yes?

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator MANSFIELD. Is there anything in these conventions on petroleum pollution?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, there is.

Senator MANSFIELD. These clauses, presumably, are in the treaty because arbitrary actions in this connection by one nation might damage the rights of others as regards fishing, for example, or navigation; is that not so?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, and also with respect to health.

Senator MANSFIELD. Yes.

Is there anything in these conventions about prohibiting the use of the high seas for the testing of nuclear or other dangerous scientific devices?

Mr. DEAN. No, there is not, Senator. The Soviet Union introduced a resolution which would have—which was twofold. It would have prevented the assembly of naval ships for maneuvers on the high seas, and they also wanted a resolution that it was the sense of the convention that there should not occurr any nuclear tests or explosions on the high seas.

They refused, in exploratory conferences, to include in their resolution any explosions on land, even though the radioactive waste material might fall on the sea.

It seemed to us that since there was going to be this convention convening at Geneva at which there were going to be experts and which was convened for that specific purpose, that the world would be somewhat misled if there were a convention saying that you could not conduct nuclear explosions on the high seas which might fall on land, but there was absolutely nothing in the convention about explosions on land where the radioactive waste might fall on the seas.

Senator MANSFIELD. But the question has been referred to the United Nations General Assembly?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, sir. We sponsored, we worked for a long time with the Indian delegation, and in the State Department bulletin of June 30, 1958—and I also think you have it before you—there was a resolution adopted by the conference with respect to nuclear tests on the high seas, and referred this matter, which expressed a serious and genuine apprehension on the part of many States that nuclear explosions constitute an infringement on the freedom of the seas and referred this matter to the General Assembly and asked that they investigate and report on it. And we also referred to them a resolution on the pollution of the high seas by radioactive materials, and we suggested that this whole matter should be taken up at this convention on disarmament and also on nuclear weapons that is being convened at Geneva.

Senator MANSFIELD. Now, Mr. Dean, you are aware that the Russians are blocking off a section of the Pacific, 27,000 square miles, in extent, although I have seen the figure 45,000 square miles used more recently, for use in connection with certain missile tests. We have done the same for even larger areas as regards nuclear tests, I think the figure is 400,000 square miles, in the region around Eniwetok, and we maintain active missile ranges in both the Atlantic and the Pacific.

The British, I believe, have also used sections of the Pacific around Christmas Island, estimated around 900 square miles, for nuclear or similar tests.

Is there anything in these conventions which relates to this sort of testing?

Mr. DEAN. No, there is not.

Senator MANSFIELD. The conventions are concerned with oil pollution and other wastes but not radioactivity?

Mr. DEAN. That is correct.

Senator MANSFIELD. As a layman in these matters, as I am, has it ever occurred to you that tests of nuclear devices and missiles must do very extensive damage to the fishery resources of the high seas?

Mr. DEAN. That is a very definite possibility, Senator, but it seemed to us that that subject ought to be considered in connection with this particular convention on nuclear testing or perhaps the ending of nuclear testing that was convening at Geneva, because they had a whole group of experts who had studied and prepared for that matter, and we did not have, none of the nations had that type of an expert at this convention at Geneva on this convention on the high seas, and as I said earlier, it also seemed to us we would only be dealing with one-half of the subject.

Senator MANSFIELD. I see.

Now, is it not a very serious interference with the freedom to navigate the seas and the air above them when one nation—ourselves or Russia or some other—blocks off many thousands of square miles of the ocean and advises all ships and planes to stay out of the area for a specified period of time?

Mr. DEAN. Well, I do not want to quibble with you, but I believe that the official position of our Government has been that we have not actually blocked people from going there, although we have warned them in there and I believe have actually taken in some respects, have actually arrested people on crews and have taken them into court, but I believe it is the official position of our Government that that is not interference with the freedom of the seas.

Senator MANSFIELD. Mr. Dean, under our present adherence to the 3-mile territorial waters limit, it is conceivable, is it not, that the Russians could test whatever scientific devices they wished, assuming they did no damage, 400, 40, or 4 miles, off San Francisco, Los Angeles, or Ocean City, Md., for that matter? Such tests would not violate present international law?

Mr. DEAN. I do not believe it would violate present international law, but as I think you know, President Eisenhower has been doing his level best to try to get the Soviets to agree with us on the ending of that kind of testing.

Senator MANSFIELD. He has indeed, and he deserves all the credit in the world for it.

Now, presumably, we could do something similar off the Russian Pacific coast?

Mr. DEAN. As a matter of international law, we could.

Senator MANSFIELD. While it might not be prohibited by international law, you would not recommend the practice of testing by the Russians immediately off the American littoral, or vice versa, would you?

Mr. DEAN. No, I would not.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Have you ever given thought, Mr. DEAN, to the very likely probability that within a very few years a considerable number of nations—not just Russia, the United States, and the United Kingdom—are going to want to use the oceans for the testing of various dangerous scientific devices?

Mr. DEAN. I think that is a most important question which I sincerely hope that this convention at Geneva is addressing itself to, and I sincerely hope there will be an agreement on that matter, because I consider it one of the most important, if not the most important, aspects of life that we face today.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you think, Mr. Dean, it is going to be a very free sea if a dozen or more nations are blocking off thousands of square miles of it at a time, and putting up no trespassing signs for tests of one kind of another?

Mr. DEAN. No, I would not.

Senator MANSFIELD. Now, Mr. Dean, I do not question the value or importance of many of these tests in the high seas to science and to mankind. I doubt that you do, either. They will undoubtedly go on, and it is probably necessary that they go on.

But let me ask you this: Do you not see at the present almost complete national license to use the seas for dangerous, and sometimes destructive tests, a possibility of a grave challenge to both of our basic concepts of the law of the sea—that is, to the concept of freedom of the sea and responsible usage of the sea?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, I do, and that is why I sincerely hope that something along these lines will be done at this——

Senator MANSFIELD. At Geneva?

Mr. DEAN. At Geneva.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you think it is any answer to this problem to say that because we have used the seas for testing, the Russians have any right to do the same?

Mr. DEAN. Well, I believe that is the official position of our Government as of the present time.

Senator MANSFIELD. That is the official position of the Government as enunciated by the President of the United States just a week ago today, last Wednesday.

Do you think that there is a need for an extension of the law of the sea, an additional international convention, perhaps the one you have mentioned in testimony this morning, which, while it would not prohibit scientific tests on the high seas, would establish the conditions under which they might take place and thereby protect the rights of other nations or their nationals which might be damaged by the tests?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, if it were correlated with tests on the land, as I have testified earlier.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you think the place to raise this question is in the United Nations or some agency thereof?

Mr. DEAN. I definitely think it should be raised in the United Nations, and I hope it can be raised at Geneva.

Senator MANSFIELD. Geneva, as well.

Do you think the question should be raised as a matter of urgency?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, I think it is a matter of great urgency.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you think that to raise this question and to take the initiative in trying to get an international answer to it would be in accord with our traditional concepts of the law of the sea?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, provided it is correlated with our efforts with respect to all over the world so we would not have it with respect to tests that might take place on the high seas, and no corresponding prohibitions with respect to tests that might take place on land.

Senator MANSFIELD. I see.

Do you think that the long-range interests of this Nation and others would be served by international agreement to regulate the usage of the high seas for scientific tests?

Mr. DEAN. Yes.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you know of any reasons why this administration should not take the matter up in the United Nations?

Mr. DEAN. I believe we are taking it up at this convention in Geneva. I think that is a part of this whole convention coming to Geneva on the control of nuclear tests and on disarmament.

Senator MANSFIELD. Well, on the basis of your testimony, Mr. Dean, I would assume that you would not be averse to going even further because on the basis of the question raised by the Soviet Union vis-a-vis nuclear testing. I believe it was the consensus of the convention that this matter should be referred to the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Mr. DEAN. Yes, we voted a resolution to that effect.

Senator MANSFIELD. Do you know of any reason why this Government should not take—do you think that to advance this matter in the United Nations would be an initiative for peace on our part?

Mr. DEAN. Yes, and it is my understanding that we have advanced it and are advancing it now.

Senator MANSFIELD. Well, Mr. Dean, I want to thank you for your frank answers to this series of questions, because I think the sooner we get this matter out in the open and try to arrive at a reasonable solution to the difficulties which are evidently going to mount in the years ahead, the better off we, the Soviet Union, and the whole world, for that matter, will be.

RETIREMENT OF SENATOR GREEN

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, last January 13 many of my Senate colleagues spoke in just tribute and admiration for THEODORE FRANCIS GREEN, the venerable Senator from Rhode Island who, much to the sorrow of us all, has decided not to seek another Senate term. As you know, Mr. President, the Senate was involved, at that time, in discussing the Federal Elections Act of 1959 and I was able to pay only scant tribute to my good friend—the esteemed Senator GREEN.

However, I am happy that my own comments have been delayed. I am happy because the delay gave me an opportunity to observe Senator GREEN's reaction to the remarks about him. Speaking of those remarks, the sage Senator said:

> After listening for some time I began to wonder whether or not a great mistake had been made. My mind wandered a little, and I thought of myself as lying in a coffin in front of the dais of the presiding officer, with my colleagues going by dropping a flower or two as they passed.

And—continuing in a more serious vein, he said:

> There is one impression I wish to correct. It should not be assumed that because I had said I would not be a candidate for reelection in the next election, I was retiring from public life. I do not want that impression to get abroad, especially in Rhode Island. I am ready to serve my friends the people—who really are my friends—whenever they feel they need me.

Mr. President, those two remarks illustrate the two qualities which, in my long association and close friendship with Senator GREEN, I have found most inspiring. With these two brief remarks he shows the rare good humor with which he has brightened this Senate and the sense of public service with which he has graced it. Rarely have two such qualities been combined in a single person to the extent they are blended in the personality and character of Senator GREEN.

How often—during the nearly 10 years he and I have served on the Committee on Rules and Administration—how often do I recall his flashing wit? It pierced debates with a perception which went immediately to the heart of the controversy and, at the same time, it cleared the air and, somehow, made our legislative tasks a little easier.

It is impossible, of course, for me to recall the countless number of times when this good man quietly offered himself for a thankless task—a bitter job. His character is such as to make it impossible for him to shirk what he believes to be his duty to the people of Rhode Island and the United States. In every respect he is, as my good friend, William S. White, has written, "a combat soldier, not a talking soldier."

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE GOVERNOR CLINTON A. CLAUSON OF MAINE

Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an editorial from the Waterville (Maine) Morning Sentinel entitled "Clauson Was Man of True Honesty," be printed in the body of the RECORD. It relates to our great and beloved Governor who recently passed away.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CLAUSON WAS MAN OF TRUE HONESTY

"Doc" Clauson was a kindly man who liked people and was in turn liked by them.

He was an outgoing and friendly man who by his nature didn't make personal enemies.

It seems almost out of character that he should have been at the time of his death locked in a bitter battle with his executive council.

It was not strange, however, to those who knew him well, because his fight with the council was a disagreement that involved principles and where principles were involved "Doc" Clauson was not a man to make compromises.

This was evident when he was mayor of Waterville. On one occasion, for example, he put his whole political career on the line when he antagonized a powerful segment of his party in Waterville by his stand on an appointment for which he felt their man was not qualified.

It would have been easy during his year as Governor to have gone along with his executive council on appointments while he concentrated on being the affable chief of state.

But he felt that the council was exceeding its functions in attempting to control appointments that were properly the Governor's to make.

A principle was involved and he was willing to fight them on it, even though it must have been personally taxing on his friendly nature to do so.

But "Doc" Clauson wasn't ever a man afraid of a fight. He got the Democratic nomination for Governor after a fight in which he was opposed by many leaders in his party, especially those of the younger group.

He won election in a contest with a former Republican Governor although most political prognosticators thought he couldn't do it.

Once in office, he surrounded himself with capable people and tackled his job with determination and with a dedication that was typical of him, whatever his task.

On the go throughout his year in office he studied the State's problems and worked constantly to do something about them.

He was a man of character and of true honesty. He was a man who had the ability to be concerned with the problems of other people.

When he went about the State he wasn't just a politician seeking to curry favors and votes. He was a man who genuinely liked other people.

He liked them not just as voters but as human beings and they responded by liking him.

A Waterville man, on the other side of the political fence from "Doc" Clauson, who has known him intimately for years was as shocked as everyone else when he heard the news of his death.

He shook his head and said, "I've never known a finer person." Could there be a finer eulogy?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business?

CONGRESS HAS RESPONSIBILITY TO PROVIDE AID TO AREAS OF CHRONIC UNEMPLOYMENT AND DISTRESS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, on January 8, 1960, the White House made public an exchange of correspondence between the President of the United States and the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER].

I refer to the President's letter in reply to Senator COOPER in which he discussed the present role of the Federal Government in alleviating the conditions of economic distress in areas of chronic unemployment.

The tenor of the President's response to the question addressed him by our distinguished colleague from Kentucky was consistent with the position the present administration has too long maintained. In brief, the President declares that "the benefits resulting from the Federal contribution in surplus labor areas have been widespread and substantial."

In spite of such optimistic Presidential phrasing, and notwithstanding such recent headlines as "Jobs at peak as economy shows rally," the grim facts of large-scale unemployment continue to exist in many areas of our country, and hunger is still the daily lot in many thousands of American homes. The State Legislature of West Virginia is now in one of its most difficult sessions grappling with these problems. But our State and others—and the distressed localities situated within them—cannot be expected to solve all of the far-reaching and vexing problems inherent in this age of extreme technological changes without receiving assistance in some degree from the Federal establishment beyond what the President claims this administration is doing.

SENATE PASSED AREA REDEVELOPMENT BILL

During the first session of this Congress last year the Senate passed S. 722, the area redevelopment bill, after lengthy consideration. This measure was the product of extensive hearings—some of them in West Virginia.

It was my privilege to be one of the original cosponsors of the bill, and I am glad to see that the dedicated Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is present on the floor as I make these remarks. His leadership in this vital field is appreciated and recognized.

I offered testimony at Beckley and Morgantown in support of that measure when the subcommittee of the Senate Banking and Currency Committee conducted hearings in our State under the direction of my diligent colleague, Senator ROBERT C. BYRD. And I participated actively in the debate on the bill in this Chamber and supported it fully on all rollcalls.

Only this morning, Mr. President, members of the West Virginia congressional delegation discussed the need for House action. They are eager to join others, or to lead their colleagues, in bringing the bill to the floor for debate.

During the recent recess, I conducted hearings in West Virginia as a member of the Senate's Special Committee on Unemployment Problems. These hearings, held for 3 consecutive days in four different locations, gave added evidence of the tragic conditions in many parts of West Virginia. Other of my colleagues, who are members of that committee, can attest to depressed conditions in numerous areas, because they, too, conducted hearings in their own and other States, and know full well that prosperity is not spread uniformly over the country.

Perhaps I have done all that lies within my power as a U.S. Senator to help secure passage of the area redevelopment bill. Yet, there remains one further avenue for me to explore and one other course for me to seek to develop in the role of an individual citizen with an abiding interest and concern in the problem.

A CITIZEN'S APPEAL FOR PASSAGE

Therefore, I speak now as a citizen when I assert my right of petition, and I address my petition especially to the House Rules Committee and to all Members of the House of Representatives in urging consideration and passage of S. 722 at the earliest opportunity.

In spite of the economic recovery of last year over much of the country—a fact in which we all rejoice—the conditions to which the provisions of S. 722 are addressed have not been altered. Indeed, in many instances they have worsened. In West Virginia, there has been a general increase during the past year in the number of initial unemployment-compensation claims filed. This adds more distress atop our chronic problem of thousands of permanently unemployed coal miners whose jobs have been liquidated by reason of extensive mine mechanization.

Mr. President, in 1959 in West Virginia we mined approximately 115 million tons of bituminous coal. This figure is somewhat like the figure for 1958, but 10,500 fewer miners were employed in West Virginia in 1959 than were employed in 1958. Yet the tonnage was practically the same.

When I speak of the situation, I want to be specific. A recent survey by the West Virginia Department of Employment Security received in our office for the week ended January 9, 1960, revealed that every one of that agency's 24 offices in the State reported an increase in the number of initial claims filed that week as compared with the number filed during the 2 weeks preceding, with such areas as centrally located Clarksburg showing a 293-percent increase, Moundsville in the northern panhandle, bordering Ohio on the west and Pennsylvania on the east, showing a 250-percent upsurge, and Martinsburg in the extreme eastern panhandle, near both the Maryland and Virginia lines, showing an increase of 203 percent.

This is an alarming spread because, as their locations were described, none of these communities is in the hard-pressed southern West Virginia coal mining region which has long since been recognized as in dire need of assistance. But even in the southern coal mining communities—such as Beckley, Logan, and Welch—where the unemployment rate supposedly had leveled off—the increase in initial claims filed for the same period, as previously stated, has been 99.2 percent, 81.9 percent, and 74.6 percent, respectively. So the situation shows further worsening, even in the chronic areas.

CONSTRUCTION OFF AND HOUSING UNOCCUPIED

At this point it seems appropriate to quote briefly from a communication I received a few days ago from my longtime friend, City Manager Elmer W. Prince, of Morgantown, W. Va. That city is the home of the State university, where much heavy engineering and construction on and near the campus have materially bolstered the economy.

But City Manager Prince wrote in a January 9, 1960, letter to me that—> the unemployment situation in this area is as critical and may be worse than at this time last year. The State, city, and individuals have been doing their best in this area in attempting to provide employment by new building construction and repair projects.

But he added, which I hope my colleagues in the Senate will bear in mind:

> This construction program has reached its peak and it now appears the program for 1960 and future years will be far below present level. Should there not be a continuance of a heavy construction program, there is little to offer the unemployed for their livelihood in this area. Local industry is reducing its payrolls, the State construction program is being seriously reduced, and the city is unable to continue its heavy program.

Now, Mr. President, I underscore for emphasis this additional significant comment in the Morgantown city manager's letter to our office:

> There are more than 600 dwelling units in the immediate area (of Morgantown) unoccupied and for sale or rent, and the general economic condition is on a sharp downward trend. Some concerted action must be taken before conditions reach a critical point. There appears to be but one answer to the problem and that is for the States and subordinate governmental units and agencies, which are facing economic ills, to obtain financial assistance from the Federal Government for worthwhile and public improvement projects.

Thus, in spite of the President's apparent belief that his administration has spread prosperity uniformly across the country there still remain in West Virginia and other States many islands of chronic unemployment, economic distress, and certainly much poverty.

DOMESTIC SCENE NEEDS ATTENTION, TOO

Now, as a prelude to further remarks concerning the President's responsibilities, I have said before and I repeat that I do not wish to be critical of our Chief Executive's travels in the interest of mutual understanding. In fact, I applaud that mission and the pursuit of it.

On September 12, 1959, in this Chamber, I stated that the exchange of visits between the President of the United States and the Premier of the Soviet Union would involve a certain amount of peril, but I declared that I prefer to stand on the side of promise, rather than to kneel on the side of peril. I say today as I said then: The path to peace is a continuing search. The overriding concern of unnumbered millions of humans calls for forbearance and forthrightness. But we must never cease in our quest.

At this time I do, however, emphasize the need for both a sympathetic and realistic approach by the White House to the domestic matters which are the central theme of this discourse.

I doubt not that if General Eisenhower had spent as much time touring our own underdeveloped and distressed areas as he already has done in Asia and Africa, he would have an awareness of the problems of West Virginia and of other States in the same degree as he seems to have toward those of India and other countries.

Now, I have never been one to declare that I will oppose economic assistance abroad until my claims and appeals for domestic development are met. But surely, in the interests of commonsense and national security, as well as humanitarianism, we must acknowledge our responsibilities to our own people at least as much as to those of Asia and Africa. In fact, I have said—and I declare with renewed emphasis—it is my opinion that for every dollar we make available for assistance abroad we have a double obligation to our fellow citizens in the United States.

But, Mr. President, the most recent contribution of the administration in this field of domestic distress has been another press release from the Department of Commerce. It came to my attention in the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette a few days ago.

That newspaper published an article under a Washington dateline stating that Under Secretary of Commerce Philip A. Ray recently declared that the Federal Government already has more than 40 programs "which can be of direct help to communities where pockets of unemployment exist despite the general national prosperity."

PUBLIC RELATIONS OR PUBLIC RESPONSIBILITY?

The obvious implication to be drawn from the Under Secretary's press release and the President's letter in reply to the inquiry made by our colleague from Kentucky [Mr. COOPER] is that the administration is doing all it intends to do, and, further, that what is being done is quite sufficient. This seems to me to be the product of a sense of public relations on the part of the administration rather than a facing up to public responsibility.

There is no doubt about it in my mind, our first obligation is to assure every man the opportunity to maintain his own respect as an individual. This means, before all else, the opportunity to use his strength and skill and intelligence in some form of constructive work and thereby enable him to assume his rightful role as a free man and a provider for his family. No one can gage the dreadful cost in human terms and in the erosion of morale which is brought on by enforced idleness.

We have ample statistics on the loss in gross national product due to chronic unemployment and the recent recession. And I might add in passing that the total cost of S. 722 would be a mere pittance as compared with the cost of the recession of 1958. But who can gage the psychological cost of thousands of skilled men forced into idleness by technological changes? Who can gage the cost in self-respect and the dislocation of family life when men must desert their families so that the wives may claim nonsupport and thereby qualify for public assistance? Yet, these conditions exist even now as we begin to bask in the glow of the approaching "fabulous sixties"—as the coming decade has been labeled by some persons.

With all of the good will and optimism for peace and prosperity being generated by the administration and party in power these days, I hope it will not be considered unpatriotic if one must occasionally take the Senate floor to ask that there be a sterner look at the inventory of our national needs. At the present time I refer only to this one—the area redevelopment bill—though there are many others which the 86th Congress must face in the coming months.

But the need for this measure—S. 722—is immediate and pressing. The hearings have been held and the testimony has been given before committees in both Houses of the Congress. The bill has been reported by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The evidence is set down—not only in the written record, but more grimly—in the darkened eyes of men who find no work for willing hands and in the pinched and tightened faces of their wives and hungry children.

Therefore, I ask again in this petition, principally in the role of an individual citizen addressing the Rules Committee of the House of Representatives and the Members of that body:

"Will you, gentlemen and ladies, place S. 722 on the calendar of the House and seek its passage so that it may be presented to the President of the United States for his signature at the earliest possible time?"

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to thank the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] for this very truthful and frank statement of a great national need. With profits increasing, there is a tendency for the financial writers to think that everything is going well. However, the Senator from West Virginia has reminded us that the so-called distressed areas of the country are still in a very sad plight. What the Senator says about the State of West Virginia could in large part be duplicated about my State of Illinois.

The truth is that the textile industry of the North, the coal-mining industry, and the cutover areas have suffered from high unemployment for a long period of years. This is unemployment which continues at a high level, even when the rest of the country seems to be prosperous.

It is very easy to forget these men and to forget this problem. It is easy to say, when we have a business depression or an acute recession, "This is not the time to act, because we will not bring relief rapidly enough." Then, when conditions improve, people tend to forget and to say that relief is not needed.

The Senator from West Virginia has put us all in his debt by raising this issue. While we in the Senate do not ordinarily like to offer advice to the House of Representatives, the Senator from West Virginia was a very distinguished Member of the House of Representatives for many years and is, in a sense, an alumnus of that body, so it is quite proper for him to urge that the Rules Committee report the bill favorably. The bill was reported to the Rules Committee by the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, and we are confident the bill would be passed by the House were it to receive a rule.

I want to thank the Senator from West Virginia again for what he has done. I think the Senator has helped to move the cause forward very appreciably.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I thank my friend and crusading colleague.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. RANDOLPH. I yield to my distinguished friend from Kentucky, who cosponsored the area redevelopment bill and has worked to provide assistance for distressed areas.

Mr. COOPER. First, I want to thank the Senator fom West Virginia for sending me a message today saying he was going to speak upon this subject. The Senator also told me he might comment on an exchange of letters I had with the President of the United States. I may say that I got out of bed to come here, for I have a touch of the flu. I missed the part of the Senator's speech in which he may have referred to the correspondence. I am unaware of what he said about it.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I spoke in a very complimentary and sincere manner about the senior Senator's concern for aid to the depressed areas of our country, including Kentucky.

Mr. COOPER. I do not know what the Senator said about the President's response.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I indicated it was inadequate.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. President, first I pay my tribute to both Senators from West Virginia and to my good friend the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] for all the efforts they have made to render assistance to the depressed areas. I joined with them. I was a cosponsor of the area redevelopment bill which passed the Senate, and which is now pending in the House. I, too, hope the House will take action on that bill. We have worked together also on such matters as the problem of securing a better variety of food for people who are now attempting to live on surplus foods distributed from Government stocks. We have worked together on problems affecting the coal industry. With respect to such objectives, I know that we have been in harmony.

Not long ago I did write the President of the United States, not directly upon the subject of the area redevelopment bill, but in an effort to develop another approach. I should like to comment briefly on that subject. My purpose in writing the President was to find out what the departments of the Government are doing today, under existing programs, to meet the problems of the depressed areas.

I think it is a true statement that the greatest influence on the prosperity of the depressed areas is the general prosperity of the United States. That is a simple and true statement. We are fortunate that there is a high level of prosperity in the country today, which has reached most sections. Nevertheless, despite this high level of prosperity and growth, it is a curious fact that in certain areas there is unemployment. There are people in great need. There are people who are hungry.

My own position has been that that curious contradiction makes it more imperative that those sections which are prosperous, those people who are prosperous, and the country—which as a whole is prosperous—ought to feel a greater sense of obligation to do something for the areas which are not prosperous, and for the people who have fallen in the ditch.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt, if I may do so without breaking the continuity of his remarks?

Mr. COOPER. Certainly.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I believe that what the Senator is saying is important. I say it in another way. When an erosion takes place within any area or within any State, that erosion certainly has an impact on the contiguous areas, and thus it spreads. So, to have a condition which is unhealthy in any section of our country—and it is widespread in some areas—means an effect which is damaging on the economy of the Nation as a whole.

Mr. COOPER. I thank the Senator. The Senator and I have been serving on the committee which was established at the close of the last Congress, the Special Committee on Unemployment Problems. I did not attend all the hearings. But in one hearing which I attended, in the eastern section of Kentucky, I found that there were people in as dire need as during the great depression. I know something about that, because in the years from 1930 to 1938, 3 or 4 years after my return from college, I served as county judge in a county where I heard every day the pleas of people out of work and in need. I have never forgotten that experience. My votes in the Senate on many occasions have been influenced by the facts and conditions I observed at that time.

I now turn to my correspondence with the President. The area redevelopment bill, which I cosponsored together with the Senator from West Virginia, and which I supported in the Senate and still support, nevertheless has not passed. I do not wish to make a political statement, but so long as the President has been brought into the discussion, let me say that it is a fact that this Congress is largely under the control of the Democratic Party, and this bill has not passed the Congress. I will admit that even if it does pass, there may be grave doubt that it will become law. So I tried to approach this problem from a different angle.

I suggested to the President, in my recent exchange of correspondence and in the talk I had with him yesterday, that perhaps a different approach might be taken—one within the powers and competence of the executive department. And I may say that I expect to continue my talks with members of his staff, and then again with the President. I suggested to the President the creation of what I call a "task force," chiefly to distinguish it from a "study committee." I suggested that such a task force be established by the President, that a man of great stature be placed at the head of this task force, and that the task force be made up of members from various departments and agencies which now have programs which could be increased, enlarged, and made to work more effectively in the depressed areas, both for emergency purposes and for the long range development of these areas.

Let me give a few examples: I suggested that the Department of Labor could be directed to increase the number of its employment offices, and to staff them more adequately. I suggested that a determined effort be made to find out which people in these areas are employable, which people have skills that would enable them to obtain employment now if they were at places having employment to offer. I suggested that funds be made available—and I do not believe a large amount of funds would be required or that new appropriations would have to be made—to transport these people to places where there is a prospect of employment, to see if they can be employed; I also suggested the use of emergency funds, if necessary, to help transport their household goods and their families when jobs were found.

I made a second emergency proposal. This proposal may seem small at a time when everyone is talking about big things, but sometimes it is a small thing that can give immediate help. I suggested that the Department of Agriculture do what was done in depression days, that is, inaugurate a garden program for the depressed areas, so that the people could raise enough garden stuff, as we call it, for their use during the summer and fall, and for canning. Many people in these areas are now living on a few items of surplus food. Certainly gardens would increase the variety of foods available to them. Those are emergency measures.

I believe that even if Congress does pass the area redevelopment bill, the chief purpose of which is to induce industry to come into those areas, and even if the bill is signed by the President, it is not certain that industry will go into these areas. After all, private industry makes its choices largely on the prospect of profit. It may be that even if the bill is enacted into law, private industry might say, "Well, we would rather go into an area where profits are more certain."

So for the long run, I believe it is necessary to work for the fullest development of the existing natural resources of these areas, thereby building up the basic industrial requirements which in time will attract more industry to these regions which are now underdeveloped. Therefore, I thought another function of the task force would be to take effective steps for basic development of the areas. I will mention a few examples of the steps that could be taken.

First, as I go into my own region of eastern Kentucky—and I am sure the Senator finds the same thing true in West Virginia—I sometimes have the feeling that others may consider it an effort to go up those winding, narrow roads. It is not really an effort for me, because I have been up them so often. However, I think that for a stranger to go over these narrow roads might be a considerable effort for him. I believe the Bureau of Public Roads, in conjunction with State highway departments, could go into eastern Kentucky and West Virginia and Pennsylvania and Tennessee and other areas, and lay out at least one great highway providing access to and egress from markets, and that they could begin now to locate that road and set up a time schedule to build it.

Second, Mr. President, we have a program for airport construction. Priorities are set up for the airports in our States. Perhaps the several agencies dealing with airports, in conjunction with State airport agencies, could say that we ought to put an airport in at least one or two of these areas, so that the people could get in and get out, and as a further inducement for industry to locate there.

Third, and very important, nearly every one of these sections needs water resource development. It would be only right, in connection with one of the bills the Congress passes each year for the development of water resources, that a system of priorities be included so that the Corps of Army Engineers could say that at least one great project should be undertaken in each of these areas—in order to provide the water needed by industry and the necessary flood control protection.

I will give a fourth example. Eastern Kentucky is largely dependent upon mining, as the Senator's State of West Virginia is, partly because its great agricultural possibilities have remained untapped. The Department of Agriculture, under the leadership of a task force, with the approval and the sympathy of the President, could increase its program of agricultural development for these counties. It could locate one of its rural development projects in each of these counties, and could also expand its forestry programs.

These are examples of the steps I had in mind, in asking that the great agencies of the Government be directed to make existing programs more effective in these areas, in asking that the powers of the Government be directed toward giving immediate emergency help in the ways I have outlined, and in asking that for the long run a program be begun toward the basic development of what I call the underdeveloped regions of the United States.

I have served 7 years in the Senate—with some intervals—but I have stood in favor of every issue connected with foreign aid. I have stood for it against thousands of letters in opposition to foreign aid which have come to me from my own State. I believe I can say I have stood for foreign aid as faithfully as anyone in the Senate. However, if there are underdeveloped areas in the world, there are also underdeveloped areas in the United States. There is an underdeveloped area in eastern Kentucky. There is an underdeveloped area in West Virginia. There is an underdeveloped area in Pennsylvania. I am sure there are underdeveloped areas in other parts of the United States.

I should like to see our Government begin a purposeful program to develop the underdeveloped areas of the United States.

So I say to my good friend from West Virginia that my correspondence with the President, my meeting with him yesterday, and the talks which I expect to continue to have with him, with his staff and with the agencies of Government, are directed toward setting up a task force—with a competent, outstanding director—to develop existing programs, to give all the emergency aid that can be given, and then to start the basic development of these underdeveloped areas.

The President has shown great sympathy toward those problems, and I am sure that he will continue to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business under the 3-minute limitation?

Mr. RANDOLPH. The Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from West Virginia are in basic agreement. I believe that timidity and delay in facing this problem will no longer suffice. Full-time requirements in this instance cannot be met with part-time attention. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will agree with me that we need a determined attack on this problem. Such action is long overdue.

A 13-POINT PROGRAM FOR AGRICULTURE

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, today in the United States we face a strange paradox. Generally, the United States is experiencing new records of expansion and progress. Unfortunately, all segments of the economy are not sharing proportionately in this growth and prosperity.

The Nation's farmers, for example, despite record production of farm commodities, find that their income has been decreasing in terms of real value.

As yet, there has been no panacea-type solution. In the days ahead, however, Congress will face decisions on a number of programs which, though they may not be a cure-all, will help ease some of the economic problems for the farmer.

Recently, I outlined some of the major programs which, if carried forward, would contribute to resolving some of the problems in agriculture. Recognizably, not one of these provides the overall solution. Nevertheless, the recommendations, if adopted, I believe would make a substantial contribution to brightening the economic outlook of our farmers for the future.

I request unanimous consent to have these points printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WILEY

The outlook for farm income—down in 1959—regrettably is not too bright for 1960. The Nation cannot afford a serious recession in agriculture—historically the birthplace of depressions—and must take steps to prevent such an economic catastrophe.

The purpose is to provide a healthier farm economy which would benefit the whole Nation.

Unfortunately, the biblical saying that "there is nothing new under the sun" appears to be especially true when it comes to finding new ideas for an over-all solution to the complex problems in agriculture.

However, there are a number of meritorious programs, now under way, which if improved and expanded, can help to brighten the outlook in agriculture.

These include the following:

1. Expanding research to find new ways and means for utilizing farm products. For example, I have recommended the establishment of a dairy research laboratory at Madison, Wis.—to find better ways of processing, distributing, and utilizing dairy and other farm products, as well as finding new markets.

2. Establish a Country Life Commission, as proposed in the Wiley bill, S. 265, to make a long range evaluation of the changing social, economic, and technological revolution in agriculture, together with recommendations to enable the farmer to adjust to the changes.

3. Further expansion and utilization of the rural development program to assist farmers in chronically low-income areas attain a higher standard of living.

4. Strengthen the REA and other coops to better serve the American farmer.

5. Improve the Federal milk marketing order system to better reflect cost of milk production and provide more equitable price to the dairyman—particularly in Wisconsin and elsewhere in the Midwest.

6. Expand the opportunities for rural education—including better library services, extension services from local universities, availability of information publications, and generally providing the farmer with more sources of data for improving farm operations.

7. Carry forward and expand, as necessary, the special school milk and school lunch programs—serving constructively to provide an outlet for surplus farm commodities as well as to improve the health of the boys and girls of America.

8. Combat crop, forest, and livestock diseases to reduce losses to farmers.

9. Carry on alert programs to assure healthful milk, meat, and other farm products for consumers through proper utilization of modern chemicals, antibiotics, and other such products used for animal health and crop protection.

10. Carrying forward the conservation reserve of the soil bank for taking cropland out of production—aimed particularly toward reducing the highest stockpiles of surpluses—wheat and corn.

11. Providing the Nation's farmers with better marketing information on the supply-demand balance for milk and other commodities on a long range basis. The purpose would be to permit farmers—insofar as possible—to assume a larger responsibility in voluntarily regulating production and thus work toward supply-demand in the marketplace.

12 Assure a price support level that will not only be of real help to farmers but also work more effectively to create a supply-demand balance of farm commodities.

13. Establish a more effective national food policy—to provide for better utilization of surplus farm commodities to feed hungry people at home, as well as to support our national policies abroad—in a humanitarian as well as a strategic way. The idea is to turn our food resources into assets instead of liabilities.

Today, in agriculture, we face a strange paradox. Although there are mountains of surplus, there still exist people in the United States and other lands who find it necessary to exist on inadequate—and particularly in some less developed countries, starvation—diets.

Fundamentally, then, one of our major problems—reflected in surpluses—is the lack of new ways and means for utilizing these products and the need for better distribution channels.

Congress, I believe, must take a new look at the whole situation. We recognize, of course, that "economic ills" cannot be cured with legislative remedies. Instead, the solution must be based on sound, economic principles. Until a solution is forthcoming, however, the Nation must be alert to prevent a depression in agriculture—the source of our vital resource: food. This, I believe, is in the best interests, not only of the farmer, but of the whole economy.

OPERATION OF RAIL COMMUTER LINES BY CITY OF PHILADELPHIA

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, yesterday's and today's newspapers carried on their front pages the dramatic story of a new development in mass transportation in one of our great cities, the city of Philadelphia, Pa.

The headline in yesterday's Philadelphia Evening Bulletin reads "Railroads Agree to City's Plan To Operate Commuter Lines."

A headline on the front page of this morning's New York Times reads "Philadelphia To Subsidize Railroads To Help Service."

The headline in this morning's Philadelphia Inquirer reads "Two Railroads Adopt City's Commuter Lines Plan."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these three newspaper articles may be printed in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibits 1, 2, and 3.)

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I hope that all Senators will be interested in this development. We have known for a long time of the overall problems of our railroads. But those problems are intensified when it comes to considering their commutation services in and around the great metropolitan areas and urban communities.

Back in 1954, when I still had the honor to be the mayor of Philadelphia, an urban traffic and transportation commission was formed of eminent businessmen, including those who head our two great railroads, the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the president of the Reading Railroad; the head of the Philadelphia Transportation Co.; and many others interested in transportation and traffic problems around our cities. The chairman of the commission was Mr. Clifford E. Frishmuth, then the president of the Supplee-Wills Milk Co., which sends its milk trucks around the city every day in the year.

This eminent group made a complete report shortly before my term as mayor expired. It was comprehensive; it was imaginative; it was most helpful.

My successor, Mayor Richardson Dilworth, has taken that report and made an actuality of what was then really a planner's dream. A year and a half ago, with the cooperation of the Pennsylvania Railroad and the Reading Railroad, Operation Northwest was started. Under that operation, the city of Philadelphia subsidized suburban rail traffic to a substantial extent, amounting to many hundreds of thousands of dollars. As a result of that subsidy, the railroads dropped their rates, so that one could ride into the city from any place in the outlying areas for 30 cents. Parking facilities were made available at the stations of the railroads, so that commuters from outlying districts could leave their cars and travel into the city by train.

A system of relatively low-cost transfers—in some cases, free transfers—was arranged with the Philadelphia Transportation Co., which operates the buses and streetcars.

Commuter traffic on the railroads rose by more than 20 percent in less than 6 months.

Last year a similar operation, called Operation Northeast, was instituted, with similar satisfactory results.

These pilot projects having succeeded, we now learn of the dramatic agreements to which I have referred, under which long-range plans to implement the business of getting people back on the rails at low, subsidized prices, and getting them to leave their cars in the suburbs so as to speed up traffic on the city streets, has come to fruition.

The major credit for these agreements must go to Philadelphia's dynamic Mayor Richardson Dilworth; but a due measure of credit also must go to those wise and farseeing businessmen, James M. Symes, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Joseph E. Fisher, president of the Reading Railroad, as well as to Douglas Pratt, president of the Philadelphia Transportation Co., and many other businessmen, and to all the labor leaders associated with the unions which operate the trains and trolleys and buses.

A nonprofit corporation is to be formed. It will be subsidized in part by the city. The railroads will turn over their suburban line operations to this corporation, so that the commuter trains can be operated at low cost and without profit, to bring people into the city, as I have indicated.

If this scheme is to be successful, it will require Federal assistance to this nonprofit corporation, so as to enable it to acquire, at low cost and at low interest rates, the modern streamlined, air conditioned, lightweight equipment which is necessary to induce travelers to move in ever greater numbers out of their automobiles and back onto mass transportation facilities.

Mayor Dilworth will be in Washington early next month with a delegation from the city of Philadelphia and the railroads. He will be talking to many of my colleagues. I hope they will give openminded and considerate attention to his plea, because I myself am confident that this type of operation can be for the benefit not only of the city of Philadelphia, but also for the entire surrounding metropolitan area, which includes five additional Pennsylvania counties and three New Jersey counties.

I believe that this plan may well be one of the land marks in the breakthrough which will help to solve our overall traffic and transportation problems in the great metropolitan areas of our Nation, problems which, unfortunately, have become so acute that they are strangling our cities and destroying the growth of our economy.

EXHIBIT 1

[From the Evening Bulletin, Jan. 20, 1960]

RAILROADS AGREE TO CITY'S PLAN TO OPERATE COMMUTER LINES—BERGER WILL SEEK CHARTER TOMORROW

(By Robert J. Eisler)

The Pennsylvania and Reading Railroads have agreed to the city's plan for a nonprofit corporation to operate commuter lines in Philadelphia, it was announced today.

The announcement was made jointly by Mayor Dilworth, James M. Symes, chairman of the board of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Joseph A. Fisher, Reading president.

Last week, the Railway Labor Executives Association, representing 23 operating unions, endorsed the proposal and agreed to become a charter member of the corporation.

Dilworth proposed the corporation last July. Negotiations have been going on ever since.

BERGER TO BE COUNSEL

Today's announcement said that City Solicitor David Berger, who will serve as counsel for the corporation, will go into common pleas court tomorrow to seek a charter for the corporation.

It will be known as the Passenger Service Improvement Corporation of Philadelphia, said to be the first such corporation of its kind in the country.

As of now the plan would apply only to lines entirely within the city. Dilworth said he hopes that the suburban governments will join so the plan can be expanded.

Berger said the plan is for the corporation to:

Immediately take over the existing contract between the city and the Reading Railroad for Operation Northeast between Reading Terminal and Fox Chase.

NORTHWEST CONTRACT

Negotiate a new contract with the Pennsylvania and the Reading Railroads for Operation Northwest which covers the Chestnut Hill lines of both railroads.

Attempt to negotiate an agreement with the Pennsylvania for a low-fare commuter program on the Trenton local line between Suburban Station and Torresdale.

Attempt to negotiate similar agreements with the Reading on its Norristown branch between Reading Terminal and the Shawmont station just beyond Manayunk, and with the Pennsy for its commuter trains to Manayunk.

CITY SUBSIDIES

City subsidies paid under the existing agreements have enabled both railroads to reduce fares and provide extra service on Operation Northeast and Operation Northwest.

The agreement for Operation Northeast expires in May, and the current extended agreement for Operation Northwest expires at the end of February.

Getting around to the financial aspects, Berger said the proposed new 1-year agreement for Operation Northwest will guarantee the railroads a minimum income of $1,400,000 and a maximum of $1,525,000.

THREE HUNDRED AND TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND DOLLARS ALREADY PAID

He said that the city, if necessary, will pay a subsidy not to exceed $325,000, the same amount paid by the city in 1959 under the present agreement.

Berger said that if the revenue should exceed the maximum figure, the money will be placed in a reserve fund by the corporation and used for promoting new business on the two lines.

Berger said that the agreement for Operation Northeast will remain unchanged. It provides for the payment of $105,000 to the Reading for a 33-week period.

He also noted that all the agreements are subject to approval of city council and the council must appropriate the funds to the corporation for payment to the railroads.

FUNDS FOR STAFF

Berger said he also will ask council to appropriate funds for a small staff to manage the corporation and for capital improvement funds to purchase new rolling stock, build a turnaround at Torresdale, and electrify the Fox Chase line of the Reading.

There is now $1.4 million in the city's 1960–61 capital budgets for these purposes.

There will be 15 directors of the new corporation, with the chairman to be named by Mayor Dilworth.

The city will have 11 directors, each railroad will have 1, and the labor unions will have 2 representatives.

HOPE FOR U.S. SUBSIDY

At a press conference following the announcement, Mayor Dilworth said the long-range success of the corporation will depend on whether Federal funds are made available to subsidize mass transportation.

He said that he and mayors of other large cities will join with executives of leading commuter railroads in Washington next month to propose subsidy legislation to the Congress. He predicted "at least a start will be made in the current session of Congress."

The plan for this legislation was developed at a meeting between the mayors and railroad presidents in Denver last December 1.

This legislation would provide long-term, low-interest Government loans for purchase of commuter cars; direct grants and aid to municipal authorities or nonprofit corporations to improve rights of way, stations and parking, and establish a balanced Federal transportation policy covering all fields, including rails, airlines, highways, and ships.

Dilworth said the city was deeply indebted to the railroads and the railroad labor unions for working out this attempt to solve the city's commuter problem.

MORE FOR NORTHWEST

Fisher and Walter W. Patchell, PRR vice president who represented Symes at the conference, both said that the amount guaranteed for operation of Operation Northwest during the first year would not cover their costs.

They said that in future years the guarantee will have to be increased.

"We want to continue these commuter lines but we can no longer compete with other subsidized means of transportation," Fisher said.

Patchell called on the suburban communities benefiting from commuter lines to join the new corporation. Dilworth previously extended a similar invitation to communities outside the city.

FORCE THEIR HANDS

"We think general interest out there (the suburbs) will force their hands," Dilworth broke in. "It seems to me that it is going to affect real estate prices and development, and we hope that sort of pressure will build up.

"They have been conscious of it since the fare reductions here," Fisher added. "It is inevitable that the railroads will either have to get higher fares or Government help if they are to continue to service the suburbs.

"It's bound to come. We have to have more money."

Under the new plan, the corporation will take over all transportation planning from the urban traffic and transportation board, an independent agency which has operated with a professional staff since Mayor Clark's administration.

EXHIBIT 2

[From the New York Times, Jan. 21, 1960]

PHILADELPHIA TO SUBSIDIZE RAILROADS TO HELP SERVICE

(By Clayton Knowles)

PHILADELPHIA, January 20.—The city, two railroads and railroad labor joined today in announcing a nonprofit corporation that is designed to increase fast rail transportation with the city, help the railroads stay in business and keep automobiles out of the center of the city.

The new agency, which will be known as the Passenger Service Improvement Corporation, will operate at first under a city subsidy exceeding $2 million a year.

It will provide fast, frequent service from outlying points within the city to the center of the city at 30 cents a ride, a reduction from the normal fare. The Pennsylvania and Reading Railroads, acting as contract carriers for the new corporation, will be guaranteed fixed amounts. If the fares do not meet minimum guarantees a city subsidy will make up the difference.

The arrangement, the first of its kind in the Nation, contemplates Federal assistance for the railroads, possibly before the end of the year.

The hope is that legislation will be approved so that the Federal Government will match local contributions at least dollar for dollar, much in the way it now assists localities in urban renewal programs.

"The long-range success of this venture depends on Federal aid—and I think it will be forthcoming," Mayor Richardson Dilworth said.

Joining with the major in announcing the plan were Walter W. Patchell, vice president of the Pennsylvania Railroad; Joseph A. Fisher, president of the Reading, and Anthony Matz of the Railway Labor Executives Association, representing 23 railroad unions.

The mayor will name 11 directors of the nonprofit corporation, the railroads 2 and the unions 2. Incorporation papers will be filed tomorrow.

The operation of the plan at the outset will be confined to the Philadelphia city limits. But Mayor Dilworth and the rail officials expressed the belief that suburbs in Bucks, Montgomery, and Delaware Counties and possibly even across the Delaware River in New Jersey would ask to come into the operation.

Commuters living in these areas do not benefit from the present plan if they board the train in their hometowns. If they drive to the city limits, however, they can park, take the train, and get the saving.

Under a highly successful test of the program begun in the fall of 1958 many commuters have taken advantage of the service. It is hoped they will bring pressure on their home communities to extend the plan beyond the city limits.

The test also showed that many persons living inside the city were willing to stop driving into the center of the city and use the train instead. Other people gave up the cheaper, but slower, public transportation system to use the train.

This has added to the railroads' revenues and enabled them to improve service.

The tests were called Operation Northwest and Operation Northeast.

Both operations were subsidized, the first at the rate of $320,000 a year and the second at $105,000. The city assistance just about covered the actual cost to the railroad of the extra service and reduced fares the city demanded.

Operation Northwest, serving the fashionable Chestnut Hill area, has increased rail travel by 20 percent. The number of riders to the more modest Fox Chase section under Operation Northeast rose 200 percent since last fall.

Both routes will be continued under the new arrangement and, in addition, the new corporation will take over two other routes this year. One will be to Torresdale near the Bucks County line on the Pennsylvania's New York division and the other to Manayunk and Shawmont on the Reading's Norristown line generally to the west.

If this can be achieved, 75 miles of railroad within the city limits will be included in the system.

Persons using these lines derive a further benefit in that they can get a transfer to the subway and bus facilities operated by the Philadelphia Transportation Co. for an additional 10 cents. The straight fare on these facilities is 20 cents.

Long-range objectives of the corporation will be the purchase of modern air-conditioned railroad cars, electrifying the Fox Chase line, building more auto-park-and-ride depots around the periphery of the city, and merchandising transportation to attract new riders.

EXHIBIT 3

[From the Philadelphia Inquirer, Jan. 21, 1960]

TWO RAILROADS ADOPT CITY'S COMMUTER LINES PLAN—BERGER WILL SEEK CHARTER TODAY FOR NONPROFIT AGENCY

A commuter's dream of low cost, frequent service with adequate parking facilities and air-conditioned trains came closer to reality Wednesday when the formation of a nonprofit corporation to run the railroads within the city was announced by Mayor Richardson Dilworth.

The agency, first of its kind in the United States, will be launched formally Thursday when City Solicitor David Berger files incorporation papers in the common pleas court. The organization will be known officially as the Passenger Service Improvement Corp. of Philadelphia.

INDEBTED TO RAILROADS

Its formation was announced jointly by the mayor, Walter W. Patchell, vice president of special services of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and Joseph A. Fisher, president of the Reading.

Dilworth hailed the plan and said its announcement made this an auspicious day for the city. He said he was indebted to the railroads for helping to work out a plan which would go far toward solving Philadelphia's commuter problem.

Under the setup, he added, Philadelphia can look forward to fast, convenient, and inexpensive transportation to midcity.

While the plan initially calls for the absorption of Operations Northeast and Northwest, the corporation also plans the early integration into the new system of the commuter lines operating to Torresdale, Manayunk, and Shawmont.

PARKING FOR AUTOS

The long-range program calls for relocation of existing stations to provide parking for commuters' automobiles, electrification of the Reading's Fox Chase line, and purchase of new equipment, including modern air-conditioned cars.

Suburban communities also will be encouraged to join the corporation and advantages to their residents will be explained by the city.

Berger said the corporation would have no effect on existing relations between the railroads and the railroad brotherhoods, since employees will remain on the payrolls of the railroads.

FIRST YEAR, $1.4 MILLION

The contract, which requires approval of city council, contains the following key provisions:

All fares collected on PSICP trains, revenue from advertising and parking at depots will accrue to the corporation.

Railroads will be reimbursed a minimum of $1,400,000 for the first year by the corporation to cover their cost of Operation Northwest. City council will be asked to appropriate $320,000 of this sum. Total appropriations for both Northwest and Northeast operations will run about $425,000 through 1960.

PSICP will determine train schedules, kinds of equipment, methods of improving service and promotion, among other managerial activities.

NONPROFIT AGENCY

PSICP will represent the city in all transportation matters and will absorb the urban traffic and transportation board, appointed by Dilworth to develop the new transportation program.

Negotiations will begin immediately to bring Torresdale and Manayunk lines under the nonprofit agency's control.

Initial PSICP business will include negotiating a contract to continue and improve Operation Northwest. Also, it will assume management of Operation Northeast, which runs through April, and lay plans for its extension.

FIFTEEN-MEMBER BOARD

The corporation, which will operate independently of the city and railroads, will have a 15-member board of directors. Eleven members, including the chairman, will be named by the mayor.

Each railroad will appoint a member, and the Railway Labor Executives Association, representing 23 railway unions, will appoint two. It will have a paid executive director. The directors will be nonsalaried.

The corporation was proposed last July 8 by Mayor Dilworth and negotiations have been in progress since then.

Last week the Railway Labor Executives Association endorsed the proposal and agreed to become a charter member of the corporation.

FIVE MILLION DOLLARS AVAILABLE

Berger said he hoped to have a detailed contract between the city and railroads ready within a month. He said approximately $5 million was available in the city's 1960–65 capital program for improvement of equipment and purchase of new cars.

Patchell congratulated the city on taking "the lead in moving toward a definite solution of the commuter and mass transportation problem."

He said the problem was one the railroads could not cope with alone and pointed out that commuter lines were disappearing in other cities, notably Boston and New York.

He added that he agreed with the mayor that some form of Federal financial aid would be necessary to guarantee the success of the program.

Fisher said the plan did not solve the railroad's commuter problem, but was a step in the right direction.

BACKGROUND—EVOLUTION OF AN IDEA

The revolutionary concept in commuter travel that became a reality Wednesday with the formation of a nonprofit corporation was first advanced last July 8 by Mayor Richardson Dilworth.

A day later, the Pennsylvania and Reading railroads adopted an official wait-and-see policy, declaring they weren't prepared to give anything away for nothing, and advising, instead, an operating agreement between the city and the railroads.

However, negotiations opened immediately and the climax came when the Passenger Service Improvement Corp. of Philadelphia was born.

During the course of those talks—specifically on September 27—it was learned that the all-inclusive program first proposed by Dilworth had been modified to include only those lines with both terminal points inside the city limits.

When the PSICP was announced Wednesday, other modifications also were included.

Suburban communities will be invited to join the corporation on the basis that their residents will be able to enjoy the advantages of corporation-owned travel routes if they sign up.

The guiding genius of the corporation has been City Solicitor David Berger, who will seek incorporation papers Thursday and who became the agency's first counsel.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS], designated as "1–13–60—E," to insert substitutes for certain portions of the bill.

Mr. KEATING obtained the floor.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, inasmuch as the unfinished business has now been laid before the Senate, will the Senator from New York yield for the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, with the understanding that in yielding for that purpose he will not lose the floor?

Mr. KEATING. Yes, I yield.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Then, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GORE in the chair). The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to make an announcement to the Senate. If we are able to complete action on the pending bill today, it is the intention to go over until Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has the floor.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me so I may ask the acting majority leader a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. Would it be the plan of the leadership to continue the session into the evening if it appears remotely possible that we can take final action tonight?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Not too late into the evening.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield for one observation that may be helpful to the acting majority leader and the acting leader of the minority?

Mr. KEATING. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. So far as I know, there is remaining the amendment now pending, which is the last amendment which I had expected to offer. There is also an amendment which the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] sent to the desk yesterday. There is another amendment proposed or submitted by the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. There are one or two perfecting amendments, one relating only to the fact that I propose to move that the act be cited as the Federal Elections Act of 1960, so that it will have as its effective date the first of January 1961.

Beyond those few matters, I know of nothing else, unless the able junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] has some further amendments to offer.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, there is also an amendment at the desk by the equally able other Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER].

Mr. HENNINGS. Oh, yes. I had forgotten about it. That amendment relates to taxation in the financing of campaigns. I am sorry I had forgotten to mention that amendment.

I just mention those matters for the guidance of our colleagues, in the hope that we may complete action on the bill today.

RECENT DEMONSTRATIONS OF ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I rise to add my voice to the chorus of protest from decent people in the United States and abroad against the ugly specter of anti-Semitism which still stalks the earth. We have been rudely reminded of the fact that anti-Semitism is still a living force by the recent demonstrations in West Germany and in other countries, including our own.

It is not my purpose to diagnose the cause of this sickness. Many competent observers are doing that. It is my purpose to acknowledge the fact of the sickness. It is my purpose to deplore and condemn this sinister force.

The United States has grown too small for religious bigotry. The world itself is too small and too interdependent to afford the luxury of bigotry and discrimination.

In a perceptive analysis of these anti-Semitic demonstrations Commonweal magazine maintains that these "eruptions in Western Germany can no longer be described as isolated and inconsequential" and that simple "regret and embarrassment are not adequate responses to the evil thing which is now revealed." I emphatically agree with this.

It is easy to point the finger of blame at Hitler or at the anti-Semitic policies of communism. It is much more difficult, but necessary, to face the fact that our own country is not guiltless. Our guilt may not be as great as the guilt of the Nazis or the Communists, but we must face it. One desecrated synagogue in America is one too many. One flaming cross is one too many. One citizen denied his right to vote because of his color, or for any other reason, is one too many.

The Commonweal puts it this way:

That the Germans are reluctant to accept this horrible burden of guilt is easy to understand. What they cannot bear to look at is a vision of evil which is and must be terrifying. We, too, the non-German peoples of the Western World, have not been eager to look upon it. With our own share of guilt, we have not been eager to examine the obscene thing that was Nazism and ask ourselves how it could come about, among people who read the same books, listen to the same music, went to the same churches, shared with us what we are proud to call the heritage of Western culture.

Mr. President, I commend to my colleagues in this Chamber the editorial, "The Specter of Nazism," which appeared in the January 15, 1960, number of the Commonweal, and I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD at this point as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Commonweal, Jan. 15, 1960]

THE SPECTER OF NAZISM

The eruptions of anti-Semitism in Western Germany can no longer be described as isolated and inconsequential. Unfortunate incidents—caused by irresponsible anti-Semitic elements—demand, perhaps, no more response than the regret and embarrassment which have been expressed over such episodes in the past. But regret and embarrassment are not adequate responses to the evil thing which is now revealed.

Beginning, cruelly, on Christmas Eve, the fever of hatred against Jews flared up first in Cologne, then spread to Berlin, to Nuremberg, to other West German communities; it broke out later in Vienna, in London, in Glasgow, in New York. Its foulness may well be rising to the surface in other places even as these words are being written. What is worse, the official declarations of Chancellor Adenauer's government reveal the familar reluctance to take hold of a painful fact, the familiar expressions of righteousness and virtue, the familiar recourse to charges of anti-Germanism and falsehood on the part of those who speak or write of what is happening in Germany. Even in this country, the outbursts of anti-Semitism in West Germany have been deplored in some quarters chiefly because they make for bad public relations and political problems for an important ally in the cold war against communism.

Anti-Semitism in West Germany, it has been said, is no more significant than anti-Semitism anywhere else, and any relation between anti-Semitic outbreaks in West Germany and a resurgence of Nazism there is angrily denied. Nazism is dead, say the Germans, and need not be referred to.

Unfortunately, neither of these statements is true. Even when it is shameful and frightening, history cannot be denied. That 5 million Jews were murdered by the government of a highly cultured European Christian people is a monstrous, hideous fact, for them and for the rest of the world. That nazism is quite dead becomes every day an increasingly dubious judgment; but, even if it were quite dead, it would still need to be referred to.

Perhaps this is why the evil of anti-Semitism still hangs over our heads: that it has not really been faced. One commentator on the question of anti-Semitism in West Germany reminded his readers of the record-breaking crowds of West Germans who sat stunned through performances of "The Diary of Anne Frank." He did not remind his readers that many of those who were deeply moved by the play nonetheless declared, "I don't believe it." And it has been reported over and over that West German history texts have solved the problems raised by Hitler and World War II by ignoring them. A recent poll of German youth showed an astonishing number who knew (or would admit) of Hitler only that he reduced unemployment, improved roads, accomplished much for Germany, etc. Some half-dozen years ago, a survey taken by the U.S. High Commissioner's Office in Bonn revealed even then that anti-Semitism in West Germany was growing, not declining. A majority of the Germans polled at that time believed that Germans need not feel guilty for what was done to Jews under the Third Reich and need not feel responsible for it.

That Germans are reluctant to accept this horrible burden of guilt is easy to understand. What they cannot bear to look at is a vision of evil which is and must be terrifying. We too, the non-German peoples of the Western World, have not been eager to look upon it. With our own share of guilt, we have not been eager to examine the obscene thing that was nazism and ask ourselves how it could come about, among people who read the same books, listened to the same music, went to the same churches, shared with us what we are proud to call the heritage of Western culture.

Thus, over the years, the poisonous complicity in the pretense that the gas ovens—and worse—were like a bad dream, to be thrust from our minds quickly lest it spoil our waking mood. Thus, over the years, the gradual embracing of a "practical" policy toward West Germany, a policy determined largely by fear of Communism and characterized largely by a "forgive and forget" attitude toward the monstrousness of the Hitler era.

There can be no question of forgiving, of course. It is not for us to forgive. But it is perilous for us to forget. We must remember, as we have not remembered, and so must the German people, as they have not. For only if we admit its existence can we hope to exorcise the evil which took such hold of men. What happened in those terrible decades? How did it happen? Why? These are the questions we must face, German and non-German alike, not for the sake of blame and accusation, but to save ourselves now.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am sure that each and every one of us is deeply concerned about these manifestations of bigotry and intolerance. I hope that in every word we utter, in every action of our Nation, of our communities, and of our people as individuals, we will demonstrate our belief in human equality and our respect for peoples of different races, colors, and creeds. I hope that we will always adhere to the great spiritual principle of the fatherhood of God and of brotherhood of man, and recognize that only in the belief in such principle and the practice thereof is there any chance whatsoever for this great Nation, the United States, to be a world leader, and to be worthy of the respect, trust, and confidence of peoples throughout the world.

THE PRESIDENT'S ECONOMIC REPORT

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to comment on the Economic Report of the President, which has been presented to Congress. This report is more significant for what it fails to say than for what it does say. It glosses over the fact that our economy has since 1956 been virtually standing still.

That is a fact which requires some thoughtful consideration. At a time when we are facing the most unbelievable competition our Nation has ever been confronted with, we find ourselves with an economy which has been limping along, at times stagnant, and all too often out of balance. This is no way for a great free society to challenge the Communist monolithic disciplined, socialist society. It will require more than that if we are to maintain our leadership and our strength.

It is always reassuring to get good news and promises of improvements in our economy, but the American people are entitled to get the hard facts—that our economic growth rate is lagging far behind our capacity for growth—that we are in danger of falling behind the Soviet Union in military and economic power if we continue to let our economy limp along the way it is going.

I might add that the policies of the Government have a great deal to do with the tempo of economic progress or retreat. The policies which have been pursued by the administration, of tight money, high interest rates, hard dollars, tight credit, and failure to effectively enforce the antitrust laws and to promote truly competitive enterprise, have taken their toll.

The fact of the matter is that the United States of America, the richest nation, to be sure, on the face of the earth, has had the lowest rate of economic growth since 1952 of any of the industrialized Western nations; further than that, the lowest of any of the industrialized nations; less than Japan, less than France, less than England, less than Western Germany, less than the Scandinavian countries, less than Belgium and Holland and Italy, and far less, in terms of rate of growth, than the Soviet Union.

I do not really believe that that is a record to be proud of. We have witnessed in recent years a Nation literally having its position of prestige and power and influence eroded away.

I know that only recently the eminent columnist, Walter Lippmann, wrote a column which told this story in the most graphic and meaningful words. He said, in fact, that the President had been presiding over the liquidation of the great power and prestige and influence of the United States in this troubled world. Those are hard words, but I believe I properly paraphrase what Mr. Lippmann said earlier this week. I shall put into the RECORD in a moment, and bring to the attention of the Senate, a second item from this distinguished journalist, columnist, educator, and teacher.

We need to distinguish between the healthy growth of economic muscle and the flabby bloat of inflation.

I have the feeling that sometimes when administration spokesmen refer to the prosperity we enjoy, they are really thinking about a kind of economic biliousness, rather than true economic muscle and economic fiber and bone, which really represent economic strength.

Per capita income in constant dollars has shown virtually no improvement. Farm income actually dropped over $2 billion in the past year alone; the level of unemployment has been rising to higher plateaus—to over 5 percent of the working force at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LONG of Louisiana in the chair). Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes; I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has just stated that the per capita income in constant dollars has shown virtually no improvement. Is he referring to this year as compared with last year, or to a longer period?

Mr. HUMPHREY. To a longer period.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What period?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I am referring to the years since 1955. I refer, I respectfully say to the Senator from Louisiana, the Presiding Officer, to constant dollars. I am not talking about the dollar figure, but the purchasing power of that dollar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator recognizes the fact that during that same period of time interest rates have increased to the tune of about $18 billion, he can add to his statement that the per capita income for 90 percent of the people has actually declined.

Mr. HUMPHREY. The Senator's observations are, as usual, very meaningful. I know of no man in the Senate who has done a better job of discussing the fiscal policies of this Government presently being pursued than has the distinguished junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]. The preceding Presiding Officer, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] likewise from time to time has given us the benefit of his opinion and advice on fiscal policy.

Both of these distinguished Senators are members of the Committee on Finance, in which the Senators have an opportunity to study these matters, not in theory, but in practice.

I have not attempted to become an expert in matters of fiscal policy, but I have learned a great deal from the observations of my colleagues. What I have observed and what I have learned has been anything but heartening in terms of the future well-being of this Nation.

I may say to the Presiding Officer that since 1955 the average weekly earnings in constant dollars have risen only 1 percent a year, while consumer prices have increased almost 15 percent.

Interest rates, to which the Presiding Officer has referred, and which determine the cost of buying a home or automobile, and are a very significant factor in every budget, have reached the highest level in 30 years. Every consumer, every taxpayer, is paying more because of this administration's tight money policies.

I hope the Senator from Louisiana, the Presiding Officer, and some of his distinguished colleagues on the Committee on Finance will give us again the benefit of their intensive study of these matters relating to interest rates and fiscal and monetary policy. This is a subject matter that needs to be aired and discussed day after day in the Senate.

I am not one of those who believe that interest rates can be static. I am not one of those who believe that we can ignore the forces in the market—demand and supply and pressures on money—but I am one who believes that the Government of the United States, through the policies it pursues affects interest rates, and can either lower them or increase them. The policy of the Government has been to increase them under the notion that by increasing interest rates it could reduce so-called inflation, when one of the largest items in the inflationary bloat of this country—and I repeat, inflationary bloat—is the interest rate factor itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Minnesota would look at the level of interest rates under 20 years of Democratic administration, he would find that during those 20 years the average on new issues of the Federal Government was approximately 1.7 percent. The average on new issues this year will exceed 4.5 percent. In fact, it might go over 5 percent. That is almost three times the average interest rate which existed under 20 years of Democratic administrations. Of course, it will require three times as much tax money to carry the national debt at that high rate.

Mr. HUMPHREY. In 20 years of Democratic administrations we passed through depression and war and peace and expansion. I should like to add further that interest rates are generally a reflection of the confidence of the money market in the policies of the Government and the general health of the economy. When that confidence seems to be slackening or weakening, the rates go up. It has always been somewhat of a paradox to me that those who manage the money of this country can say, "Vote Republican," and then, after they have said that, proceed to insist upon interest rates upon money which obviously reflect a great element of risk.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I shall be glad to yield in a minute. I wish also to add that the Senator from Louisiana may recall that in 1953 we had a Secretary of the Treasury by the name of George Humphrey. George Humphrey gained national fame because he was advocating refinancing the public debt on long-term issues, 30-year bonds. The Senator may recall that at that time the interest rates on those bonds was about 3¼ percent. That was a new high for long-term bonds. Long-term bonds always have a higher rate of interest than short-term bonds.

Nevertheless, only a few weeks ago 181-day notes, that is, a 6 months issue, sold in the market for 5.106, or a little over 5 percent, for 6 months notes, or 181 day notes.

What a far cry this is from the so-called high interest rate that Mr. George Humphrey was talking about in 1953. Then there was concern in the country. I remember that Business Week magazine published an article to the effect that it was all right to slow down the economy, but we must not slam on the brakes and throw ourselves through the windshield. That was at 3¼ percent, Mr. President. I must add that not only have the brakes been slammed on, but the car has been shifted into reverse, at a 5.1 percent interest rate on 181-day notes.

I shall simply complete this statement, and then yield, if I may, to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BUSH] who always enjoys these discussions, and represents so brilliantly the conservative policies pursued by the administration, the high interest policies which have become the coat-of-arms of the current Republican administration and, I gather, the promise of the future, if the year 1961 should continue these policies of no go, go slow, not now, and veto. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, as I have said, interest rates determine the cost of buying a home or an automobile. They are a significant factor in any budget. Every consumer, every taxpayer, every investor, every producer, is paying more because of this administration's tight money policies.

The distinguished columnist, Mr. Walter Lippmann, a most perceptive analyst of our national policies, has again accurately pinpointed the dangers of the complacency which appeared in the President's Economic Report.

Mr. Lippmann foresees a rise in the world power of the Soviet Union and a corresponding decline in the power of the United States. He says:

> I think the President's satisfaction with our situation is based on a short and a small view of the historic competition in which we are challenged.

This is exactly my criticism of the state of the Union message, the budget message, and the economic report.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Lippmann's thoughtful article, which was published in today's Washington Post and Times Herald, be printed at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Jan. 21, 1960]

A SATISFIED NATION

(By Walter Lippmann)

With the economic report which has just been transmitted to Congress, the President has completed what was begun in the address on the state of the Union and the message accompanying the budget. He has described our situation as he sees it. He has outlined his program. And he has sketched in his general ideas. All is well in that the Government will ask nothing more of the people, and there is a prospect that it will ask less.

For it is the President's view that the country is secure. It is prosperous. And, insofar as it is challenged by the rise of the Soviet Union, the country can rest assured and tranquil that because of our devotion to individual liberty we are destined to win the competition.

Is all this self-satisfaction justified? Are we entitled to do what these three messages unite in telling us to do? Are we entitled to concentrate our energies on our private affairs, confident that our national interests are secure and well taken care of? For myself, I do not think so. I think the President's satisfaction with our situation is based on a short and a small view of the historic competition in which we are challenged.

His view of the Soviet challenge is short and small because he does not distinguish between private prosperity, measured in the total production of goods and services for private use, and national power, which is measured not only in terms of armaments but also in terms of wealth directed to education, to public health, to the conservation and development of the natural and the manmade resources of this country.

What is happening is that under the leadership of the President we are promoting private prosperity at the expense of national power. As a result, the influence of the United States as a world power is declining. That is why a growing number among us do not share the President's satisfaction and are worried about the future.

Given our situation in the world today, these three messages betray a dangerous complacency. This complacency derives from the deep fallacy of believing that in an era of cold war it should be the policy of the National Government "to reduce the share of the national income which is spent by the Government." This fallacy can best be understood in the light of some testimony given a year ago by the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers. "As I understand an economy," he said, "its ultimate purpose is to produce more consumer goods. This is the object of everything we are working at: To produce things for consumers."

Then the chairman went on to say that "if you take total gross national production, you find that growth in recent years has lagged. But if you look at consumption—the thing which, as I say, I regard myself as being commissioned to maximize—you find that we are doing better."

There precisely is the root of our trouble. Our goal is to maximize consumption. That is a very low national goal, and altogether unworthy of a great Nation which has a great part to play in human affairs. The object of our economy is not to become fat with consumer goods. It is to use the wealth and the power which the economy can produce to support the national purposes which we so frequently proclaim. There is nothing very convincing or inspiring in loving our "liberty" to enjoy consumer goods so much that we cannot afford to educate our children. If we really believe in the ideals and the spiritual aims about which so much is said, we have something else to do besides maximizing the enjoyment of consumer goods.

The most vocal criticism of the current official satisfaction has come from those who believe that we are falling behind in the race of armaments. To this criticism the new Secretary of Defense, Mr. Gates, and the Chiefs of Staff are now replying. They are replying to the critics who have oversimplified and overdramatized the situation and are arguing that within a few years the Soviet Union will be able to devastate and knock out this country.

There is no reason to doubt that the administration is right when it replies that the Soviet Union does not have and is not likely to achieve such military supremacy over us that an all-out attack would be undertaken. But Mr. Gates is dealing with a strawman. The soberer criticism is much more formidable. It prophesies no catastrophe. But it says that the rate of the rise of Soviet military capacity in conventional as well as nuclear capability appears to be greater than our own, and that the Soviet Union appears to be administering more efficiently than we do the resources of the new and revolutionary military technology.

That does not portend doomsday in 1963. But it does portend a rise in the world power of the Soviet Union and a corresponding decline of our own. No doubt that will not worry us too much if we can keep our minds fixed on consumer goods.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut for whatever purpose he may desire.

Mr. BUSH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Minnesota very much. First, I am sorry to see him in such an unhappy frame of mind on the state of the Nation's economy, which is bursting at the seams in a new boom which is hard to control. Nevertheless, I sympathize with the Senator for feeling so unhappy about it.

He made two statements to which I should like to direct his attention. First, he said that the low interest rates which obtained during the 20 years of his party's administration reflected confidence in the Government, and that the high interest rates which seem to have obtained in recent years reflect the opposite. I may say to the Senator that interest rates over the years do not reflect confidence in the Government or a lack of confidence in the Government. They do reflect confidence in the economy of the country and reflect demand for money, which is generated by confidence in the country. Since confidence in the country and the whole economy has been at a very high level in recent years, interest rates have been mounting because of the competition for money in the money market. Just as in other markets, when competition for a product or a commodity is in great demand, the price goes up.

The Senator directed attention to a recent offer of the U.S. Government when he said that the Government paid 5.106 percent for money for a given number of days—105 days, I believe.

Mr. HUMPHREY. One hundred and eighty-one days.

Mr. BUSH. It was 101 days. It was obviously a short-term loan, for a third of a year or less.

It is pretty hard for anyone who has studied the question of Government financing or corporate financing, or any other kind of financing, to escape the conclusion that the only reason why the Government had to pay 5.1 percent for the money was that that was the going rate for short-term money at that time.

If Congress had done what it had an opportunity to do—and I hope may yet do within the next few weeks—namely, raise the interest rate ceiling so that the Government could finance itself on a long-term basis, then the Government would be taken out of the short-term money market, into which it has been forced by the action of Congress. That is why the short-term money market has gone up. But I say that long-term money would normally bring higher prices than short-term money. However, the reason why it does not is the arbitrary refusal by Congress to let the money market seek its normal level. This, I assert, is strongly adverse to the best interests of the United States.

The Senator is a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations. He is a very able member, for whose views on many things I have great respect, as he knows. But when the International Monetary Fund had its meeting in Washington last September, and the representatives of the International Bank from 68 countries gathered for their annual meeting, there was one thing which absolutely appalled the representatives and the finance ministers who were here from other countries, and the heads of the Central Bank, and that was the refusal by Congress to lift the interest rate ceiling, so that the U.S. Government could be put in the position of doing exactly the very thing which the Senator from Minnesota wants it to do, namely, to pay a reasonable rate of interest for its money. The refusal by Congress to do what every one of those representatives from the 68 countries thought was the normal thing to do was the subject of constant conversation during the period those delegates were here from all over the world.

The result of that, I may say to my able friend, has been to shake, somewhat, the confidence of the financial leaders of those 68 free countries in the credit of the Government of the United States. This is something about which to be concerned, under modern conditions, when our national defense structure and the defense structure of the entire free world depend very heavily upon the credit of the Government of the United States.

I venture to hope that the Senator's party will relent in the position it has taken and will not interfere with the normal management of the Federal debt, but will give the Treasury a chance to use both hands and all the facilities which it should have at its disposal to do this properly, and thus eliminate the inflationary effects inherent in the Government financing its obligations entirely on a short-term basis.

I thank the Senator from Minnesota for giving me this opportunity to make these observations.

Mr. HUMPHREY. I may say to the distinguished Senator from Connecticut that I certainly did want him to make his observations. As he knows, I have a very high regard for his views. I believe the matter of fiscal and monetary policy is something which requires the discussion and debate which we give to it. I hope we may continue such discussions in an enlightened, unimpassioned, unemotional manner, because this is a very serious matter.

I have said, quite frankly, that I recognize that the interest rate cannot be a static thing. I understand that. I have said, secondly, that I felt the Committee on Finance was equipped by background, training, staff, and constant dealing and working with this problem, to give us some pretty good advice on the matter. As I recall, that committee has not recommended favorably the lifting of the interest rate ceiling.

There are good, solid arguments around that question, and the distinguished senior Senator from Connecticut has always been a brilliant advocate for his point of view.

I toss this thought out for the purpose of our discussion. My concern leads me to these thoughts: Back in 1953, supposedly, a new policy relating to the financing of the public debt was inaugurated. It is fair to say, I think, that there was no difficulty prior to 1953 in financing the Federal Government. To be sure, there were deficits, but not so many as we have had since 1953, for the comparable period of 7 years.

To be sure, there were heavy pressures on the country; in fact, I can remember very well the campaign of 1952, in which we were told that we had to stop inflation, that we had to put the brakes on.

There has been as much inflation since 1952 as there was from 1949 to 1952, if not more, despite the Korean war. We were under tremendous pressure after World War II with unmet needs, with pent-up savings, which were bursting loose to get into the market for production, distribution, and consumption. It was necessary to rearm the country and to start a foreign aid program. It was necessary to inaugurate the NATO alliance, under which the United States supplied vast amounts of military assistance. We had to fight a war in Korea and to rebuild industries; and we did it at much less cost to the Government, in terms of the rent on money—which is what interest is—than we are doing it through the so-called period of peace and prosperity.

Mr. President, I am saying that if we have peace and prosperity, the financial condition of the country should reflect it.

I do not want the interpretation the Senator from Connecticut made to remain unchallenged.

I did not say that interest rates reflect only the confidence in the Government. I said it alleged and it is stated that interest rates do in part reflect the confidence of the business community and the financial community in the economy and in the policies being pursued by the Government.

Anyone who is a student of international finance knows that in countries where the government is unstable and where the policies being pursued violate all the laws of economics, the bankers and the other groups who are responsible for the management of money charge higher interest rates, in order to take into consideration the increased risks. I understand that, and I am not critical of it.

I am simply saying that a number of paradoxes exist in this case. Our Nation seems to be enjoying a boom, as the Senator from Connecticut has said; yet almost 4 million, or 5 percent, of the working force is unemployed, and our agricultural industry is in the worst depression it has ever experienced since the 1930's. There has been a $2 billion drop in net farm income this year; and in the country there are large numbers of depressed areas.

Let me say to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH] that when I was in his State this year, as one of his many friends, and in the presence of both the senior Senator from West Virginia and the junior Senator from West Virginia, I witnessed the depressed areas and the unemployment in that great State.

I have seen similar conditions in northern Minnesota; in Michigan; in Wichita, Kans.; and in other places.

Mr. President, where is the "unprecedented boom"? The "unprecedented boom" has occurred in the interest rates and in the prices of certain stocks. Of course, under those circumstances, when the persons who buy Government certificates and notes know that if they hold out longer they will be paid higher interest rates, they do hold out, and the interest rates rise and rise.

It is an accepted fact that long-term financing costs more than short-term financing. If short-term financing costs 5 percent, I ask anyone what long-term financing would cost. Long-term financnig has to take into consideration the gyrations of the economy over a long period of time and the drying up of the supply of money for a long period of time. I am not complaining about the fact that long-term financing generally requires higher interest rates, because that is one of the economic facts of life.

All I am saying is that if short-term financing can command 4 percent interest on 90-day bills or notes, which are so current that they are almost like dollar bills, and if 5 percent interest must be paid on 180-day notes, how much interest does any reasonable person think would be required on 30-year bonds? Surely the interest on them would not be less.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANDOLPH in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. HUMPHREY. I yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It may be of interest for me to point out who will reap the harvest if we continue the present high interest rates. If the average interest rate is doubled, a person who lends his own money will have his income doubled. But if that person owns an insurance company and sells insurance policies based on the theory that Government bonds will pay approximately 1.7 percent interest, if the rate on Government bonds increases to 5 percent, that person's net income will be increased by much more than 100 percent; it may well be increased by 1,000 percent; and that man will be able to keep all of the increase.

An insurance policy is sold on the theory that the premium payments will be invested in Government bonds and other securities. When the person whose life is insured dies, the insurance company will get the benefit of any increase in the interest rate over the rate on which the policy was based. If the interest rate on invested money rises, for instance, from 1.7 percent to 5 percent, the income of the owner of the insurance company could be increased by more than a thousand of percentage points.

Similarly, when a bank makes a loan, it is lending money on much of which it is paying no interest at all, while paying a relatively small interest rate on the savings accounts of its depositors, and charging a higher rate of interest on the loans it makes. If the interest rate rises, the result is to increase the bank's income; and the bank will enjoy that increased income as a result of the loans it makes with money which belongs to its depositors; yet the expenses of the bank will not have increased, and the bank will enjoy that increased income even though it does not provide additional services for checking account customers and is only obliged to give back a portion of the increase to savings account customers.

Under such circumstances, and particularly when the interest rate on Government bonds increases in the way it has under this administration, certainly the net income of such banks should increase by much more than 100 percent.

Some banks have been engaged in a process of dumping old, long-term bonds, and purchasing other bonds to keep down their tax liabilities on profits. This tends to prevent the full increase in bank profits from showing this, some due to these fictitious losses, but the huge profits exist nevertheless.

Now the administration seeks to saddle that additional debt or the enormous burden of these high-interest rates on the people of the country for a full generation by putting the national debt on a long-term basis before the coming election.

Some people think the large businesses are paying much of the burden of the higher interest rates, when they borrow money. But let us keep in mind the fact that they pass on that burden to the consuming public, in the price of their product which they sell. So that burden of higher interest rates paid by big business is actually borne by the consumers who purchase automobiles, washing machines, deep freezes, homes, or other commodities.

In the case of one who is about to purchase a home, an increase of 3 percentage points in the cost of money or the interest rate on borrowed money means that the cost of the monthly payments on the mortgage on that man's home will have increased by approximately 30 percent. As a result, that increased burden must be borne, not only by all those who purchase homes, but also by all those who rent houses, because under those circumstances the owners of the houses have to charge more rent to the tenants.

The average family pays approximately 25 percent of its income for rent. Certainly the average family in the lower income brackets does. When the rents they pay or when the cost of purchasing homes are increased by 30 percent—for which increase they do not receive any additional services—the eventual result is an increase of approximately 6 percent in the cost of living for those families, in addition to rewarding the insurance companies and the banks for their success in having a Republican in the White House.

It has been stated that it would be irresponsible not to raise the ceiling on the interest rate on Government bonds. Yet during the 20 years of the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt and Harry S. Truman, the President used his influence to hold down the average interest rate on new issues of Government bonds to an average of 1.7 percent. On the other hand, with the present administration in office, President Eisenhower has apparently permitted those on Wall Street to raise the interest rates as much as they want to do it; and now an attempt is being made to change the ceiling on the interest rate on Government bonds and permit the increased rate to apply to the long-term Government indebtedness, so the public can be hooked for the next 30 years by this high interest rate program, even though President Eisenhower will be in office for only another year.

So far as I am concerned, I will oppose applying higher interest rates to the long-term Government indebtedness, because I am satisfied that the first Democratic President who enters the White House, following the administration of President Eisenhower will reverse that policy.

The saddling on the public, for the next 30 years, with the proposed higher interest rates cannot be done unless we Democrats permit the Republicans to get away with it.

I am not particularly worried about inflation, unless it does harm to someone or hurts our country. If inflation to the extent of 5 percent were to result in a 10 percent increase in incomes—in other words, a net increase of 5 percent over and above the amount of the inflation—I would be willing to accept inflation to that extent, or a 5 percent increase in the cost of living; and my guess it that then we would be able to provide for larger social security payments and larger welfare payments, and the people would be better off after the proper adjustments had been made. But, on the other hand, if we are going to have inflation without increasing the income of the people over and above the inflation, then I am opposed to it.

In accordance with the Senator's testimony today, I was surprised to find out that in the last 4 years there has been no net increase in the income of the people, unless one wants to count the inflation itself.

Mr. HUMPHREY. That is correct.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. If that is the case, it is a sad thing indeed to have inflation, but not an increase in the amount of income by more than the amount of the inflation. That is a sad condition, I regret to learn.

While I cannot agree with my Republican friends about this matter, I do feel that both sides of the issue should be presented, and I feel the public has a right to vote on it. We should not mislead the public. The public should know that the rank-and-file American today is worse off than he was 4 years ago, on an average, because the American citizens have had imposed upon them a hidden tax in terms of high interest cost. That burden has shifted tens of billions of dollars of income from those best able to pay to those least able to pay. It has been a redistribution of wealth in favor of the rich and against the poor.

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is one of the most articulate and brilliant spokesmen in this body on this matter, relating to the economic, monetary, and fiscal policies of our Government. I have marveled many times at his grasp of the complexities of these monetary and economic questions and their relevancy to the total economy and justice and well-being of the people.

It is not unusual for me to compliment him on this occasion, because I have done so in the past. We have had disagreements on other matters, but on this question it is a joy always to hear his remarks, and it is an educational experience for the Senate and the American people to have him speak as he does.

Mr. President, I do hope, as the Senator from Louisiana has indicated, that this Congress will not be bludgeoned or frightened into making some change of policy on interest rate ceilings until we have had a chance for a national referendum; namely, an election, because the American people are going to be exposed to an articulate, intelligent, informed, and exacting discussion of what I think is the No. 1 weakness or liability of the Republican administration—its fiscal, monetary, and tax policies.

I have been asked many times what is the issue in this campaign. The Senator from Louisiana has stated it persuasively, brilliantly, and with great vigor. The issue in this campaign is the fiscal and financial and economic policies of our Government as relates between the two political parties and their spokesmen.

I might add, Mr. President, that of all the groups in America that have suffered because of the current economic policies, it is the small businessman on Main Street who is the man least able, in competition with Government and big business, to get hold of the necessary money for the improvement of his plant, for the financing of his programs, and for the management of his capital structure. The independent, small businessman in America has literally been put through the fiscal wringer. Many times he has been able to survive only out of sheer dint of effort, individual capacity, families working together, unbelievable effort extended. But he has not had a fair shake. He has not been given an even break. Every Member of the Senate who has traveled around this country and in his own respective State knows that when an independent businessman seeks to borrow, he pays a higher rate than does the big company that may be in competition with him. He is looked upon as having less collateral, in the main. He is looked upon as being more of a risk, and therefore pays a higher rate.

The same thing is true, may I add, of the thousands and thousands of farmers. There has been an increase in rates on commodity credit loans, on personal and property loans. Now there is even a desire by the administration to raise the REA interest rates. May I add that will be a hope unfulfilled, an exercise in futility, because I cannot imagine that the Congress of the United States will raise interest rates for rural electric cooperatives, when those cooperatives are nonprofit institutions operated only for the benefit of their members and the economic growth of the communities they serve. It would be a foul blow indeed if the interest rates of those cooperatives were increased to such proportions as to jeopardize their financial and fiscal structure.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. May I raise the parliamentary inquiry of the Chair as to what is the business before the Senate at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In response to the inquiry of the Senator from New York, the Chair will state that the question is on agreeing to the amendments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] designated as "1-13-60—E," which would be the inserting of substitutes for certain parts of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Of the so-called clean elections bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. I thank the Senator.

HAS AMERICA LOST ITS WAY?

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on Sunday, December 27, 1959, there appeared in the editorial section of the Denver Post a long, critical survey of this past decade by Lawrence G. Weiss, a Post editorial writer. He asks in the title, "Has America Lost the Way?" and sums up the essay as an appraisal of the national mood in the decade of the 1950's.

I would especially like to call the attention of this body to the last paragraphs of Mr. Weiss' essay. After reviewing the actions of the past decade, he suggests as our national purpose for the 1960's:

First, to take up once again, with new energy and dedication, the task of building the Nation. That will mean clearing our slums, revitalizing our cities, improving our schools, developing our resources, strengthening our defenses, providing more adequately for our aged and sick, enriching our culture, and enlarging our efforts to secure equal rights for minorities and a fuller measure of freedom.

Second, to carry some portion of the American promise into the world community of nations, particularly into the underdeveloped areas. That will mean recognizing that the world cannot go on for very much longer half starving and half overfed and that the surging populations in the "have not" nations, unless helped, will someday threaten the "haves." It will mean sharing our resources and knowledge more fully than ever before and infusing a greater measure of idealism into our foreign policy.

He emphasizes that one of the tasks of leadership in the coming years will be to awaken the American people to these purposes, and fire their imagination to accomplish them.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Denver Post, Dec. 27, 1959]

HAS AMERICA LOST THE WAY?—AN APPRAISAL OF THE NATIONAL MOOD IN THE DECADE OF THE 1950'S

(By Lawrence G. Weiss)

In the jubilant springtime at the end of the American Revolution, the Patriot Thomas Paine saw more openings for happiness in the new American Nation than in any other nation in history.

"Her setting out in life, like the rising of a fair morning, was unclouded and promising," he wrote.

"Her cause was good. Her principles just and liberal. Her temper serene and firm * * * and everything about her wore the mark of honor."

In the same flush of pride and enthusiasm, President Thomas Jefferson spoke of the new America in his first inaugural, as "a rising nation, spread over a wide and fruitful land * * * advancing rapidly to destinies beyond the reach of mortal eye."

Paine and Jefferson—and Lewis and Clark watching the buffalo from the banks of the mighty Missouri—were beginning to define the ingredients of the American promise.

The new Nation, as they conceived it, offered a fuller measure of freedom, a greater opportunity for satisfaction and well-being, and a richer supply of space, beauty, joy and excitement than any other nation on earth.

They saw America as something special, a nation marked by destiny for greatness. And they sought to raise a standard here of freedom and enlightened idealism that all mankind might follow.

Their optimism about the future of America has become a part of the American character through the whole course of our history.

Except for rare periods, this has been a hopeful and confident nation, sure of its powers, unwavering in its sense of direction, unafraid of what lies ahead.

"The American people never carry an umbrella," said the late New York Gov. Alfred E. Smith. "They prepare to walk in eternal sunshine."

In the evolution of American self-confidence, the 10-year period that ends at midnight next Thursday may prove to be a significant turning point.

The decade of the 1950's—whatever else may be said about it—has plainly not been a period when this Nation was sure of itself.

This has been the wealthiest decade in American history.

Our people have made more money and bought more things, for cash and credit, than any other people anywhere.

The American promise—insofar as it involves material gain and political freedom—has been fulfilled in this decade to a remarkable degree.

But the 1950's have still been a time of doubt and uncertainty.

A sense of uneasiness and fear has begun to afflict the American spirit.

"In the late fifties," writes the historian, Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., "one senses a spreading anxiety and frustration in our society; a confused, inchoate feeling that things aren't going right."

The diplomat, George Kennan, finds Americans in the 1950's to be "not a bad people or a weak one or even a consciously unhappy one, but an endangered one."

We are, he says, "a people in danger, at least partially, of becoming sluggish intellectually, underdeveloped emotionally * * * filled with an inner restlessness and dissatisfaction, incapable of integrating our full strength * * * dull and uninteresting to others and * * * not terribly interesting to ourselves."

Secretary of State Christian A. Herter considers the people to be "too much absorbed in the mere enjoyment of a prosperous life."

A U.S. Senator, returning from an exploration at the "grassroots," finds that the people "have lost confidence in their Government," are "wrapped up in their own selfish concerns."

"All they care about is cutting taxes," he says. "Many are making more money than they ever did in their lives, but they want to spend it on themselves, not on schools and highways and urban renewal. They are cynical and disillusioned."

The dramatist Arthur Miller writes of a deep moral uneasiness among us, the vast sense of being only tenuously joined to the rest of our fellows.

The economist John K. Galbraith says the concern of the people with luxuries and gadgets in an affluent society has made them callous to the public needs of the community and the Nation.

New national types—the organization man, the man in the gray flannel suit, the commuter, the status seeker, the exurbanite, the other-directed man—are described by writers as products of the tensions of our times.

"The cities of America," says James Reston, of the New York Times, "are full of self-questioning. The pulpits ring with the old incessant questions: Where are we going? What is the purpose of our society?"

Most of the commentators on the national mood detect the absence of a national purpose, the lack of a sense of direction to give cohesion and meaning to American life.

In the decade of the 1940's the national purpose was to win the war and lay the foundation for a fair and durable peace.

In the decade of the 1930's the national purpose was to conquer the depression and raise the living standards of the Nation.

But in the decade of the 1950's, no single, dominant objective captured the attention and the effort of the people.

There are signs at the end of the decade that a new sense of purpose may now be starting to evolve.

"One feels," writes Schlesinger, "that increasing numbers are waiting for a trumpet to sound."

But if the 1960's bring a resurgence of the American spirit—as some thoughtful observers anticipate—it will come in large measure as a reaction to the aimlessness of the last 10 years.

What were the origins of the mood of the 1950's? What were the factors that weakened the traditional American sense of self-confidence and obscured our national purpose?

The major factors appear to be these:

1. THE DANGER OF NUCLEAR ANNIHILATION

On the eve of the 1950's came an announcement by President Truman that Russia had exploded her first atomic bomb. The dream of an American A-bomb monopoly was destroyed forever.

The Nation rapidly began work on a hydrogen weapon, and achieved its first thermonuclear explosion in 1952. But the following year, Russia exploded an H-bomb, too.

Throughout the decade, Americans—in common with human beings everywhere—lived with the danger that a blunder in diplomacy, a rash decision by an irresponsible official, or even an accident could bring on a nuclear struggle that would destroy civilization.

The people were told by experts in 1958 that a nuclear attack on the United States would cause 108 million deaths in the first 60 days and make important parts of Jefferson's "wide and fruitful land" uninhabitable.

Many Americans sought to put the danger from their minds, but a dim awareness of it seemed to persist throughout the Nation. One response was expressed in the song, "Enjoy Yourself, It's Later Than You Think."

Among some, there was a revival of pacificism and a movement for a ban on nuclear testing.

In Geneva the United States began negotiations with Russia to see if a test band agreement—with proper inspection safeguards—was possible.

In 1959, disc jockeys were playing verses of Tom Lehrer:

"There will be no more misery
When the world is our rotisserie * * *
We will all go together when we go
All suffused with an incandescent glow * * *"

2. THE FIGHTING OF A WAR WE DID NOT WIN

To make clear to the Communists that they could not seize new territory through naked aggression without meeting resistance, the United States led the United Nations into the Korean war in June of 1950.

The North Korean invaders were driven back to the Yalu River. But Chinese Communist troops poured across the border and fought the United States and the United Nations to a stalemate in the vicinity of the 38th parallel.

In 1953 both sides agreed to a truce, and a substantial part of the American force was withdrawn from Korea.

In a nation that had won every war since 1812 and had come to take for granted the idea of American omnipotence, the people found the stalemate in Korea unsettling and difficult to comprehend.

They were further shocked by reports that were issued after the war on the behavior of American troops in Communist prison camps.

Some of our soldiers turned on one another, cooperated with the enemy, made no effort to resist, succumbed to Communist propaganda, and behaved with cruelty and selfishness.

A surprising number died in the camps because they lacked the will to go on living.

A secret Communist intelligence report found that "the American soldier has weak loyalty to his family, his community, his country, his religion, and to his fellow soldier. His concepts of right and wrong are hazy and ill informed. There is little knowledge or understanding, even among U.S. university graduates, of American political history and philosophy."

Taken as a whole, the Korean experience, even though many felt the United States was wise to undertake it and wise to accept a stalemate, had a disturbing effect on American self-assurance.

3. THE SOVIET VICTORY IN THE RACE TO SPACE

Into the 1950's the American people brought the notion of their country's technological supremacy. Above everything else, they felt confident the United States could not be surpassed in technological achievement.

In general, Americans tended to look on the Soviet Union as a nation of peasants, an inefficient, backward nation where scientific progress had been retarded by Communist suppression.

Yet in the fall of 1957 it was the backward Russians, and not the efficient Americans, who overcame the gravity of the earth and put the first satellite into orbit around it.

Since then, the Russians have consistently launched heavier objects than we have and sent them to greater distances.

They have landed a pennant on the moon, made the first photograph of the other side, and sent a rocket to the sun.

More significant, in terms of danger to the United States, they were able to launch their first intercontinental ballistic missile in the same year they launched their sputnik.

Presumably, they can now hit U.S. targets from bases inside the Soviet Union, and most reasonable American defense experts concede that their missile capability is substantially greater than ours.

The picture many people now have is of a Soviet missile landing on the moon precisely in time for Khrushchev's visit to the United States and a U.S. missile exploding on the launching pad.

This Nation has made many achievements in the space field and will doubtless make many more. But Americans are used to being first, not second.

They have been shocked and disturbed. But they have not made it clear whether they are willing to spend the money that is necessary to make the United States first in this field.

4. THE SUCCESSES OF NIKITA KHRUSHCHEV

With the death of Joseph Stalin in 1953, a new and less tyrannical era began to unfold inside the Soviet Union. New and less crude tactics began to appear in Soviet foreign policy. And a new and less hateful personality emerged in Nikita Khrushchev.

Khrushchev has embarked on a bold new venture in the history of Soviet policy, based on a claim that he does not plan to communize the world through the old Red techniques of revolution and war.

Instead, he has called for "peaceful coexistence" between Communist and non-Communist states.

In peaceful economic competition, he says, the superiority of the Communist system will soon be evident to the people of all nations and capitalism will be replaced.

With a new approach in his own country and in the world, Khrushchev has scored some impressive progress:

He has eliminated some of the evils of the old Stalinist regime.

He has begun to provide the Soviet people with consumer goods.

He has registered tremendous gains in production and begun to close some of the economic gap between Russia and the United States.

He has offered the world a more amiable and beguiling picture of a Communist dictator than the one presented by the formidable Stalin.

He has visited extensively in underdeveloped areas and launched programs of economic aid and technical assistance to compete with those of the United States.

He has brought his smile and homely manners to the cities of the Western democracies and convinced many hopeful men that a thaw in the cold war is imminent.

Two problems of tremendous magnitude have given Khrushchev trouble:

The first was the revolt of the Hungarian people against their Communist rulers. By resorting to bloody suppression, Khrushchev was forced to forfeit much of the good will he has built up in world opinion. His action in Hungary still keeps the suspicions of free nations everywhere alive and alert.

The second has been the problem of Communist China. The aggressive behavior of this new Red power has tended to undermine the Khrushchev peace offensive. He was apparently unable to stop the Chinese assaults on the borders of India. In company with other nations, Russia may now begin to fear the expansionist forces in the Red Chinese state.

Despite these handicaps, however, Khrushchev's efforts have been largely successful.

The effect in America has been—

To dull the sharp edge of American resistance to the Communist state.

To prove that communism may offer serious competition to capitalism as a system for promoting the rapid economic improvement of underdeveloped areas.

And to contribute to the erosion of U.S. self-confidence.

5. THE LURE OF AN AFFLUENT SOCIETY

In the 1950's, as never before, the genius of American industry exploited the miracle of American technology to produce the most dazzling array of consumer goods the world has ever seen.

In all sizes, colors, models, and shapes, our factories turned out cars and television sets, dishwashers and electric blankets, deep freezes, power mowers, and sterling silver bottle openers.

The genius of American advertising set out to sell these things to the American people, and the high employment at good pay gave the people the money to buy them.

For those who were short on cash, credit was available on easy terms.

In general, Americans succumbed to the lure. They put their money into their houses and their cars and began to shortchange their schools, their cities, and their public responsibilities.

"The family which takes its mauve and cerise, air-conditioned, power-steered, and power-braked automobile out for a tour," wrote the Economist Galbraith, "passes through cities that are badly paved, made hideous by litter, blighted buildings, billboards, and posts.

"They picnic on exquisitely packaged food from a portable icebox by a polluted stream and go on to spend the night at a park which is a menace to public health and morals."

Whether the American people have been satisfied with their new possessions, or whether they seek some deeper, less materialistic significance to life is a question not yet answered.

But some signs of discontent have been evident.

"I question," wrote George Kennan, "whether material abundance alone, as we have sought it heretofore and are rapidly coming to know it today, is really bringing us the results we hoped.

"I question whether it is making us a happier—and inwardly a richer—people."

6. THE INFLUENCE OF TELEVISION

In the 1950's, about 45 million American families owned television sets, and the experts say the average set was on more than 5 hours a day.

Americans were becoming a Nation of spectators. Many stayed indoors, missed fresh air and exercise and saw life through a glass darkly.

During the television hours, the average kindergarten child could witness enough crime, violence, terror, and depravity to have frightened even the hardiest of the early American pioneers.

And hour after hour, the television commercials pounded away at American eardrums, frequently offering the viewers what they did not need, or could not afford, or did not want or already had.

"The dominant sound in American ears today," James Reston wrote in the New York Times, "is the endless babble of commercial advertising, interlarded with Elvis Presley and the singing commercials."

The American living room became a showroom for commercial products, a marketplace where the television vendor plied his trade.

All the tricks of an ingenious profession—including occasional deception and plain dishonesty—were used to sell the American viewer in his own home in his own easy chair.

And at some points during the decade, these tricks were used to sell political candidates as well as toothpaste.

In the stream of slick salesmanship that came from the tube, the viewer found it hard to distinguish the good product from the bad. And a certain confusion about values began to develop.

There were many good, constructive TV programs—and much fair, honest advertising. But the bad aspects of television were causing serious concern at the end of the decade, and Congress was searching for remedies.

7. THE EFFECT OF CRIME AND CORRUPTION

Americans were disturbed in the decade of the 1950's not only by the rise of crime, but by the nature of the crimes committed.

The headlines told of brutal thrill killings, perverted violence, senseless vandalism, and crimes that seemed to have no explanation.

Juvenile delinquency was on the rise, and many children—especially in big cities—seemed to be growing up in an environment that made juvenile crime inevitable.

The courts and the reformatories were full of troubled children from troubled families and tough neighborhoods.

Many of their crimes—like an impressive number of crimes by adults—did not appear to be committed for personal gain.

The crime pattern seemed to be a symptom of a sick society.

Even more striking than the crime stories were the exposures of corruption and loose morality among men in the public eye.

The Kefauver committee, in 1951, not only gave most Americans their first look at big-time crooks and racketeers, but linked these men to others who held public office or enjoyed public respect.

In Washington there were scandals involving mink and vicuna coats, deepfreezes, influence peddling, conflicts of interest, and plain dishonesty.

The spotlight of congressional exposure swept on from labor leaders to businessmen, to quiz show contestants, to disc jockeys.

And in 1959, Charles Van Doren, a Columbia University instructor, whose quiz show prowess had made him a symbol of the young American intellectual, was exposed as a liar and a fraud.

A substantial strain of corruption has run through the whole course of American history, but each generation has been shocked anew when the corruption was exposed.

In the late 1950's, Americans seemed to be reacting with cynicism and disgust.

8. THE CHALLENGE TO CIVIL LIBERTIES

The two great civil liberties issues of the decade were McCarthyism and integration.

Joseph R. McCarthy, a Republican Senator from Wisconsin, became the focal point of national attention in the early 1950's when he charged that the State Department, the Army, and other areas of Government and American life harbored card-carrying members of the Communist Party.

While the Nation took time to discover that none of McCarthy's charges had ever been proved, the Senator moved from one field to another, forcing the dismissal of Government employees, browbeating witnesses before his committee, proclaiming guilt by association, disregarding the elementary principles of judicial fairness and mocking the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

By 1954, the Nation had had enough of McCarthy. He was censured by the Senate, and he died a short time later.

But in his prime McCarthy had many supporters. The fact that a large number of people were willing to back him in casting aside American principles of decency and fair procedure caused widespread alarm at home and lowered U.S. prestige abroad.

At one time, the national image included the picture of a growling demagog, backed by a hysterical mob, terrorizing the State Department, the Secretary of the Army, and a collection of Government employees who had associated with the wrong people many years before.

The image was not one that could bolster American pride and self-esteem.

On the integration front, came the decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in 1954, upholding the right of Negro schoolchildren to sit in the same public classrooms with whites.

The decision gave new substance to the American promise of equal opportunity for all and the right to the equal protection of the laws.

But the South mounted a mighty offensive against the decision and used every technique of subterfuge and evasion in order to keep from putting it into effect.

Southern leaders launched vicious and sometimes slanderous, attacks against the Court and the Justices, and spoke darkly of "interposing" the sovereignty of the State between the schools and the Federal Government.

But the bitterest opposition to the "law of the land," as the Supreme Court had expounded it, came from southern mobs with stones and sneers and from dynamiters who blew up public schools.

Mobs prevented a Negro girl from enrolling at the University of Alabama, and kept Negroes from entering some elementary and high schools.

The climax came at Little Rock, Ark., in 1957, when President Eisenhower decided to send in U.S. paratroopers to clear the way to Central High School, after the way had been blocked at the instigation of Gov. Orval Faubus.

As the decade wore on, the cause of integration made good progress in the border States, scored successes in Virginia and began a slow infiltration of the Deep South.

But the open defiance of law in some areas—and the bitterness of southern opposition to a principle that lies at the heart of the democratic tradition—left their impact on the national mood.

Throughout the world—inhabited largely by people with colored skins—pictures of the jeering mob at Little Rock were used by the Communists to prove that Americans did not really accept the ideal of equality they preached.

And at home in the United States, a good many serious men were beginning to wonder what had happened to the bright heritage of Thomas Paine and Thomas Jefferson.

Against this background of difficulty and danger, the emergence of a mood of uneasiness and doubt among the American people in the decade of the 1950's is not difficult to understand.

The wonder is that so much was accomplished and so many Americans retained their idealism and led constructive and unselfish lives.

More went to college, more to church, and more traveled abroad. More visited art museums and libraries, and attended concerts and plays.

More took part in community affairs, worked for charities, helped with youth groups, and attempted self-improvement with books and lectures.

For those who yielded to the lure of affluence and turned their backs on the needs and responsibilities of the Nation, the pressures of the last 30 years provided a certain justification.

America had lived with one crisis after another ever since the stockmarket crash of 1929, and a national weariness had set in. The capacity of many people for continuous national involvement had simply been exhausted.

But there now appear to be signs of a new stirring abroad in the land.

Some observers detect a rising dissatisfaction with purely material goals; a quest for a deeper meaning—for a new sense of national direction and a redefinition of the American promise.

After a decade of doubt and discouragement, some Americans are beginning to see the need to move forward again with the vision of Paine and Jefferson.

And the outlines of a revived national purpose are beginning to take shape in the minds of some intellectual leaders.

That purpose, as these men see it, is twofold:

First, to take up once again, with new energy and dedication, the task of building the Nation. That will mean clearing our slums, revitalizing our cities, improving our schools, developing our resources, strengthening our defenses, providing more adequately for our aged and sick, enriching our culture and enlarging our efforts to secure equal rights for minorities and a fuller measure of freedom.

Second, to carry some portion of the American promise into the world community of nations, particularly into the underdeveloped areas. That will mean recognizing that the world cannot go on for very much longer half starving and half overfed and that the surging populations in the "have not" nations, unless helped, will some day threaten the "haves." It will mean sharing our resources and knowledge more fully than ever before and infusing a greater measure of idealism into our foreign policy.

To articulate this purpose—or some other—in a way that will capture the imagination of the American people, will be one of the tasks of leadership in the decade that lies ahead.

The tone of leadership in the 1950's—with its emphasis on moderation, good will, and Government inactivity—will not be adequate for the task.

"It is not true," writes Reston of the Times, "that the American character has been debased. It responds to what it hears. It will respond again to the old echoes still heard among the hills.

"But somebody has to strike the note, clearly and steadily, and appeal to what is best in us instead of what is worst."

America, despite its troubles in the 1950's, is still potentially the mightiest nation on earth.

It has contributed more to the cause of freedom and given more generously of its treasure and substance than any other nation in history.

It may not be, as Woodrow Wilson once called it, "the only idealistic nation in the world," but no other nation has moved on the world scene with the same high purpose.

And no other nation has been able to provide so much material abundance, and so much freedom at the same time.

"I believe that we are lost here in America," wrote the novelist Thomas Wolfe in an earlier period, "but I believe we shall be found * * *.

"I think the true discovery of America is before us. I think the true fulfillment of our people, of our mighty and immortal land, is yet to come. I think the true discovery of our own democracy is still before us.

"And I think that all these things are certain as the morning, as inevitable as noon."

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL ELECTIONS ACT OF 1959

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2436) to revise the Federal election laws, to prevent corrupt practices in Federal elections, and for other purposes.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I call for the question on the pending amendments, which were discussed yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DIRKSEN and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri some questions.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, who was recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois was recognized.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator has called up the amendments designated "1–13–60—E," has he not?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is exactly correct.

Mr. CURTIS. Referring to the printed copy of the amendments, on page 2, line 1, the word "Whoever" is used. The language reads:

> Whoever, directly or indirectly, makes contributions or expenditures in an aggregate amount in excess of $10,000 during any calendar year—

And so forth. What is the meaning of the word "Whoever," in the intention of the distinguished Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HENNINGS. I will say to my able colleague, the Senator from Nebraska, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rules and Administration, I would interpret it as being susceptible of the definition contained in the laws of the United States of America, the United States Code, as it is generally referred to, Title I, "General Provisions," Chapter 1, "Rules of Construction," reading in part as follows:

> Words denoting number, gender, and so forth.
>
> In determining the meaning of any act of Congress, unless the context indicates otherwise—words importing the singular include and apply to several persons, parties, or things.
>
> The words "person" and "whoever" include corporations, companies, associations, firms, partnerships, societies, and joint stock companies, as well as individuals.

Mr. CURTIS. And it is the intention of the distinguished Senator to offer his amendment in the light of and in conformity with the existing statute?

Mr. HENNINGS. My able friend is exactly correct in that statement.

Mr. CURTIS. This language is pretty broad. It says:

> The words "person" and "whoever" include corporations, companies, associations, firms, partnerships, societies, and joint stock companies, as well as individuals.

In other words, it is an all-inclusive term. It includes all entities. I cannot think of any that are left out.

Mr. HENNINGS. It is all-inclusive; yes.

Mr. CURTIS. Would it include a labor organization?

Mr. HENNINGS. It would include any association, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. Would it include the candidate himself?

Mr. HENNINGS. It would not include the candidate himself, as relating to his own expenditures in his own campaign.

Mr. CURTIS. By what language would the candidate be excluded?

Mr. HENNINGS. One must look at provisions in another section of the bill, as well as the language of this amendment.

I have prepared a memorandum in anticipation of discussion on this subject, in response to a question last night by the able junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]. As the Senator may remember, the Senator from Tennessee raised the question a short time before the conclusion of the debate last night. There was not sufficient opportunity to respond to it because the Senate passed on to other business.

The Senator from Tennessee apparently raised a question based upon his understanding—if I correctly interpret his question—that the amendment, with its overall limitation of $10,000, applied to a candidate in his own campaign. I think the language of the amendment, taken in its entire context, is quite different from that, and it must be remembered that in other provisions of the bill there is proscribed what a candidate may spend; and, as the Senator is aware, such proscriptions are $50,000 for a Senator and $12,500 for a Representative, plus certain formulas based upon votes or registration, as the Senator is aware.

In other words, we have multiplied by five the present limits in the so-called Corrupt Practices Act, and put such limits in the bill. The proposed amendment makes it a crime to make political contributions or expenditures, directly or indirectly, in excess of $10,000 in the aggregate during any calendar year.

Mr. CURTIS. In other words, this amendment would make it a criminal offense for an individual to give $100 to, say, 101 candidates for the House of Representatives, if he chose to do so.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; the Senator is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. I invite the Senator's attention to lines 11 to 15 on page 2 of the amendment. This prohibition applies if the expenditure or contribution is made to or on behalf of any committee or other organization engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate or candidates for any such office or offices or the success of any national political party.

If that committee is engaged in furthering the candidacy of a slate of county candidates, a slate of State candidates, and several Federal candidates, a contribution to such a committee, in its full amount, would be included in determining whether or not someone had reached the limit prescribed in line 3 on page 2.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CURTIS. It is true that in lines 18 and 19 on page 2 we find this language:

> This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

I think the Senate should keep in mind that there may be many groups, including labor organizations, which may not be political committees, but they certainly come under the definition of "whoever," who will be prohibited from spending, in the entire United States, more than $10,000.

At this moment I am not stating whether that is good or bad, but I certainly believe that the Senate should be aware of the meaning of this language, because we are prescribing rather stiff penalties. Violators may be fined up to $5,000, or imprisoned for not more than 5 years.

Mr. HENNINGS. As the Senator realizes, this amendment does not apply to political committees in a State which spend more than $2,500.

Mr. CURTIS. It would not apply to them, but it would apply to all other groups. For example, is it the intent of the distinguished Senator from Missouri to prohibit COPE from spending more than $10,000 in the entire United States in a calendar year?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sorry; my attention was distracted.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the intention of the distinguished Senator from Missouri to prohibit the Committee on Political Education of the AFL–CIO, commonly referred to as COPE, from spending more than $10,000 throughout the United States in any 1 calendar year?

Mr. HENNINGS. No; according to my interpretation the provision would not so apply.

Mr. CURTIS. Why would they be exempt, and upon what premise shall we apply the provision to some and not to others?

Mr. HENNINGS. I thought I said yesterday—and I will repeat it if I failed to do so while the Senator was present—that political committees are specifically exempted by this amendment. However, a provision of the bill does limit political committees which operate in two or more States, under the formula; and intrastate committees, which fall within the definition of a political committee which would have to report, would have no ceiling on contributions or expenditures.

That was provided in the second amendment which we adopted the other day. As I understand the Senator's question—and I hope I do——

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator regard the Committee on Political Education, referred to as COPE, as a political committee?

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes; I would conclude it was a political committee—COPE, for example.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield further to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Under the bill, then, what is the limit placed upon COPE?

Mr. HENNINGS. Is the Senator discussing the limit within a State?

Mr. CURTIS. No; the overall limit.

Mr. HENNINGS. Well, COPE is a committee, as I understand, which operates in a number of States, and would therefore come within the $12½ million limit, under the formula which is provided in the bill, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CURTIS. If COPE receives its money, all of it or any part of it——

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator will find that at page 18.

Mr. CURTIS. If COPE receives its money in part or in whole from labor organizations, can it lawfully spend any money?

Mr. HENNINGS. Not if it receives money from a labor organization, as such. I believe the Taft-Hartley Act would cover the situation.

Mr. CURTIS. "As such?" What does the Senator mean by that?

Mr. HENNINGS. I shall try to elucidate that further for the Senator. A labor organization is an organization. Members of a labor organization may, of course, contribute to such organizations as the Senator has indicated, whether they be labor organizations, the National Association of Manufacturers, or chambers of commerce, and so forth.

Mr. CURTIS. But if any part of the administrative expenses, the organization expenses, for the creation and formation of COPE, comes from a labor organization—we might use the word "dues" money—can that organization lawfully make a contribution or expenditure?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know, I may say to my good friend, exactly what the bylaws and articles of incorporation of COPE provide. In fact, I have no idea.

Mr. CURTIS. I am referring to the statute.

Mr. HENNINGS. To what is the Senator's question specifically addressed? I want to be sure that I understand him and that we understand each other. I know that the Senator is getting into a matter which may be of great importance. Is he inquiring as to whether a national organization of that character is restricted to $10,000?

Mr. CURTIS. I am asking if it can lawfully make any expenditure if it is a creature of a labor organization and obtains all or part of its running expenses from dues money.

Mr. HENNINGS. As the Senator knows, the question of contributions by so-called labor organizations is well defined in the Taft-Hartley Act, and they are limited in a State at the present time, as I understand it.

Mr. CURTIS. It is my understanding that a corporation or national bank or labor organization cannot make a political contribution or expenditure. Now the Senator has told me that an organization such as COPE can spend up to $12,500,000. My question is, if COPE is a creature of a labor organization and if it receives all or part of its operating funds—which makes it possible for it to exist as an organization—from it, can it lawfully contribute to a political campaign?

Mr. HENNINGS. Is not COPE an educational political activity organization, too?

Mr. CURTIS. That claim has been made.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know enough about the internal organization of COPE to discuss it.

Mr. CURTIS. There is an abundance of evidence to indicate that they spend money to register voters, which is a very expensive thing for a candidate to do; they spend money to transport people to the polls, which again is a very expensive thing; and they make many expenditures and contributions separate and apart from a direct contribution to a candidate, which cost a great deal of money and influence elections. Therefore, calling it educational does not make it so. It is still politics. Abraham Lincoln once asked a man, "If you call a calf's tail a leg, how many legs does it have?" The man said, "Five." Abraham Lincoln said, "Oh, no; it still has only four legs. Calling a tail a leg does not make it so."

Calling COPE an educational committee, when it is employing hundreds of people and spending thousands of dollars to get people registered and to get them to vote and to get them to vote against the candidates they oppose, does not make it so. It is political activity, and its members so regard it, other people so regard it, and the candidates know it is.

In writing the clean elections bill, the distinguished Senator has spent not days and weeks, but years in the endeavor. I should like to know whether it is the intention of the distinguished Senator from Missouri to make it clear and plain that corporations and national banks and labor organizations are not to spend money to elect Federal candidates or defeat Federal candidates.

Mr. HENNINGS. Of course, my distinguished friend has spoken of some of these matters relating to an organization known as COPE, whose precise activities and purposes, I must confess, are beyond my knowledge, I do not know that it is organized solely for the purpose of bringing people to the polls and getting them to vote a certain way. I assume they probably take some position in these matters. A part of their program, as I understand, becomes a matter for determination by the courts upon the facts as to exactly what it may be. I am not prepared to say. Not knowing what its constitution and bylaws provide, I cannot specifically say, since I have not had any intimate connection with the organization. To the best of my knowledge—what does COPE mean?

Mr. CURTIS. Committee on Political Education of the AFL–CIO. The distinguished Senator from Missouri says he does not know what is provided in its constitution and bylaws. The distinguished Senator is an able lawyer. Could he write the constitution for a corporation which would result in making it lawful for that corporation to make political expenditures?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know whether I could do that or not. I might be able to do it if I were to find out all the facts relating to the corporation and what the laws of the State were.

Mr. CURTIS. Federal law is rather clear that a corporation cannot do it, that a national bank cannot do it, and that a labor organization cannot do it.

Mr. HENNINGS. The only thing I know or have been told about COPE is that it is a voluntary organization. If, as the Senator has said, it is not, that would be a matter to be determined in some other manner, not here.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose that representatives of several business corporations, by using individuals from different corporations, created a voluntary association, and that that voluntary association spent money to register people, to hold meetings, to circulate literature, to hire people to do personal work, and to take voters to the polls, but that they got their money from the corporate treasury.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is different. That is where the Senator from Nebraska and I would part company. If the Senator would say that all such contributions were made voluntarily by the officers of the corporation, he would have one set of circumstances. If the contributions were made, as COPE, operating within the law, operates through voluntary contributions, it would be the same sort of association as any other group of citizens.

The fact is that COPE happens to represent labor organizations to some degree for these purposes, and I assume from what the Senator says and from my own knowledge of the situation—I do not want to be hypocritical and pretend that I do not know anything about it—it makes contributions, which come from members of unions or persons indentified with the labor movement.

But, again, we get into the business of not going into the union treasury and supplying the funds for COPE, which is violative of the law and violative of the constitutions and bylaws of most of the unions.

Mr. CURTIS. Suppose a voluntary association created by corporate executives receives money from the corporation; that they also receive some voluntary contributions from individuals but that they put them into their treasury; that they then proceeded to take the money which came from the corporate treasuries, and spend it on the holding of meetings and on publicity which is adverse to certain candidates but favorable to others. Suppose they spend that money, which has been obtained from the corporations, to hire precinct workers and to conduct registration programs, but that they call it education. Would that be a violation of law?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think, again, as I have undertaken to say to the Senator in his inquiry, these interpretations are matters for the courts, predicated upon the facts and the law, as are all legal questions. The Senator has indulged in a hypothesis with which I am not certain I can entirely agree, because I am not possessed of all the knowledge which the Senator apparently has with respect to such organizations as COPE.

But I should say that the courts have ruled on this subject; and, as the Senator has indicated, they have not overlooked it nor dismissed it lightly. For example, in 1947 there was a case of the United States against the Congress of Industrial Organizations and others, an appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia. I read from the syllabus rather than from the opinion itself, which covers a large number of pages:

> In this case, a labor organization and its president were indicted for violations of the Corrupt Practices Act of 1925, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, which prohibits contributions or expenditures by corporations and labor organizations in connection with Federal elections. The indictment charged that the labor organization made, and its president consented to, expenditures for the publication of a weekly periodical, in a certain issue of which appeared an article by its president urging members to vote for a particular candidate in a forthcoming congressional election, and that it made expenditures for the publication and distribution of extra copies of that issue in connection with the election; but it did not charge that free copies were distributed to nonsubscribers, nonpurchasers, or persons not entitled to receive copies as members of the union. The district court sustained a motion to dismiss on the ground that the act, so far as it related to expenditures by labor organizations in connection with Federal elections, violated the first amendment of the Federal Constitution. The Government appealed directly to this court under the Criminal Appeals Act.
>
> * * * * *
>
> The interpretation here placed on section 313 is supported by the history, the language, and the purpose of the section, and by the fact that grave doubt as to its constitutionality would arise were it construed as applicable to the acts charged in the indictment.

As the Senator well knows from a reading of the cases, there is a limited interpretation on what is meant by contributions and expenditures. I shall simply say to the Senator, as I undertook to say at the outset, that in many instances, the cases will have to stand upon their own bottoms, with respect to what actually happened; with respect to the collection of funds and the distribution of funds; the sources of the funds; the voluntary nature, if such exists, or, indeed, the involuntary nature, of the contributions; whether the money came from the treasury of the unions or was contributed by the members of the unions, and for what purposes, whether the purpose be educational or primarily political.

I noticed in the newspaper this morning—the Senator from Nebraska also may have noticed it—a reference to a case involving the League of Women Voters. The lower court—Judge Madden—held that the League of Women Voters is a political organization, although I believe both the Senator from Nebraska and I know, having had some experiences with the ladies who are members of that organization, and having appeared before them, as the Senator doubtless has, that they belong to various political faiths but do advocate certain causes or oppose certain legislative matters.

Mr. CURTIS. Was that in respect to the Corrupt Practices Act, or was it a matter of taxes?

Mr. HENNINGS. It was with respect to a matter of taxes. I simply happened to notice an item about it in the newspaper today; I had not read the case.

Mr. CURTIS. I realize that before any prosecution can be successful, the court must inquire into all the facts and circumstances. But I do think Congress owes the public a duty to show the clear intent of what we propose. That is why I think the question should be answered. If an organization such as COPE receives a part of its budget from labor organizations—from dues money—is it the intention of the author of this clean elections bill that that shall be permitted by law or prohibited by law?

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say to the able Senator that the pending bill, as do all legislative matters, embodies what we believe to be the intent of Congress, and that, if passed, certain interpretations must necessarily be left to the courts.

As the Senator knows from his long experience in the House of Representatives and in this body, the courts are constantly passing upon questions with which the legislative branch has undertaken to deal.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes. I have read the legislative history concerning the enactment of the statute which prohibits corporations from making political expenditures and contributions. There were two basic reasons for the enactment of that measure. One was that there was objection to having powerful corporations have that much political influence. The second reason was the right of the stockholder not to have his money spent for candidates or for causes in which he did not believe. I think both those reasons apply to labor organizations.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not contradict that statement in any respect; the same applies to labor organizations, just as it applies to corporations.

Mr. CURTIS. I shall try to simplify my question: If an organization receives part of its budget from a labor organization and its dues money—not voluntary contributions, but dues money—can that organization engage in activities which result in the election or defeat of Federal candidates?

Mr. HENNINGS. As I understand the question, it goes to whether a part is received from dues money and a part is received for political education or political purposes—or both?

Mr. CURTIS. No; if part of the budget of COPE comes from labor organizations and if part comes from voluntary contributions, but if the result of the entire effort of that organization is of material help in defeating or in electing Federal candidates, is that a violation of law?

Mr. HENNINGS. That would depend entirely upon the facts in a given case. As to whether the dues are used for educational purposes or whether they are used for actual political work, and to what extent those expenditures can be separated, assuming that the contributions were voluntary, certainly there would be no violation of the law with respect to such contributions.

I cannot assume facts with respect to what organizations—with respect to whose operations I am not privy—are doing, except to do the best I can to answer the Senator's numerous questions in regard to an organization known as COPE.

I have never seen the bylaws or the constitution of that organization. I do not know how it functions—except, in a general sort of way, I understand that it collects voluntary contributions from the members.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the Senator's understanding that that constitutes the entire budget of the organization?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not know that much about it. So far as I am concerned, my knowledge about COPE is a case of first impressions—as in the case of a client who walks into my office. I would not be able to say more about it until I saw what its constitution and its bylaws provide and until I understood more about what its functions are.

We know that the Taft-Hartley Act already contains provisions on that subject; and violations of that act are matters for the courts to determine. That is the best answer I can give to this line of questioning.

For instance, I could not say very much about the detailed operations of the United States Steel Corp. I do not know whether the officers of that corporation make contributions to candidates, or whether they reimburse one another for such contributions, or not. Many corporations are opposed to the making of contributions of one kind or another, inasmuch as contributions may not always be voluntary, and many of them may be subject to coercion, whether express or implied.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McCLELLAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HENNINGS. I yield.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am sorry that I have arrived in the Chamber a little too late to hear all of the debate between the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Nebraska, for I am very much interested in it, inasmuch as it pertains to a field in which I have been interested for some time.

I have refrained from discussing this subject because—for one thing—the Looper case, from Georgia, is now before the U.S. Supreme Court, which will decide whether that activity can be engaged in.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Arizona and I have discussed these matters privately on many occasions; and I appreciate his interest in the debate. I believe he will agree that these matters are for the courts to determine, and that the answers depend upon the rulings of the courts, do they not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I agree that the matter to which I have just now referred is before the U.S. Supreme Court, which I hope will give its answer shortly.

But I believe my friend, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], was addressing himself to a matter very fundamental to this clean elections law, because under the decision of the Supreme Court which more or less motivated the political actions committees of the several unions, the court's ruling could also be applied to corporations. However, corporations have not generally undertaken the same type of activities that the labor unions have undertaken in this field.

The question which comes to my mind is this: If the Senator, in his attempts to create a modern elections law, allows this loophole to remain open, then I am sure he is in for a lot of devilment about matters that he was hoping to correct.

Let me explain what I mean: The Committee on Political Education does report the voluntary contributions of the funds it receives, and reports in detail how they are distributed to the various States and the various candidates. But no reporting is made of what is spent for educational purposes.

If the Senator from Missouri will listen to me for just a moment——

Mr. HENNINGS. I am listening very carefully to the Senator from Arizona, and I hope I am understanding him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Let me state some of the activities which are considered educational, and about which the costs are not reported: Compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records.

Certainly we cannot correctly say that those activities are nonpolitical and are educational only; actually, they are political to the 9th degree, because of the way the voting records are compiled.

For instance, when we were debating the offshore oil bill, the issue was carried as "raising the cost of oil to the people, and denying educational funds," and so forth, whereas the real issue was States' rights. They twisted those, so that it looked as if a Senator who voted against that bill actually voted against the interests of the working people.

So I think the Senator from Missouri would have to agree that those are political matters.

The next is political training courses; and they do not have to report what they spend on them.

Mr. HENNINGS. Who does not have to report?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Committee on Political Education.

Mr. HENNINGS. It does not report on what it spends on training classes or courses?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It does not report on what it spends on matters which, according to its own definition, come in the category of "educational."

As I said at the outset, that organization does report on funds given directly to candidates; and I am convinced that those funds are voluntarily contributed.

I do not believe this particular organization any longer uses compulsory dues money; but it gets around that difficulty in this way: I have stated that it makes no report in regard to what it spends for political training classes.

Neither does it report on the amounts it spends on getting voters registered. We may debate as to whether the latter is a proper activity, because there is some responsibility to get voters registered.

Next we come to payments to political workers——

Mr. HENNINGS. I understand my friend, the Senator from Arizona, to say that it is his understanding that contributions made to the organization known as COPE are now voluntary.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The contributions made to COPE which are, in turn, given to the candidates.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. But the funds to which we are referring are those which never are reported on; and we have no idea of their size. I have to assume that they are rather astronomical in size, because of my knowledge of campaign expenditures in a small State such as Arizona.

For instance, they pay election day workers. In our hearings before the Select Committee on Campaigns and Lobbying, a few years ago, we disclosed information—and I think the Senator from Missouri will be interested to know about this—that in one county, alone, in Michigan, such payments were being made at a rate which would equal about $37,000 a day—in that one county. The amount spent for that purpose was approximately that large. All we had to go on was the number of days and the amount spent per day.

They provide automobiles to transport voters to the polls, and the cost of that service is not reported. For instance, I have information about one particular election, in a particular county, in which 100 automobiles were provided for that purpose.

Mr. HENNINGS. If that is true, certainly it is a violation of the present Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think the Senator is misinformed on that. We are not sure it is in violation, because the Supreme Court made a decision in the case of United States against CIO, in which it held educational purposes to be a proper function of a labor union. I am not intimately acquainted with the details of the decision, but, as I recall, it was held in connection with a labor newspaper, and the Court held it was proper, and that activity has since continued.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator said I was misinformed. I doubtless am on many things. Does the Senator indicate that I am misinformed as to the nature of the operation of this activity, or the Court decision, or the application of the law?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; I meant when the Senator said this is in violation of the present law. I believe if a proper interpretation was placed on this activity, it would be; but the Supreme Court decision has placed a great deal of doubt on it. That is why I am arguing the point which my friend, the Senator, started. Because if labor unions can do it, by the same decision business can also do it.

Mr. HENNINGS. Then the Senator's complaint is against the Supreme Court decision?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; the Senator from Arizona has no complaint against the Supreme Court's decision. I think in that particular case the Supreme Court ruled correctly. I do not always agree with the Supreme Court——

Mr. HENNINGS. Nor does the Supreme Court always agree with itself. The Supreme Court has great difficulty in coming to an agreement when we have 5-to-4 decisions.

While I think this discussion is very interesting, and very important, certainly, I am trying to get at what the Senator is seeking from me with respect to it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If the Senator will allow me to pursue this matter a little bit further——

Mr. HENNINGS. I want to try to answer, to the best of my ability.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I apologize for my remarks not being in the nature of a question.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is perfectly all right. I do not raise that question at all.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wanted to complete this list of activities that are called educational, which I think are purely political, and which I think, if allowed to continue, can destroy the intent and purpose of the diligent and hard work which my friend from Missouri has put into the bill. For instance, there are no reports of expenses of political committees, and yet there are 20 COPE area conferences in which expenses are paid. The Committee on Political Education is, in my opinion, a political organization, which was formed, in the words of Mr. George Meany, to change the complexion of Congress, when he said, "We will have to go further in the political field." I think the Senator will recall that Mr. Meany said that the emphasis is shifting from collective bargaining to politics when he asserted that the emphasis had shifted from picket lines to the legislative halls.

Mr. HENNINGS. I must confess I do not recall the last statement. I am sure the Senator is correct in quoting him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I realize that the Senator has not devoted his study to this particular subject, because it is outside the field he normally engages in.

Mr. HENNINGS. I may say that I have both represented corporations and have been a mediator in labor disputes. For the most part, in my private practice of law my representation was of corporations.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator should be a vice president.

Mr. HENNINGS. But I do not profess to be an expert in labor law, because I know my law firm subscribes to the corporation clearing house journal with advance sheets on labor disputes. We get that information from the NLRB decisions, various rulings in the districts, and the decisions of the courts relative to those matters. I do not find the field of labor legislation at all simple or easy. I find it, indeed, very difficult and complex.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would the Senator allow me to draw up a hypothesis in order to enable him to understand what I am driving at?

Mr. HENNINGS. I have to get down to a particular case that comes to me, in order to undertake to ascertain what the facts are. After ascertaining what the facts are, I search the law and every decision which has been made on the point at issue. Then I undertake to come to some conclusion of the relationship of the facts to the law or the law to the facts. So that to talk about many, many hypothetical cases I find exceedingly difficult, because they do not contain all of the elements and all of the facts that may properly engage counsel's attention in undertaking to represent a client, whether it be a labor union or a corporate enterprise.

Mr. GOLDWATER. May I conduct the Senator back over this matter, because I do not think the Senator from Missouri quite grasps what I am trying to get at?

The Taft-Hartley Act and the Corrupt Practices Act provide that corporations and unions cannot participate in political activity. A decision of the Supreme Court put enough cloud over that prohibition to enable labor unions to establish political action committees under the guise of educational committees.

What the Senator from Arizona is trying to put across to the Senator from Missouri is that in the case of the Committee on Political Education alone, we have clearly an organization that is engaging in politics, because I do not see how the Senator from Missouri can come to the conclusion that registration of voters is nonpolitical, that political training courses are nonpolitical, that paying election day workers is not political, that publication of voting records is nonpolitical——

Mr. HENNINGS. I had understood the court had ruled that activity was nonpolitical. Am I informed correctly?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The court has ruled——

Mr. HENNINGS. Which court?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Supreme Court in the CIO case.

Mr. HENNINGS. That the publication of voting records is nonpolitical?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No.

Mr. HENNINGS. I misunderstood.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The publication of labor periodicals does not fall within the meaning of the prohibition of the Taft-Hartley and the Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understood that. I thought the Senator referred to publications.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Having that Court decision, and having the Taft-Hartley Act and the Corrupt Practices Act, which were intended to exclude unions and corporations from political activity, we now have political activity. All I am trying to do is ascertain from the Senator if he feels this type of political activity should not be recognized, and those contributions should be required to be reported under his bill. That is my whole purpose.

Mr. HENNINGS. I would only say to the Senator, as I can honestly and forthrightly say to anyone who would ask that question, it would depend upon assembling all the facts with relation to it. The Supreme Court of the United States already has passed on the matter——

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; the Supreme Court has not.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understood the Senator to say, with respect to the Taft-Hartley Act, the Supreme Court had made certain pronouncements.

Mr. GOLDWATER. No. The Senator from Arizona cited only one decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. HENNINGS. The CIO case.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is right, and that pertained to newspapers. There is another case in Michigan that relates to television. It went to the Supreme Court and was remanded to the Supreme Court of Michigan.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator did take a very active interest in the Taft-Hartley law and its application. Of that I am well aware, as we all are. We respect him here in this body.

There are many of these matters in the courts, are there not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. There is one matter in the court, which will not apply to the activity we are discussing until we interpret whether this action is political or not.

Mr. HENNINGS. Yes.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not think the court is going to determine this matter. I know of no way it can. If the court upholds the Supreme Court of Georgia in the Looper case, and if the court says it is wrong to use union dues money for political purposes, we still have the Supreme Court decision which clouds the whole area and allows political education committees.

If the Senator will allow me, I should like to go a step further.

Mr. HENNINGS. Before the Senator goes a step further I should like to reply.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator please let me finish?

Mr. HENNINGS. I have yielded to the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I know the Senator has.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator takes me step by step, and I should like to answer step by step, but if the Senator wants to proceed I shall be happy to proceed in any way pleasing to him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I merely wish to point out to my friend that what the Senator from Arizona sees as a danger in this process, in regard to the Senator's very well drafted and good bill, on which the Senator has worked so long and diligently, is an expansion of this process. Some of the corporations of this country are now beginning to do what has been referred to. Let us assume that the corporations and businesses generally of this country establish their political education committees.

The Senator has been a candidate many times, as I have. We would rather have manpower than money, but somebody has to pay for the manpower, most of the time. This is a way to pay for it, and yet never have to report it. This is a way to publish propaganda for a candidate, and never have to report it. This is a way to provide election tools, and never have to report it.

What will be the end result if both sides of this argument get into this work? Let us say it is management on the one side and labor on the other. We will then find tremendous sums of money being spent for candidates, which sums will never be reported.

That is the whole purpose in the attempt of the junior Senator from Arizona to argue with his good friend, because he thinks the bill should contain something in this field to prevent the destruction of the intent of the whole work.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the Senator's solicitude; and I do not say that in any ironical way. I know the Senator is interested in government. From his point of view, he is interested in good government. We all have various ways of approaching what is a common end, and sometimes they are not quite as much at variance as they superficially seem to be.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to yield to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I entered the Chamber in the middle of the colloquy, which I find intensely interesting. For my own enlightenment, I wonder if I correctly understand that the pending amendment is amendment 1–13–60—E?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Which would impose an overall limitation of $10,000 on political contributions by any one individual?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CLARK. Am I correct in stating that the colloquy which has taken place between the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Missouri, interesting and fascinating though it is, is rather irrelevant and immaterial to the question of whether this particular amendment should be agreed to?

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the Senator's suggestion. I have tried during the long course of this debate to be available for all questions raised by any Senator, and I have not undertaken to say that any are irrelevant. I fear that some questions which are asked, when we get down to matters of interpretations of the courts, or hypotheses which may not include all of the facts or assumptions, are difficult to answer.

I understood the Senator from Nebraska to make the assumption that the organization known as COPE subsisted upon funds—if I do not misquote him, and I hope I do not—that were sometimes taken involuntarily or from the union treasury, which is denied, as I understand it, by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, does the Senator yield further?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, the Senator from Arizona did not deny that.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understood the Senator from Arizona to say that he now understands the funds for political activity were not taken from the treasury or the dues, but were voluntarily given. Am I wrong again?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from Arizona said he is fairly well convinced that moneys given to candidates are voluntary funds, and that they are reported to the Clerk of the House.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is what the Senator did say; the Senator is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What the Senator from Arizona is trying to argue, he believes, is applicable. I disagree with my good friend the Senator from Pennsylvania, who says that it is irrelevant. One might raise the argument that we should talk about this matter any place. One might say that it should go to the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare. I have a very deep interest in seeing that the elections in this country are run better and more cleanly. It is not that such action is particularly revolting. I wish that both parties would operate effectively.

Mr. HENNINGS. Did we enjoy the Senator's support on the amendment which related to primary elections?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, the Senator did not.

Mr. HENNINGS. Did we enjoy the Senator's support on the amendment relating to the multiplicity of committees within the States?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No, the Senator did not get my support on that. The Senator knows that.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thought I knew it, but I understood the Senator to say that he was interested in perfecting the elections process.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator allow me to complete my statement?

Mr. HENNINGS. I wondered whether our philosophies have parted company on all matters thus far, including perhaps this, and I wondered exactly what the learned Senator would suggest about elections, since he has expressed an interest, but the interest seems to be directed, by and large, to labor organizations which, as I understand it, are pretty well covered by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator allow me to correct a statement that he made?

Mr. HENNINGS. I want us to join issue, if possible, so that we will understand.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to have the RECORD left with the statement which the Senator made, which I am sure was simply an error on his part. I admitted that I was fairly well convinced that the moneys sent to candidates come from voluntary contributions. That did not use to be the case, but I believe such money now comes from voluntary contributions, and I believe it is reported.

I have been going through a list of items which come under "education," which are purely political, which are not reported.

My only point is that when the Senator tries to put a limit on what an individual can contribute, I point out there is no limitation at all on this activity. If the Senator wants to take the usual approach, which is to say, "Well, GOLDWATER is against labor"——

Mr. HENNINGS. No; I have not said that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have made this perfectly clear.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have not said that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am fearful that corporations will do this, also. When that happens we shall have completely destroyed the intent of the proposed legislation.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. For example, when corporations pay for membership in chambers of commerce for members of a given corporation, and when certain speakers of given political persuasion or philosophy are invited to speak before chamber of commerce meetings and conventions, and the National Association of Manufacturers convention, and so on, that is, in a sense, educational, is it not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is agreeing with the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HENNINGS. Let me express just one point of view. It is educational, because people are learning something, whether it be something with which they agree or something with which they may disagree.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator agrees with me, then, that there is a real danger in the approach I have suggested this afternoon. If the labor union movement can do this, business can do it, likewise. I have never been one to say that business does not engage in politics.

I am not going to take more of the Senator's time, because I have heard some of my colleagues say this is irrelevant. I think it is not only not irrelevant, but that it is of great importance.

Mr. HENNINGS. I have not said that. I wish to say emphatically to the Senator, whether I think it irrelevant or not I think it is my duty to try to do the best I can to answer questions, which may or may not be relevant, even though I do not always understand precisely the question as it may be put, because questions sometimes contain conclusions.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Does the Senator agree with the junior Senator from Arizona that there is a danger in allowing this activity, which is a complete political activity, to continue and not be reported?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not understand that this is any part of the bill, I will say to my friend from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The purpose of the Senator's bill, as I understand it, is to require more complete reporting, to place limits on activities, and to overcome some of the troubles which the study has shown to exist with respect to elections. I am trying to point out, and I am obviously not getting very far with it——

Mr. HENNINGS. I think the Senator is doing very well.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In this activity, we have a purely political activity which the Senator has not covered in his bill.

I shall say this once again, and then take my seat. The danger is that businessmen and corporations may follow the same tack; and when they do we might as well tear up the bill.

Mr. HENNINGS. Did the Senator think we inadequately covered primary elections with the primary amendment?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was not in agreement with that.

Mr. HENNINGS. But it was adequately covered, was it not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I was not in agreement with the amendment, and I voted against it.

Mr. HENNINGS. But the Senator understood it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Oh, certainly.

Mr. HENNINGS. And thought it was adequately covered.

Does the Senator believe that the second amendment, with respect to numerous committees in the States being required to report, was adequately covered?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not see how the Senate could spend the time it has spent on this bill and have anyone say that anything had not been adequately covered.

Mr. HENNINGS. I understood the Senator to say that we had not adequately covered the matters undertaken to be dealt with in the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. No. The Senator did not correctly understand.

Mr. HENNINGS. Then I stand corrected.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In the preparation of the bill the Senator has overlooked—and I know it was inadvertently overlooked—an area which could create more danger than we are now trying to correct. Here is a clear case of political activity that is never reported to any committee of the Congress or of the State.

Mr. HENNINGS. I will say to the Senator that it was not overlooked. It was deliberately excluded, because it has seemed to me that it has no place in this bill. Every one of these instances must stand upon the facts of the separate cases.

In my practice of law, in trying to understand the law, having been engaged in private practice for a good many years, I have always had to take the position that we must first know all the facts, and then try to understand the law as applied to the facts.

As to providing for every possible contingency in legislation which undertakes to cover election laws, if we did so in connection with all legislation emanating from the Congress, perhaps there would be very little work for the Supreme Court to do, because we would have to set forth in every bill or resolution specific instances, one after another. I do not know how we can be more specific in this sort of legislation, which is not labor legislation, as my friend well knows, and still attain the primary purpose, which is to prevent contributions of more than $10,000 being made by any one person.

Does the Senator agree with that philosophy, if we can arrive at some agreement? Has he an amendment to offer?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have no amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sure the Senator has been giving this subject a great deal of study. He has been good enough to illuminate the discourse upon it. Has the Senator any suggestion, except that we do nothing but revert to 1925 and rock along under the old 1925 law, which some of us have felt very strongly is inadequate?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator either has not been listening or he has purposely misunderstood the Senator from Arizona. I am merely trying to point out, as I have done many times, an area which I feel should be covered by this bill. There is an amendment——

Mr. HENNINGS. Has the Senator a suggestion?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have been making suggestions as long as I have been on my feet.

Mr. HENNINGS. In what line would the Senator suggest that the language be changed?

Mr. GOLDWATER. There is no language in the bill to change. The bill does not refer to this field at all. The Senator would not require union organizations participating in election activities to report. If the Senator wants to be specific, I will ask one question, and then I will let him get on with his work.

Does the Senator feel that paying election-day workers is a political activity?

Mr. HENNINGS. I think the courts would probably consider paying election day workers for a specific party or a candidate to be an election activity. That is a matter of first impression.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator has been in politics——

Mr. HENNINGS. The subject was never suggested in committee. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS], who asked a number of questions earlier this afternoon, is the ranking member of the committee. The subject was never suggested as one which should fall within the purview of study by the committee which reported this election bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I think I stated earlier the reason——

Mr. HENNINGS. I think the Senator is really talking about labor legislation.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not agree at all.

Mr. HENNINGS. It may impinge upon political activity, because every phase of our national life, in one way or another, is related to political activity.

Mr. GOLDWATER. This activity is prohibited by labor law, yet it is practiced by reason of the cloud cast upon it by the Supreme Court.

Mr. HENNINGS. If it is prohibited by labor law, is it not covered by labor law?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The law states that such organizations may not engage in political activity. What I am trying to convince the Senator is that the actions of the Committee on Political Education are political. They are merely a way to get around the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. HENNINGS. With respect to political activity, I was not in the Congress at the time the Taft-Hartley Act was passed. I profess no expertness on it. I heard none of the debates. When was it passed?

Mr. GOLDWATER. 1947.

Mr. HENNINGS. It seemed to me that the subject of activity by labor organizations was covered in the act.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Absolutely.

Mr. HENNINGS. Was it not dealt with?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Absolutely. It was covered by reference to the Corrupt Practices Act.

Mr. HENNINGS. Why is it not a matter for the court to pass upon, and why should we encumber an elections bill with further references to labor and labor activities? We have undertaken to define political activity, and we have gone into such matters as relate to the various things that happen in campaigns.

I find myself at a loss to answer the Senator any further, except to say that these things are matters for the courts and the interpretation of the courts. I have done the best I can, with my limited ability, to try to spell out what we mean. I think the courts would probably understand that the legislative history is, and what the Congress intends. There is another branch of the Government, which passes upon some of these questions of fact and of law.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I point out that at the outset of this colloquy I stated that I had not entered into the debate and had not prepared amendments because of the existence of a case before the Supreme Court. I would not have engaged in this colloquy had not other Senators discussed the subject. I did not want the RECORD to be left as it was, incomplete; and I feel certain that when the Senator reads the RECORD tomorrow he will better understand what I have been trying to get at. I understand that an amendment will be offered in this field. If it is, I shall speak on that amendment. I had no intention of offering such an amendment, because I did not care to ruffle the waters with the Supreme Court so near.

I hope that I have been able to show the Senator why I have concern in this area and why I feel that if this matter is not covered at this time or the next time, the Senator will come to me and say, "Gosh, my bill turned out to be no good because we did not close this great big loophole that is bigger than the whole field we are talking about."

Mr. HENNINGS. I hope I shall never find myself lacking in candor. If a better bill can be written I would be happy to accept it or accept any part of it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I know the Senator would.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate the Senator's discussion of the subject, and I know his sincerity. I am not going to use the old cliche about, "We do not always agree on everything" because we do not always agree on everything.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That would be a horrible thing.

Mr. HENNINGS. It would be, would it not?

Mr. GOLDWATER. It would be.

Mr. HENNINGS. Certainly. We often drape the walls of this Chamber by saying, "I do not always agree with the distinguished and able and learned Senator, but I am now going to say thus and so about him." That is complimentary. I am not going to talk about our not always agreeing. The Supreme Court does not always agree. Lawyers often do not agree when they are on opposite sides of a case. I have been practicing law for 35 years, and I have taught it. I do not pretend to be an especially able lawyer. I have been able to make my living at it, and not as a political lawyer, either. I find the law very difficult. I find the more I read it and experience it, the tougher it gets.

Mr. GOLDWATER. If a lawyer admits that the law is tough, what must he think a layman finds it to be?

Mr. HENNINGS. Then I would recommend he repair immediately to the nearest lawyer and let the lawyer do his worrying for him.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Outside of this Chamber I would agree with my friend.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not have any reference to the Senate, of course.

Mr. GOLDWATER. There are laymen in the Senate, and they are entitled to express their views. I believe I have expressed mine to the best of my ability. Therefore I will suggest to the Senator that tomorrow, as he reads this colloquy, he pay particular attention to the points of political activity to which I have tried to call attention.

Mr. HENNINGS. I meant nothing personal.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Certainly not.

Mr. HENNINGS. I meant nothing personal about the fact that the Senator from Arizona is not a member of the legal profession.

Mr. GOLDWATER. There are times when I am happy about it, and there are times when I am unhappy about it.

Mr. HENNINGS. I might say that he may even be better qualified because he is not a member of the legal profession.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator might be right.

Mr. HENNINGS. Lawyers, together with members of other professions and trades and crafts, have their shortcomings, too.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Sometimes too many cooks may spoil the soup.

Mr. HENNINGS. Lawyers do not pretend any infallibility or superiority insofar as mental capacity and intellectual ability or the ability to understand and comprehend is concerned.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Having hired several lawyers during my life, I would have to agree.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HENNINGS. I am very glad to yield to the able junior Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I have listened with appreciation to the colloquy between the able senior Senator from Missouri and the able junior Senator from Arizona. Suffice it to say that if the practices which the junior Senator from Arizona alleges to be political are in fact political activities, and are so determined by the courts, then they are prohibited by law.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Tennessee has stated in one very brief sentence what I have been trying perhaps to extensively but repeatedly to say in answer to many questions. That is exactly the point of this entire discussion. I thank the Senator

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator pardon me for brevity?

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not believe anyone need ever ask to be excused for brevity in the U.S. Senate.

Mr. CLARK. I, too, have listened with great interest to the colloquy between the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Arizona. To return to my earlier statement, the Senator from Arizona has raised some very interesting points, which are worthy of careful attention. These points will also be raised by an amendment to be proposed by the junior Senator from South Carolina. It occurs to me that these points could be discussed and debated if and when that amendment is called up. I shall personally oppose it, because I would rather have that subject left to the courts. However, the colloquy which has just taken place is entirely irrelevant and immaterial to any issue with respect to the pending amendment, which we have now been discussing for the better part of today. I would hope very much that we would be able to bring the amendment to a vote at an early time.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do agree. However, I also feel that it would be discourteous and improper, since I have undertaken some responsibility on this bill, to refuse to try to answer questions just because they are irrelevant, as though I were a judge of a court, sitting on high, on a bench in a black robe, saying, "This is irrelevant. We will pass on."

I call for the question on the amendments which are now pending before the Senate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEATING in the chair). The Senator will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What was the request of the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has called for the question.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, without losing the floor, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BEALL. I thank the minority leader.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HENNINGS. What is the parliamentary situation, a vote having been requested?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated the question. It is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri. The Senator from Illinois has been recognized and he has now yielded to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. BEALL. Mr. President, yesterday, on behalf of myself, the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON], I submitted an amendment to give civil service employees the right to vote and participate in local and municipal elections. There is some question about the amendment being in order on the pending bill. I have withdrawn it so that I may in the future introduce a separate bill to cover the civil service employees who are domiciled in or residents of Montgomery and Prince Georges Counties in Maryland and in Arlington and Fairfax Counties in Virginia.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of my distinguished friend the Senator from Missouri. As I understand, before we left the floor last night the pending amendments were offered, and it was my understanding that they were actually in the nature of technical amendments. I believe that the language had been used. I recall discussing them with the distinguished Senator from Missouri. He indicated that they did nothing more than to raise the limit of the contribution from $5,000 to $10,000. I believe there is a little more than that in the amendments.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am sorry if I conveyed that impression to the minority leader. There is more than that to the amendments. I may have been referring to the technical amendment, that being number three.

I may have misspoken; in any event, I would not say it is a technical amendment.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I examined the language of the RECORD rather carefully. I noted this statement by the distinguished Senator from Missouri:

> The law under which we are presumably now operating provides a $5,000 limitation. We would provide a limitation of $10,000.

Some words, however, have been added to the existing law, which put this matter in an entirely different light. For instance, existing law speaks only of a contribution to a candidate, but the language of the amendments before us speaks of contributions to "any candidate or candidates." The addition of the last two words very significantly changes the meaning of the amendments, as I understood it. That makes it a general limitation across the board.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. Did I understand the Senator to say that words have been added?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They are added in the Senator's amendments.

Mr. HENNINGS. They appear in the amendments.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Yes.

Mr. HENNINGS. I thank the Senator for his clarification. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The existing law is clear about a contribution to a candidate. The second amendment, on the other hand, speaks about a contribution to a "candidate or candidates." That is quite a different thing.

In addition, the amendment covers "any committee or committees or other organizations engaged in furthering, advancing, or advocating the nomination or election of any candidate or candidates."

So what confronts us now, of course, is a broad limitation which goes entirely across the board. In that respect, it is a very substantial departure from existing law.

Of course, I should be more than glad to support an increase from $5,000 to $10,000; but obviously I could not accept the new language which is proposed in the amendment. Therefore, I shall offer an amendment which would modify the amendment of the Senator from Missouri in this respect:

It would strike the words "or expenditures"; the words "or candidates"; the words "or offices"; the words "or committees"; the word "organizations"—in the plural; and also the words "or expenditures."

There is one other modification, and it comes at the very close of the amendment, because the language in lines 18 and 19 is——

Mr. HENNINGS. Was the Senator's last modification on page 2?

Mr. DIRKSEN. They are all on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. KEATING in the chair). Is the Senator from Illinois offering these amendments?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I shall offer them directly, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator asking that they be considered en bloc?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I think so, because I consider them to be either technical or clarifying, even though they go to the substance of the amendment and go to the substance of that portion of the Corrupt Practices Act which is proposed to be amended by the distinguished Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the amendments en bloc?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee will state it.

Mr. GORE. What was the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. First, the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois will be stated.

Mr. GORE. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair awaits the pleasure of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I am undertaking to make the corrections, as the Senator has indicated them, in the body of the bill, since the Senator has only one copy of the amendment and has very graciously supplied it to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments will now be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 2, it is proposed to strike the words "or expenditures."; on page 2, line 6, strike the words "or candidates"; on page 2, line 7, strike the words "or offices"; on page 2, lines 11–12, strike the words "or committees"; on page 2, line 12, strike the word "organizations" and in lieu thereof insert "organization"; on page 2, lines 18–19, strike the words "or expenditures"; on page 2, line 19, insert after the word "made" the words "to or" and insert after the word "committee" the words "or any other State or local committee."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois has asked that his amendments be considered en bloc. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the amendments of the Senator from Illinois will be considered en bloc.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there is scarcely any need for me to labor this matter. We have discussed the general approach on this subject. As the distinguished Senator from Missouri well knows, I am rather allergic to the proposition of any kind of inhibition across the board. This amendment would, of course, impose a $10,000 limitation embracing all candidates, all committees, and all organizations.

There is one other item, and it is the last two lines of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Missouri, which provides as follows:

> This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

If I remember correctly, only the word "contributions" was used in the Corrupt Practices Act. But the word "expenditures" has been added in this case.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DIRKSEN. For that reason, this is certainly not a technical amendment. This amendment goes to the very heart of the matter.

Mr. HENNINGS. It is not a technical amendment. If I said so, I was referring to a preceding amendment. I am sorry the Senator labored under a misapprehension.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I had a misunderstanding and misapprehension of the amendment last night, when it was pressed for action. I may say to the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING], that he, too, had some concern about it, because the Senator from New York at the time said:

> It is important that in our deliberations we understand fully that this is quite a departure from anything now in the law.

In addition, the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. JOHNSTON] also made an observation with respect to this matter.

I find it impossible to embrace this kind of limitation. It is a matter for Senators to determine whether they want to impose a complete limitation, one which goes all the way across the top of the board.

I have very frequently ventilated my own views and philosophy with respect to the bill. The distinguished Senator from Missouri knows how I feel. It is a matter of deep conviction with me. So I feel impelled to offer these amendments en bloc, in order to make certain that the issue is drawn, so that every Senator will understand what is at present before the Senate.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. GORE. In order that the issue be clearly understood as well as clearly drawn, the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from Missouri would place a ceiling of $10,000 upon the political contributions of any one individual within any one calendar year. Under that ceiling it would have been possible for a person to contribute $10,000 on December 31, 1959, another $10,000 during the year 1960, and an additional $10,000 on January 1, 1961. His wife could have done likewise. So it would be possible, even under the ceiling proposed by the senior Senator from Missouri, to which the junior Senator from Illinois objects, for a man and wife to contribute $60,000 to political campaigns in the course of 12 months and 2 days.

Under the amendment offered by the distinguished minority leader, there would be no ceiling whatsoever. Any person could contribute $60 million, if he had it, and so chose. So I join with the able Senator from Illinois in the desire to draw the issue clear, plain, and simple; and the Senate shall choose.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from Illinois has drawn the issue. The Senator from Tennessee, in his customarily cogent and able manner, has delineated the issue. Certainly either we believe in the imposition of limitations on the contributions which individuals may make in connection with attempts to dominate and affect elections, or we do not believe in the imposition of such limitations. The issue is as simple as that.

I, for one, am prepared to vote on the Senator's amendment. Of course, it would destroy the purpose of my amendment and would completely negate what we have undertaken to accomplish by the fourth of these amendments.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, there is little more that I shall attempt to add to the debate.

Of course I say to the Senator from Tennessee that I cannot engage in astronomical flights of fancy, and talk about $60 million of campaign fund contributions.

However, Mr. President, I do not like to see a dollars-and-cents limitation applied to my interest in a cause which I believe vital to my country or to the perpetuity of the country.

If, as an individual, I feel that the country has been good to me, and that I should be good to it, in return, does my colleague wish to have a dollars-and-cents limitation applied to what I may contribute?

That is not done in regard to the contributions we make to our churches. I often think that, probably within the smallest compass, the greatest guiding philosophy I know of is to be found in the first four words in the motto of the American Legion; those words are "For God and Country."

If I give $10 million to a church in one town, and give a similar amount to a church in a neighboring town, no objection is made; but when one has a genuine interest in campaigns or candidates, there are those who would apply a dollars-and-cents limitation to that person's manifestation of his interest in those subjects, and to the amount of money that a decent citizen who has an abiding interest in the good institutions of his country may spend in behalf of activities of that kind.

I am sensible to the limitations of existing law.

On the other hand, this amendment would provide an across-the-board limitation. As for me, I am not willing to accept it; and I am prepared to vote on this amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has referred to a dollars-and-cents label. By means of this proposed legislation, we are trying to minimize the effect of money expenditures upon candidates and their election.

Is the Senator from Illinois aware that an investigation conducted by the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], for the Privileges and Elections Subcommittee, showed that 12 prominent families contributed, in the year preceding 1956—or was it in the year 1956?

Mr. GORE. It was in the year 1956.

Mr. HENNINGS. In the year 1956, an overall total of $1,153,735 to candidates and political committees; and that one family alone gave $248,423?

In terms of what my learned friend has said, I would say that family is exceedingly patriotic; and if we are to believe that it is motivated solely by an interest in good government and in education and in the public welfare, then that family is indeed to be commended.

But I must say that I am a little too skeptical to take that position. I do not believe that that amount of money, when contributed by 12 families to a campaign, would tend to do other than have upon the Government officers an undue influence and a pervasive effect which would not be in the public interest. Regardless of whether that family would so intend those contributions or not, I believe that a contribution of that amount, by only one family, in a national campaign—and, as I have indicated, a total of 12 families made contributions amounting to in excess of $1 million—does incalculable harm to the cause of good government. I believe contributions of that sort are disproportionate to the right of each person in this country to exercise the franchise at the ballot box. I believe contributions in that amount are disproportionate in terms of the right of the average citizen to have a voice in the Government and to be heard by his elected representatives and to have his interests, at least in some measure, considered by them.

But, as I tried to say the other day, I know of none of us who has quite transcended the bounds of human frailty and perhaps does not give a little more consideration to the pleas and the concerns of 12 families who contribute $1,153,000, as against the pleas and the concerns of a poor fellow who contributes only $5. Of course, I hope we are able to rise above that sort of thing, and certainly all of us try to do so.

However, I hope to make it easier to rise above that sort of thing and to have the freedom of the ballot be as untrammeled as possible.

As the Senator has indicated, $60,000 a year is a large amount of money; but it does not include the gifts made by the children—although, as the Senator has indicated, gifts were made by that man and by his wife and by their children. However, at this time I shall not discuss that point further.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, let me say to my friend, the Senator from Missouri, that I was around here when John L. Lewis took out a $495,000 mortgage on the Democratic Party; but I heard no such reaction as the one being expressed today in this Chamber or the one expressed during the preceding days of the debate on the pending bill. I do not quarrel about that; if John L. Lewis felt that investment in the Democratic Party, in behalf of his coal miners, was a good investment in this country, all right.

The Senator from Missouri says contributions totaling $1,200,000, when made by 12 families—or, in other words, an average of $100,000 for each of those families—are wrong.

Well, the Du Ponts threw into the hat; and I remember when John J. Raskob was charged with doing so much in the presidential campaign. But I also remember that a Roosevelt married into the Du Pont family, and not too much was said about that.

I would not attempt to put a dollar limitation on the amount of interest which it would be permissible for John L. Lewis to display. If he thought that that investment by him was a desirable one, in the interest of the coal miners of Illinois, West Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania and elsewhere in the country, I would not decry it.

But I do not want a dollar sign attached to my patriotism or that of anyone else who feels that, because of the goodness of this country, he wishes to do what he can to enable the people of the country better to enjoy the moral climate of sweet freedom.

There may be some who would say, "OK; but $10,000 is the limit."

Mr. President, many of the immigrants who come to this country never had a chance in the old country; but in America they have a chance, and the sky is the limit. Are we to say, "The sky may be the limit as to what you can earn; but when you wish to express your gratitude to our country, by means of donating to candidates who are running for election in various parts of the country, and who express your views and your philosophy, $10,000 is the limit"?

Very well. If that is the Senate's estimate of it, it is all right with me. But I am not going to support a dollar sign on interest in and fidelity to a great country and the things for which it stands. I am ready to vote, Mr. President.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, I think that the distinguished minority leader has performed a great service to this body in calling attention to the fact that we have here for consideration a very serious change in existing law. It was referred to last night by the Senator from Missouri as a technical amendment. He has now explained that he had a different amendment in mind. The pending amendment is far from technical. It is very substantial.

I felt last evening that even though I supported this amendment, we should not act hastily and we should have full debate on it. That was the reason why I raised the point at that time in a colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Missouri, that this was a new departure. However, I then stated, and I reiterate now, that I do favor this amendment and am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

It seems to me essential that if we are going to pass a clean elections bill, we must put language in it which will limit the total campaign contributions by any individual in any one year. That is the purpose of the pending amendment.

The Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Missouri agree that there is a definite difference in philosophy between them. In my judgment, the amendment of the Senator from Illinois would remove protective provisions necessary to this act.

If we do not adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, it seems to me that much of the work that has gone before, much of the progress that has been made, both in the bill as reported by the Committee on Rules and Administration and in the strengthening amendments which have been offered on the floor, will go for naught.

Without a ceiling on the amount an individual can give for campaigns, we will permit a continuation of duplicity and a look-the-other-way attitude which characterizes the present law. Without the adoption of this amendment, much of the strength of the bill before us will be sapped.

As a practical matter, what the law now says is that, although one cannot give over $5,000 a year for such and such a candidate, he can give $5,000 a year to each of any number of committees which are working for his election. One can give $5,000 here, $5,000 there, and $5,000 some other place. The formula for this is a little bit like the story of the gentleman who was charged with being something other than sober. His defense was that he never could be induced to take more than one drink at a bar on his way home from work. Somebody asked him why, in the light of this laudable one-drink limitation, he unfailingly arrived home in an intoxicated state. "Well," he said, "You would be suprised how many bars there are on the way home."

I do not say $10,000 is the right figure. Maybe it should be $15,000. Maybe it should be $20,000. Maybe it should be $7,500. But if we do not put an overall limitation in the bill, we shall have done only a part of the job. The present statute only invites circumvention. I need not remind my colleagues that this loophole is exploited in just about every Federal election.

I am hopeful the other provisions of the pending bill, including those raising the expenditure ceiling for congressional candidates and increasing the maximum contributions and expenditures by interested political committees, will help put an end to this duplicity. I am not certain that it will but hope the fact that it well might explains my interest in this amendment.

Basically, I share some of the misgivings of the Senator from Illinois about in any way inhibiting the participation of our people in politics and government activity. We must have an informed, alert, and active electorate if our democratic system is to operate at maximum efficiency for the greatest good to the greatest number.

I dislike running the risk of discouraging people from taking an active interest in politics by telling them they can contribute only so much in support of the candidates of their choice. On the other hand, I view with alarm the possibility that under certain circumstances large contributions to needy candidates could compromise that nominee's objectivity. What we are trying to reach is a middle ground between those two points.

As I said, whether this $10,000 limitation is the right one or not, I do not know. I have not heard any better suggestion. I would listen with interest to any amendment which sought to change that figure.

I want to call attention to the fact that back in 1955, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS] had another bill before us, Len Hall, who was then chairman of the Republican National Committee, endorsed, in his testimony, the idea of setting a ceiling on individual contributions. Many of us here know Len Hall. I served in the House with him. I have a very high regard for him. All of us, I feel certain, on both sides of the aisle, respect and admire his political acumen, and his words are worthy of study.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. KEATING. Some of the Members of the Senate are apparently not interested in the views of Mr. Len Hall. I am going to refer to Mr. Paul Butler in a moment. Perhaps there will be greater interest in his words.

Leonard Hall said in 1955 in his testimony before the Committee on Rules and Administration, on a bill very similar to the one that is now before the Senate, that he was not certain at what amount the ceiling should be set. He said he would rather leave that to the discretion of the committee. He was not sure whether $10,000 was a realistic amount or not, but he definitely favored the principle of placing a ceiling on the amount of total contributions which anyone could make.

On the same day, Mr. Paul Butler, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee, testified substantially to the same effect. Mr. Butler said he certainly believed that there should be a limit on the amount any individual can contribute, and that perhaps a limitation on all committees would be reasonable too.

The principle of the amendment we are considering today has had the general blessing of our two major political parties, although I concede that the exact amount of that limitation is the subject of some controversy.

I am pleased, furthermore, to note that the philosophy of this amendment had the backing of an eminent newspaper, the New York Times, in an editorial published the other day, to which the Senator has called attention, in connection with primaries. In this fine editorial the Times called the lack of limits on individual contributions a serious deficiency, and therefore, by implication, at least, backed the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I shall support this bill on final passage. I think it has been greatly improved on the floor. I shall support it with or without this amendment.

However, I feel it will be a much better bill, a much sounder bill, a much more meaningful bill, if the ceiling on the amount any individual can donate is included in the bill. Perhaps it can be said this will make it a tough bill. This may well be so. I happen to feel that is the kind of statute we need and that the American people want. I hope that we will not fail to add this significant amendment to the bill.

Entertaining the views which I do, I must ask that the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Illinois be defeated.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEATING. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, in looking at the amendment and the section to which it applies I cannot find that it refers in any way to organizations. Does the Senator recall in the discussions that it was the intent of the amendment or the intent of the proposed legislation to apply this restriction likewise to organizations?

Mr. KEATING. I should be glad to have the views of the distinguished Senator from Missouri in this regard. The word "Whoever," in my judgment could mean either an individual or an organization.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The word "Whoever," caught my eye. If the Senator from New York and I are correct in our understanding of that word, this would preclude organizations such as the Committee on Political Education from making contributions in excess of $10,000 in one year?

Mr. KEATING. I think the Senator from Arizona should also look at the last sentence.

> This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

However, any expenditures made by anything other than a political committee I would think would be covered by this wording.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would the Senator interpret "political committee" to be confined to the Republican or Democratic committees?

Mr. KEATING. No.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Or the Communist or any other party committee which might exist.

Mr. KEATING. I do not consider the Communist Party to be a political party. I consider that to be an international conspiracy. Since I know the views of the Senator from Arizona, I am sure he will agree with me.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do, but unfortunately the Communist Party is recognized on the ballots of some States.

Mr. KEATING. Is it?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. I did not know that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes, it is.

Mr. KEATING. This would not be limited to the Republican and Democratic Parties.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Then the language would allow an organization such as a political action committee of a union or of a chamber of commerce, representing business people, to make contributions in excess of $10,000 in one year?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know. I am not prepared to say what the court would construe to be a political committee. Certainly a chamber of commerce is not a political committee. A labor union is not a political committee. But labor unions and corporations are precluded from making contributions under other laws.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator was not in the Chamber earlier when I was trying to impress upon our good friend from Missouri that while such is the intent of the law a Supreme Court decision has pretty much clouded that intent, and labor unions now use the interpretation. I suggested that business could do likewise, but I will not go into that further.

Mr. KEATING. I was in the Chamber, occupying the chair at that time. I was very much interested in the colloquy between the Senator from Arizona and the Senator from Missouri. The reason why the Senator from Arizona thinks I was not in the Chamber is that under the rules of the Senate I was required to be silent.

Mr. GOLDWATER. It is fortunate that the rules do not extend to the Senator all the time, for it would prevent the edification of all the Members.

Mr. KEATING. I appreciate that comment by my friend.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I wanted it understood that the word "Whoever" would be directed to any person or group. In view of the last sentence on page 2 of the amendment:

> This subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee.

If there were a political action committee or a committee on political education in the labor movement, and, let us say, a committee on political education formed under the National Association of Manufacturers, would it be possible for both management and labor to circumvent what has been the intent of the law, the intent of the Taft-Hartley law and of the Corrupt Practices Act, by contributing in excess of $10,000 a year?

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the Senator from Arizona, in my judgment, under the particular wording of the amendment we are now considering, if it were a truly political committee, it would be exempt. There are other laws governing elections contributions, and specifically the Taft-Hartley law, which I would not seek to interpret here. My opinion is that under this amendment anything which is a purely political committee would be exempt.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator further argues that it is not within our province to judge what is a political committee; that that matter should be left to the courts?

Mr. KEATING. I think that we could by amendment more closely define the words, if it were the desire of the Senate to do so. I think the bill is open to further amendment. As the amendment is now worded, my construction of the amendment as worded is that it would exempt from its application anything which a court found to be a political committee.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I will conclude by saying that the proposed amendments would be much more palatable, I believe, if it applied equally to all sources of money. Its intent I can agree with.

I sat through many of the days of hearing. I do not look on the giver of $10,000 as a great threat to our Government. As one engaged in raising political money I have not found any of them. I am going to look through the committee's book to get some names. I do not think there are enough in the country to do any damage to our country. I do not consider this too serious. I know some contributors, and I know they have nothing but love for their country, and their contributions are motivated by an interest in the philosophy of the person to whom they give money.

Mr. KEATING. I am sure that is correct.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Possibly the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] might get at the problem. I hope it will. If we can define what a "political committee" is I think we shall be greatly improving the bill. Inexperienced as I am, I can see many holes in the bill already through which people can crawl if they want to do so. The elimination from this bill of organizations which are purely political but are not interpreted as being political I think is its weakest point.

Mr. KEATING. I recognize this and, as I stated before in the debate, any statute which we write on this subject is going to have holes. We cannot completely cover the fellow who is an avowed crook or who is determined to get around any statute we write, but I believe this bill does represent a substantial step forward, and I believe it will be a further step forward if we adopt the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

Mr. GOLDWATER. I ask for a division, Mr. President.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN] to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS]. A division has been requested.

On a division, the amendments to the amendments were rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the second amendment, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On line 18, page 2, it is proposed to strike the word "not"; at the end of line 19 on page 2, it is proposed to insert the following language: "or by any committee which engages in the following activities: Compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records, political training courses, getting workers registered, paying election day workers, providing automobiles to get voters to the polls, political meetings."

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I shall not take long in explanation of the amendment. Earlier in the day, in the colloquy with my friend from Missouri, he asked what specific recommendation I had to make. I had nothing ready at the time. When I discovered the word "Whoever" at the beginning of this section, I felt it might adequately cover the subject we were discussing. However, when I discovered on page 2 of the proposed amendment the exception to political activities, without an understanding of just what a political committee is, I thought it was proper to suggest that we cover the whole field, to be fair.

As the amendment now stands, without the proposed language in it, it would be a very simple thing to keep down to the $10,000 limit, by merely forming a committee on political education in any business or in any labor organization or in any association at all, and by finding a sufficient number of people who could contribute under the $10,000 limit any amount of money could be contributed that could be obtained.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. I find some appeal in the amendment. However, can the Senator tell me whether his amendment would include chambers of commerce?

Mr. GOLDWATER. If a chamber of commerce wanted to establish a Committee on Political Education; yes. Under the Senator's understanding of the interpretation of the Supreme Court in United States against United Auto Workers, they could do this. It applies to all.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. A chamber of commerce does mail out a great deal of voting literature.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; it applies across the board.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. It seems to me that if the Senator wishes to provide for such an amendment—and it has much appeal to me—it should apply to both business and labor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am not aiming this amendment specifically at labor, although I recognize that my friends on the other side of the aisle, and many on this side of the aisle also, will say I am. I have made myself perfectly clear across the length and breadth of this country that the activities engaged in by labor unions under the guise of education will be used to a great extent or to an equal extent by the business fraternity. When that day comes, we will not have parties based upon separate philosophies, but parties based upon one basic philosophy, which is economics. Labor and management are interested in one and the same thing. It is money. It is economics. It is anything you want to call it. The participation of unions, and the participation of those who are working for the Constitution or against the Constitution, will all go by the board, and only men who will become beholden to big business or big labor will ever be able to get any substantial backing.

I am not confining my amendment to labor. I use what they are doing as an illustration because under the interpretation of the Supreme Court, business can likewise do it. Committees engaged in compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records come under the amendment. Any committee conducting training classes comes under the amendment. The pay that is used for getting workers registered, and any group that is occupied in getting workers registered other than a group of the two parties, are included. So are election day workers. That is clearly a political activity, and no one needs a Supreme Court decision to know that.

Providing automobiles to get voters to the polling places is political activity. So are political meetings. Any committee which is engaged in that kind of activity I feel should come under the restrictions of the amendment. If that is so, I will be very happy to vote for it.

Mr. LONG of Louisiana. Of course there is one thing the Senator cannot regulate, and I do not believe any amendment could apply to it, and that is the contribution which can be made by a large newspaper. I believe that under the freedom of the press principle guaranteed in the Constitution we cannot say what a newspaper shall do, regardless of whether it is distributing voting records. I do not believe we would ever be able to regulate that activity. That being the case, it must be apparent to the Senator that no matter how we try to tighten up the bill we cannot overcome the effect of a newspaper, for example, writing an editorial condemning him, for example, and praising his opponent.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The case I referred to, United States against United Automobile Workers, applied to that point. The court held that the union was issuing a publication and that it had the right to editorialize in any way it desired. I cannot find any fault with that. I certainly would not want my own company publication restricted to only what I myself wanted to say. It would be a very serious infringement upon freedom of expression and the freedom of the press. So we are not talking about newspapers here. The courts have decided that point. That is what started all this circumvention and the attempt of the Taft-Hartley Act to prohibit labor unions and management from participating in politics.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. AIKEN. I notice that every week the New York Times prints the voting records of Members of Congress from Connecticut, New York City, and northern New Jersey. Would the amendment restrict that in any way?

Mr. GOLDWATER. No; I do not believe we can do that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I fear the Senator from Arizona, in seeking to achieve a certain objective, has run afoul of another. I understand he is now stating that this amendment should apply to contributions or expenditures made by a political committee and others. Would that not prevent the Arizona Republican Committee from spending more than $10,000 for the reelection of the Senator from Arizona, and likewise the Senator from New York? I fear it would limit the total amount which any political committee could spend to $10,000, which certainly would not be adequate to elect a Senator in New York State, and perhaps in Maine, as the occupant of the chair knows, and possibly in Arizona. So I suggest it might need some amendment in order to prevent all of us from being eliminated from this body, which would be a disaster for the country.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Will the Senator allow me to study that a moment? He may have a valid point.

Mr. President, I ask that the Senate allow me a moment to consider what the Senator from New York has pointed out.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois will state it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Did the Senator from Illinois want me to yield for any purpose?

Mr. DOUGLAS. No; I simply did not observe the Senator from Arizona at his desk.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator from Arizona is rather difficult to find at times.

Mr. President, I believe the Senator from New York has a valid argument. I would modify my amendment to include the word "not" and to change the language as I have just changed it at the desk. May I have it read?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, as modified, will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 19, it is proposed to strike the period following the word "committees" and insert the following: ", but will apply to any committee which engages in any of the following activities: compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records; political training classes; getting workers registered; paying election day workers; providing automobiles to get voters to the polls; and political meetings."

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I have already proposed all the arguments I have on this question. I thank the Senator from New York for pointing out to me that I would have inadvertently made it possible for either political party to operate.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Is there anything in the amendment which would prohibit a present Member of the Senate from mailing out hundreds of thousands of speeches or letters all over his State at Government expense, and thereby having an advantage over a person not in office who was trying to get into office?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I may say, without having studied that particular question, but simply talking off the top of my hat, that a Senator might come under the provisions of this amendment, if it could be shown that he used in excess of $10,000 of franking privilege. I think it would be a very difficult matter to be included in this amendment, but it might be stretched that far. I would not be fearful of that.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I have served on a special committee with the able junior Senator from Arizona. I know with what deep conscientiousness he moves in this matter. I suggest to him, however, from a cursory reading of his amendment, that he proposes to limit the expenditures of the Republican National Committee and the Democratic National Committee, as well as all other committees which engage in the function which he has described, to $10,000 per annum. I simply do not believe that he wishes to do that.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not believe that that would be possible, because the language provides "political committees."

The trouble in the field we are talking about is that we have never had clearly defined what political activity is. I think we have had clearly defined what a political committee is, and I think the national committees of both parties would certainly come within the field in which we are operating, the one with which I am concerned. But we have never had defined in this country, to my knowledge, what political activity is. We as politicians and ordinary citizens know, more or less, what political activity is; but when we get to the law, we do not know what it is. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator further yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The activities of the political action committee of one of the labor organizations have been the subject of litigation. If, indeed, the Court determined that those activities were political, then they are prohibited by law.

The clerk has just read the language of the Senator's amendment; and if the Senator will yield, I should like to ask that the language be read again, because I now have the Hennings amendment before me. I have asked for a copy of the Senator's amendment, but it is not in form.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Legible form.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask that the Goldwater amendment again be read. Will the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Surely.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arizona will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 19, it is proposed to strike the period and insert a comma and the following: "but will apply to any committee which engages in the following activities: compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records; political training classes; getting workers registered; paying election day workers; providing automobiles to get voters to the polls; and political meetings."

Mr. GORE. If that is not what the State Democratic campaign committee of Tennessee does, I do not know what it does do.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The State Democratic committee in Tennessee is exempt, in my estimation, under the preceding language, which includes political committees.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I have yielded to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. I wish to suggest that the national committees engage in precisely the functions described by the amendment of the able Senator. I realize—at least I think I realize—that the Senator from Arizona wants to get at the activities of committees other than political committees; but in attempting to do so, I respectfully suggest that it is my view that he has circumscribed the activities of the national committees of the two political parties.

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is certainly entitled to his interpretation. I do not feel that my amendment would apply to them. I think the original language would have applied to them, had I not followed the suggestion of the Senator from New York [Mr. KEATING] and taken another look at it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I have just gone to the desk and read the text of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arizona. I want to see if my understanding is correct. The Senator from Arizona wrote: "but will apply to any committee which engages in the following activities."

Then the sheet was blank.

Then the words: "compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records. Political training classes. Getting workers registered. Paying election-day workers. Providing automobiles to get voters to the polls. Political meetings" were read from the final page of a publication entitled "Nation's Business," issued by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce in July 1959. Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. GOLDWATER. The Senator is correct. I do not think he would expect to find it in any publication of COPE.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand Nation's Business for July 1959. In a box there is a list beginning, "Compiling, publishing, and distributing voting records," and so on, which the clerk enumerated as a part of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is absolutely correct. May I ask the Senator from Illinois if he believes it is proper for labor to engage in these activities, but not to allow anyone else to engage in them?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, no; I am merely trying to identify the source of the Senator's amendment, and to point out that it had not been written out, and that the crucial paragraph was taken verbatim from a report by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States. I am not condemning the Senator in the slightest.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not share the great dislike of the Senator from Illinois for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

If he wishes to examine the other sources of my amendment, he is perfectly welcome to do so.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I merely wished to establish the fact that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona had not been written out, and that the salient portion of the amendment had been copied from a page in a pamphlet issued in 1959 by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am not particularly ashamed of that source; I have respect for American businessmen. If they write something, and if it is the only source that is available, I am willing to use it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not attempting to condemn the Senator from Arizona; I am merely pointing out the historic origin of that language.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Now that the Senator from Illinois has established it, I am sure he has made a great contribution to the law. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield to me?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. As I understand the Senator's amendment—and I concede in advance that I am about to state an oversimplification of its meaning—it provides that the overall limitation shall not apply to a "political committee."

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. But that it shall apply to any group of people who engage in what is normally considered to be political activity.

The difficulty is that any statute must be construed by the courts; and I am in great doubt as to what the courts beginning with the district courts, and finally arriving at the Supreme Court of the United States—would say was the proper construction or interpretation of this language.

When it is proposed to have this measure provide that the limitation shall not apply to a "political committee," but that it shall apply to a committee which performs a political function, I respectfully suggest to the Senator from Arizona that the proper interpretation of that language might be very difficult for a court; the court might find the meaning of the language very perplexing.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I do not share the concern of the Senator from New York, although it is quite possible that his legal background may give him some cause for worry about the meaning of the amendment. However, I believe the language of the amendment to be sufficiently clear.

I believe that in the course of the debate we have established what such a provision will apply to and what it will not apply to.

I merely wish to have this measure amended in such a way that it will be applied across the board, rather than have us aim our guns and direct our bullets at only one segment of the American people.

Mr. KEATING. I realize that the Senator from Arizona is perfectly sincere in the expression of that sentiment, and that he wants this measure to apply right across the board, instead of being directed at any particular activities or groups.

Mr. GOLDWATER. That is correct.

Mr. KEATING. But I must disagree with the Senator from Arizona as to the legal effect of the amendment he proposes to the Hennings amendment. I believe it would be very difficult to arrive at the correct interpretation of the meaning of the amendment, if it were to be amended with the language suggested by the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, earlier in the day, in the course of colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Missouri, I was specifically asked where in the measure I would propose to insert this language. I may say now what I said at that time: I had been of the opinion that this matter would not be discussed during the floor debate on this bill, for there is now before the Supreme Court a case coming from the Georgia courts, which held that the spending of dues money for political purposes was wrong.

If the Supreme Court upholds the decision of the Georgia court, I do not believe that decision will apply to the particular problem I have raised here. Therefore, I have asked that this amendment to the pending amendment be considered.

Now that I have exhausted my argument, at the moment, I am willing to have the vote taken on an amendment to the Hennings amendment.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield.

Mr. KUCHEL. I am quite appreciative of what my good friend, the Senator from Arizona, seeks to accomplish.

Mr. HENNINGS. I must confess that I might have given some encouragement to my learned friend when I asked him what he had to propose; and since then we have had colloquy for a period of one hour and a half.

I shall not discuss this matter further. I have respect for the views of the Senator from Arizona; but I do not agree with him. I believe the amendment has been hastily drafted, and I believe it should not be made a part of the pending measure, even though I fully appreciate the interest of the Senator from Arizona in improving this measure insofar as that may be possible.

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I was about to ask a question.

In the pending bill, a "political committee" is defined. The amendment the Senator from Missouri proposes would place a new ceiling—one of $10,000—on contributions; but the amendment would except "political committees." That much is clear.

Mr. HENNINGS. That is to say——

Mr. KUCHEL. Mr. President, I do not wish to be interrupted until I have completed my question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The Senator from California has the floor.

Mr. HENNINGS. I did not mean to interrupt the Senator from California. I realize that he wishes to ask a question.

Mr. KUCHEL. Yes, I do.

Am I not correct when I say that "political committees," as defined in the pending bill, are excepted?

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from California is exactly correct; and he has understood that all along.

Mr. KUCHEL. Then am I correct—I am, am I not—when I say that if I were to contribute $1 million to a political committee, as that term is defined in this bill, I would comply with that provision? Is that correct?

Mr. HENNINGS. No; I am sorry to say the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. KUCHEL. But political committees are excepted; and when they are excepted, it is clear that this measure will not apply to political committees.

Mr. HENNINGS. We have placed a limitation upon the political committees, the national committees, with respect to the parties.

Mr. KUCHEL. But when the Senator's amendment provides that "this subsection shall not apply to contributions or expenditures by a political committee"——

Mr. CLARK. Those made by a political committee. Those to a political committee are prohibited.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not understand what the distinguished Senator's dilemma is.

Mr. KUCHEL. I have several dilemmas.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am referring to the present one. I thought the Senator from California had a very clear understanding of the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield to me?

Mr. KUCHEL. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator from California will find that the limitation on an individual—namely, a limitation of $5,000, as to any one candidate or committee—would apply, but that if the amendment of the Senator from Missouri were adopted and were enacted into law, it would not be permissible for a person to give an aggregate of $1 million. I believe that is correct. In that situation there would be a $5,000 ceiling or limitation per candidate or per committee.

Mr. KUCHEL. Let me ask whether the Senator from Missouri agrees as to that.

Mr. HENNINGS. I do not agree with all of it; no. [Laughter.]

I have been agreeing or disagreeing all afternoon. I hope I understood what the Senator said. Of course, all of us have engaged in extended colloquy.

Let me say that I am prepared to vote on this amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I offer, and send to the desk, a substitute for the Goldwater amendment to the Hennings amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MUSKIE in the chair). The substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is not now in order; for the reason that it would be in the third degree.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Would the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska be in order if I were to withdraw my amendment to the Hennings amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Arizona withdraws his amendment to the Hennings amendment, the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska will be in order as an amendment to the Hennings amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Then, Mr. President, I withdraw my amendment to the Hennings amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri has been withdrawn.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, in line 19, of the Hennings amendment, it is proposed to strike out the words "political committee" and to insert "a duly organized local, State, or national committee of a national political party or by a candidate."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, here is what this amendment would do. If the Hennings amendment is to be adopted, fixing a $10,000 total limit on the amount that anyone can contribute—the provision being "Whoever" contributes that amount—the exception provided in the last two lines would be for the candidate himself. Why? Because another section of the bill fixes limits for him.

It would also exempt from the first part of the Hennings amendment a local, State, or national committee of a national political party.

In other words, our duly organized political parties would be subject to the limitations written in the bill, S. 2436. The limitation on what a candidate could expend would be the limitations written into the bill, S. 2436. But, with the exception of our duly organized political parties and the candidates, the $10,000 limitation would apply to anyone. The word in the language of the amendment is "whoever." We have established a record here that that word means everyone. It means a person, a corporation, an association, or any group.

I submit that if we are going to have a $10,000 limitation on the total amount that can be contributed by any giver throughout the whole United States, we should apply it to everybody. Obviously it cannot apply to the candidates, because they are governed by another section. It cannot apply to the political parties, because they are governed by another section.

Let us be fair about this. If we are going to have a $10,000 limitation on the total amount that a donor can give, let us treat everyone alike. Let us treat the chamber of commerce and COPE alike. Let us treat every individual alike.

If we are to put this ceiling into effect, violation of which carries a criminal penalty, let us have it apply across the board.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. KEATING. I am not exactly sure that I heard the precise wording of the Senator's amendment. We have in New York State a party called the Liberal Party. That party does not appear in other States. It corrals a considerable number of votes. The Liberal Party did not support me in the last election, but I certainly would not consider it fair to impose a limitation as to contributions on that party which was not imposed on the Republican and Democratic Parties.

I fear that the wording of the Senator's amendment would exempt the Republican and Democratic Parties, which are duly organized units of a national political party, but would not exempt the Liberal Party of New York, which is a recognized party in the State, but is not of a national character.

I would not consider supporting the amendment unless the Liberal Party were properly protected. Perhaps I am in error in my interpretation.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. The Senator from New York has stated the case precisely, and has stated it well. As he has set it forth, it comports entirely with this amendment and with the intentions of those who support it.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I seek to modify my amendment by inserting, after the words "a duly organized local, State, or national committee of a national political party" the words, "or of a State political party."

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. How would this amendment affect an independent candidate who was running independently of any party?

Mr. CURTIS. It would not affect him at all, because the amendment does not apply to candidates. The purpose of this amendment is that, with the exception of candidates and duly organized political parties, a $10,000 limitation shall apply. I think that is fair. I think that is just. If we are going to put a limit on the donors to one political party, we should put a limit on the donors to another political party. If we are going to put a limitation on a donor to a group of candidates, we should put a limitation on the donor to another group of candidates.

It is obvious that this provision should not apply to the duly organized political parties, because they are the vehicles by which the national or State effort can be organized to carry out our system of self-government under a two-party system. Furthermore, we have fixed their limits in the bill. The same is true of candidates. We have determined what the limits are on a candidate's spending.

Now, if we are to put a limit on other donors, and start out with the word "whoever"; let us say that whoever does that shall come under this provision, and not have any exemptions other than those already provided for in a different section of the bill.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska probably does meet the objection I voiced a moment ago about the Liberal Party. However, I wish to point out that we have in New York City the Fusion Party, and that party develops quite a few votes in various elections. Indeed, some Republicans—quite a few Republicans—adhere to program of the Fusion Party.

The Fusion Party is not a duly organized unit of either a national party or a State party. It spends vastly more than $10,000. It elected former Mayor La Guardia in New York. The party is made up of some of the finest people in this land, I may say, and I think it would be a very great mistake to inhibit members of that party, and I believe they would be inhibited under this provision. Whereas Democrats, Republicans, and Liberals could spend any amount, the poor Fusion Party would be able to spend only $10,000. It may well be that the next mayor of New York will be a Fusion Party candidate, and unfortunately he would come under the restrictions of this amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. It is apparent that the Senator from New York does not favor a $10,000 limitation on a donor. Is that correct?

Mr. KEATING. I do. I intend to vote for this amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. Then let us apply it to all donors. A limit is fixed in a separate section for political parties, including State political parties and local and State committees of State and national parties. A limit is fixed in another section for candidates. Are we going to embark upon a procedure of saying some donors can give without limit, but other donors cannot?

I submit that there are many problems in regard to this proposal, but I think we should do one of two things—we should apply it across the board, or else withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Will the distinguished Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. I agree. That is the very point I am making. I ask the distinguished Senator from Nebraska whether he thinks it would be fair, in the next mayoralty election in the city of New York, to permit the Republicans to collect and spend over $10,000, to permit the Democrats to collect and spend over $10,000, to permit the Liberal Party to collect and spend over $10,000, but to limit the Fusion Party to an expenditure of $10,000? One cannot elect a mayor of New York for $10,000.

Mr. CURTIS. This is a Federal election law. It has nothing to do with the mayor of New York. I wish we could give the Senator some help as to cleaning up the iniquity in that great city, but we are without power to do it or to regulate it. There is nothing we can do to add or detract from the noble efforts of the distinguished Senator from New York to establish purity in the great city of New York.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield to me further?

Mr. CURTIS. I yield.

Mr. KEATING. It is to establish purity that I am bringing out these very points. It is because we hope in 1961 to be able to elect a Fusion candidate for mayor in New York, and the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska would virtually spell the death knell——

Mr. CURTIS. No, no.

Mr. KEATING. To the election of the Fusion candidate for mayor.

Mr. CURTIS. No.

Mr. KEATING. Because we could not spend over $10,000 if there happened to be some candidate for Congress running at the same time The Fusion candidate for mayor would not be in a fair position, if we made this apply to the Republicans, to the Democrats, and to the Liberals, but not to other political parties which may not be organized under either Federal or State law.

Mr. CURTIS. I submit that the Congress of the United States——

Mr. KEATING. The Senator from Nebraska, unwittingly, would prevent us from electing a Fusion candidate for mayor of New York, who might very well at this moment be under the Republican label.

Mr. CURTIS. It is not within the power of the Congress to control expenditures of a candidate for mayor of New York. In fact, I doubt if we can control anybody's expenditures [laughter], but certainly in that city it cannot be done, from a legal standpoint.

The distinguished Senator is not going to contend that the Congress could interfere with a municipal election in that city, is he?

Mr. KEATING. No; but does not the Senator realize if there were a vacancy in Congress and if there were a candidate for Representative in Congress running on the Fusion ticket at the same time the mayoralty election was being held, the Senator's amendment would prohibit the expenditure of more than $10,000 in that campaign? We are directing all of our efforts toward cleaning up New York, and we wish to do it with a Fusion ticket, and the Senator from Nebraska would interfere with our activity.

Mr. CURTIS. No, no; there is not a thing in the world to prevent the people of New York from having a committee to finance the candidate for mayor. Not a thing in the world is involved. I regret that the Senator is trying to impose a limit of $10,000 on some donors and trying to exempt others.

Mr. President, let us vote.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. CURTIS] to the amendments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENNINGS].

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. GORE obtained the floor.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, "1–20–60—C," which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following——

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIRKSEN. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Missouri and of the Senator from Nebraska, I think we had an agreement earlier in the week that the language which makes it necessary for a candidate to make every reasonable effort to ascertain what committees in the State are, in his cause, spending money, and so forth—which, of course, puts the candidate in the position of having to be a policeman—was offensive language, and should be stricken from the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I agree with the Senator. Furthermore, the adoption of the Hennings amendment, as amended, requiring intrastate committees to make a Federal report, makes the language unnecessary.

Mr. HENNINGS. I quite agree with the Senator. That language was put in as a compromise, I will say to the distinguished minority leader, in order to get the bill to the Senate. Some of us disagreed with it at the time.

I am glad the ranking minority member of the committee agrees to having the language eliminated.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, the amendment is at the desk. I have no further discussion of the matter. I offer the amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all language from and including line 14 on page 9 to and including line 9 on page 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I wish to congratulate my colleague in regard to this amendment. The bill in its original form imposed upon the candidates the obligation of finding, any place in a State, expenditures made on their behalf. I think there should be a responsibility upon the individuals and upon other groups, but we cannot make a candidate responsible for things he does not know about.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The Senator is correct.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Since it is so seldom my colleague and I agree, I want to say I appreciate very much what he has done and I want to congratulate him. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer my amendment "1–20–60—C" and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 13, after line 21, it is proposed to insert the following:

(c) Candidates for election as President and Vice President who are nominees of a political party, in their campaign for election, shall not make expenditures in excess of an amount equal to the amount obtained by multiplying 20 cents by the largest number of voters casting votes for presidential electors in any one of the last three preceding elections. For the purpose of the limitation prescribed in this subsection, there shall be included the expenditures made by or on behalf of either or both candidates.

(d) A candidate for nomination for the office of President or Vice President, in his campaign for such nomination, shall not make expenditures in an amount in excess of 50 per centum of the amount prescribed in subsection (c), above.

On page 13, line 22, strike out "(c)" and insert "(e)".

On page 8, line 8, beginning with the comma, strike out down to and including the comma on line 9, page 8.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may ask the acting majority leader a question?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Is it now the program to adjourn for the rest of the day and to be in session tomorrow?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I understand that the distinguished Senator from Missouri will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee and that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND] has an amendment, as to which he will not spend more than 5 minutes.

Mr. THURMOND. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Forty-five minutes. We shall be adjourning until tomorrow, I hope, after we finish consideration of this amendment.

Mr. HENNINGS. Will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. HENNINGS. I am glad to say the amendment offered by our colleague, the very able junior Senator from Tennessee, is completely in harmony with the philosophy and purposes of the bill. It was considered. The only reason it was not embodied in the bill or in one of the amendments is that there was some objection raised in regard to the matter of candidates for the Presidency having to report. However, I see no objection to the amendment other than that, which was rather trivial.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in view of the fact that there seems to be little possibility that we shall finish our consideration of the bill tonight, since there are at least two more amendments to be considered, I should like to suggest that the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina be read, that the Senator be given time to discuss it, and that no further votes be taken. I suggest we reach an agreement to adjourn tonight to meet at 12 o'clock tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MANSFIELD. If that is satisfactory, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourn tonight, it adjourn to meet at 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

Mr. THURMOND and Mr. RANDOLPH addressed the Chair.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I should like to ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I think the time to ask for the yeas and nays would be after the amendment is stated.

Mr. THURMOND. I shall be glad to call up the amendment at this time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I withdraw my unanimous-consent request, and the Chair can recognize the Senator from South Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator wish to have the amendment read in full?

Mr. THURMOND. No; I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with. It is in printed form and has been on the desks of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment offered by Mr. THURMOND is as follows:

On page 14, between lines 14 and 15, insert the following:

"POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS BY LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

"SEC. 209. (a) No labor organization shall—

"(1) make a contribution or expenditure for the purpose of influencing an election or a primary, political convention, or caucus held to select candidates, or

"(2) make a contribution to any committee, association, or organization, whether political or nonpolitical in nature, which makes contributions or expenditures for the purpose of influencing an election or a primary, political convention, or caucus held to select candidates, except a contribution or an expenditure which is made (A) in connection with the publication or distribution of a newspaper or periodical intended for distribution primarily to members of such labor organization or other communication which is primarily limited to such members, or (B) for the purpose of disseminating impartial statements of the issues in the election, primary, convention, or caucus and the position of the labor organization on such issues, or (C) for the purpose of presenting an impartial news program or news documentary through the medium of radio or television, or the presentation of opposing candidates in a panel discussion, debate, or similar type program.

"(b) A labor organization which makes a contribution or expenditure prohibited by subsection (a)—

"(1) shall not thereafter be certified or recognized as the representative of any employees by the National Labor Relations Board or any other department or agency of the Government, or be eligible to file an unfair labor practice charge under section 10(b) of the National Labor Relations Act, or to file with any department or agency of the Government any other charge, complaint, or petition as the representative of or on behalf of any employees, or

"(2) shall not thereafter be entitled to any exemption or benefit under sections 6 and 20 of the Act entitled "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes", approved October 15, 1914, as amended (15 U.S.C. 17; 29 U.S.C. 52) or the Act of March 23, 1932 (29 U.S.C. 101 et seq.), and

"(3) shall not during the taxable year following the year in which such contribution or expenditure is made be exempt from Federal income tax under section 501(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

"(c) Any person who accepts any contribution prohibited by subsection (a), and any officer of a labor organization who consents to any contribution or expenditure by the labor organization prohibited by subsection (a), shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, or if the violation was willful shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

"(d) As used in this section, the term 'labor organization' means any organization of any kind, or any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment or conditions of work."

On page 19, between lines 3 and 4, insert the following:

"CONTRIBUTIONS BY NATIONAL BANKS AND CORPORATIONS

"SEC. 304. (a) Section 610 of title 18, United States Code, is amended to read as follows:

"'It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section.

"'Every corporation which makes any contribution or expenditure in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $10,000; and every officer or director of any corporation who consents to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation, and any person who accepts or receives any contributions, in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both; and if the violation was willful, shall be fined not more than $10,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.'

"(b) The heading of such section is amended to read as follows:

"'§ 610. Contributions or expenditures by national banks or corporations'

"(c) That portion of the analysis at the head of chapter 29 of title 18 of the United States Code which reads:

"'610. Contributions or expenditures by national banks, corporations, or labor organizations.'" is amended to read as follows:

"'610. Contributions or expenditures by national banks or corporations.'"

On page 2, in the table of contents, after the item relating to "Sec. 209" insert the following new item:

"SEC. 210. Political contributions by labor organizations."

and redesignate the items relating to sections 210 to 212, inclusive, as 211 to 213, respectively.

On page 2, in the table of contents, after the item relating to "SEC. 209" insert the following new item:

"SEC. 304. Contributions by national banks and corporations."

and redesignate the item relating to section 304 as 305.

Renumber sections 209 to 212, inclusive, as 210 to 213, respectively.

On page 19, line 5, strike out "SEC. 304" and insert "SEC. 305".

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I wished to be sure of the understanding which was implied, that there will be no further rollcall votes tonight.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There will be no further rollcalls tonight.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the intention to complete action on the bill tonight?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It was the intention to complete action today, if possible. We shall try to do so tomorrow. However, I cannot promise that we can do so.

Mr. CURTIS. It would be necessary to announce tomorrow that rollcalls would be postponed until Monday. I am not asking that that be done.

Mr. MANSFIELD. It is the intention of the leadership to complete action on the bill tomorrow. It will be necessary to complete action on two amendments, which I understand are the only ones left for consideration. There will be a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. THURMOND]. I do not know what the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. KEFAUVER] will desire. I assume there will be a yea-and-nay vote on final passage.

I understand also that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] has an amendment. There will be no further yea-and-nay votes today. Does the Senator from South Carolina wish to postpone presentation of his statement on his amendment until tomorrow, or does he wish to present it tonight?

Mr. THURMOND. I would prefer to do it tomorrow.

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. President, we have been hoping for the past 2 or 3 days to achieve the ultimate result of disposing of the pending legislation.

Mr. MANSFIELD. The Senator has been most helpful.

Mr. HENNINGS. I appreciate very much the expression of the assistant majority leader, my distinguished colleague.

I appreciate the cooperation of the distinguished assistant minority leader [Mr. KUCHEL]. Of course, we cannot control the number of amendments. Speaking for myself, let me say that I have no further amendments to offer. We have considered and agreed to four amendments. I still have perfecting amendments relating to the title of the bill and the effective date.

As the distinguished acting majority leader has suggested, there are four amendments on the desks of Senators left to be disposed of.

Mr. MANSFIELD. There are three amendments.

Mr. HENNINGS. There are the Long amendment, the Kefauver amendment, and the pending amendment, the Thurmond amendment.

ORDER FOR ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business tonight it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE 136TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEN. THOMAS JONATHAN "STONEWALL" JACKSON

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I speak in commemoration of the 136th anniversary of the birth of one of the most illustrious sons of West Virginia and of our Nation. On January 21, 1824, Thomas Jonathan Jackson—later known to his troops and to the world as "Stonewall"—was born in Clarksburg, (West) Virginia.

I had a call from friends in the Harrison County seat city expressing the hope that appropriate mention of the anniversary be made today. It is a privilege to especially commend the research and tangible efforts of the Honorable Joseph Z. Terrell and S. J. Birshtein, both of Clarksburg. They, with hundreds of West Virginians, have focused merited attention on Stonewall Jackson.

HIS LIFE IS AN INSPIRATION TO ALL

Though a man of mildness and mercy, the genius of Stonewall Jackson was crystallized in the fiery crucible of war. But today, he is acclaimed first as an American, for though he served a partisan cause with zealous devotion to duty, the moral qualities which infused his acts are those which should inspire all Americans.

His perfect truthfulness, his self-abnegation, his modesty in victory and his courage in defeat, his personal tenderness to his men while maintaining the iron rule of duty—these are but a few of his virtues which were acknowledged by members of both sides of that dreadful conflict. Thus, today it is the spirit of the man which has transcended even the genius of the military strategist.

On May 10, 1863, Stonewall Jackson died from wounds inflicted by his own troops in the confusion surrounding the Battle of Chancellorsville. On May 13, in the Nation's Capital which he had sought to capture, the Daily Chronicle ended its editorial eulogy with the statement that—

> Stonewall Jackson was a great general, a brave soldier, a noble Christian, and a pure man.

On that same day, President Lincoln wrote in appreciation of the soldier who had served the Union with the same devotion and gallantry he later gave to the Confederacy, stating to the editor of the Chronicle that—

> I wish to lose no time in thanking you for the excellent and manly article in the Chronicle on Stonewall Jackson.

FAME OF STONEWALL JACKSON IS UNIVERSAL

Thus, today, we acknowledge the words of the great Victorian military leader, Field Marshall Viscount Wolseley, that—

> The fame of Stonewall Jackson is no longer the exclusive property of Virginia and the South; it has become the birthright of every man privileged to call himself an American.

Today, we are again engaged in conflict, and in a conflict which in its own way is more deadly in its implications than that between the North and the South. We could not now be better served than by the spirit, the firm resolve, and the consciousness of duty of Stonewall Jackson when he wrote that—

> We must think of the living and those who are to come after us and see that, by God's blessing, we transmit to them the freedom we have ourselves inherited.

THE CASE FOR THE SOUTH

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I take pleasure in calling to the attention of the Senate the recent publication of a book entitled "The Case for the South," which has been written by the very able and distinguished newsman, Col. W. D. Workman, Jr., of Columbia, S.C. This book is the most eloquent and factual account I have read on the South's position in the current controversy over school segregation. It is a book which should be read by all fair and open-minded Americans who are anxious to obtain for their own consideration a true and objective picture of how and why the great majority of southerners feel as they do about preserving separate and equal school facilities for the children of the white and Negro races in their own area.

This book contains facts that have never been able to penetrate the Paper Curtain which has been thrown up by many news media outside southern borders in an effort to hide or distort the strong case for the South. Every southerner should purchase one copy for himself—I too learned some facts from reading the book—and one or more copies to send to friends behind the Paper Curtain.

I know of no person more capable of presenting the case for the South than Bill Workman. Besides possessing a keen insight into the southern mind, Bill Workman is a skilled researcher, a polished writer, a brilliant analyst, and a tireless worker. He has clearly illustrated every one of these high qualities in this great work. For this superb job he merits the gratitude of our Southland, the millions of others who share our views, and all objective-minded Americans who desire only to have the facts, no more and no less.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed at this point in my remarks a news article about this book which appeared in a number of newspapers, a review of the book which appeared in the January 20, 1960, issue of the Charleston (S.C.) Evening Post, and an editorial from the Charleston Evening Post of the same date.

There being no objection, the article, review, and editorial were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Charleston Evening Post, Jan. 20, 1960]

WORKMAN'S BOOK PRESENTS THE CASE FOR THE SOUTH

In "The Case for the South" William D. Workman, Jr., hammers home a point he considers to be at the heart of the segregation-integration issue, namely, the principle laid down by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1896.

In sanctioning separate but equal facilities, as within the constitutional rights of the States, the high tribunal that year declared: "If the races are to meet upon terms of social equality, it must be the result of natural affinities, a mutual appreciation of each other's merits, and a voluntary consent of the individuals. * * * Legislation is powerless to eradicate racial instincts based upon physical differences, and the attempt to do so can only result in accentuating the difficulties of the present situation."

Mr. Workman predicated his book on the race relations formula which the Court set forth in 1896. "To the extent that the principles laid down in that formula are ignored, repressed, or suppressed, so will the cause of racial amity be retarded," the author states.

Never has the South's case been more articulately presented than in Mr. Workman's book. It is an eloquent plea for sanity in the approach to the problem of adjusting to racial differences, as well as a plea for the rights and powers which the U.S. Constitution specifically reserved to the States. It exposes the falsehoods, the ignorance, and the misunderstanding which enter into the libeling and slandering of this section, and which have misled honest "do-gooders" who have been seduced by the propaganda of malicious agitators and vote-greedy politicians of other sections.

Mr. Workman takes on all comers: the politicians who compete for the support of Negro and other voting blocs in northern cities; the AFL–CIO leaders who are soulmates of the NAACP; the publishers and writers who play up racial incidents in the South while censoring or suppressing news of the even greater number of such incidents in their own areas; the churchmen who would add the Supreme Court's 1954 flat to the Decalogue; the moderates who have done the South and the Nation a disservice "by their failure to reflect the intensity of southern resentment and resistance to integration;" and others who, whether with good or evil intentions, would subject the South to a new era of Reconstruction.

Mr. Workman, it is hardly necessary to say, is kindly disposed toward the Negro, and is concerned over the problem of their progress and their rights. This is evidenced, among other things, by his condemnation of hate organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan. This attitude, in fact, is that of the great majority of southern white people, blind as the outside calumniators may be to that fact. Mr. Workman gives his views as to how that progress can be achieved, through friendly cooperation on the part of the whites. He points out that much of the legislation enacted in the Southern States has been aimed basically at preserving domestic tranquillity as well as racial integrity. "This," he notes, "is especially true in the fields of education and recreation where indiscriminate mingling of the races is bound to bring discord and strife."

Disturbance after disturbance in such integration centers as New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, and Washington testify to that grim fact of life.

The central theme running through Mr. Workman's book is opposition to compulsory racial integration, both as a matter of principle and as unwise and dangerous in practice. The South's pattern of segregation was, as Mr. Workman stresses, upheld by earlier Supreme Court decisions which sanctioned "separate but equal facilities." That principle had for decades been accepted and universally recognized as a fundamental law of the land, only to be arbitrarily overturned by the Warren Court, which sought to demolish the very structure that predecessor courts had been instrumental in erecting.

"The Case for the South" is a thoughtful, fact-packed, trenchant presentation of the South's position. It traces the history of race relations, and discusses the subject in all its aspects—constitutional, political, economic, and social. It will be welcomed by most southerners, and should prove of high educational value to many people in other sections.

It is not likely to enjoy a favorite reception in quarters hostile to the South, but readers whose minds are not sealed in antisouthern prejudice are likely to revise their views. It strikes sharp blows at malice, hypocrisy, and shabby politics. At long last a northern book publishing company has opened presses to an eloquent voice from the South.

COLUMBIA, S.C.—A South Carolina newspaperman, W. D. Workman, Jr., has undertaken the job of presenting "The Case for the South" in a new book due for publication in January.

The 320-page book, portraying the southern view on race relations and States rights, is described by several prominent southerners as a major contribution to an understanding of regional attitudes. Workman, a veteran news correspondent for several newspapers and other publications, terms his book "an effort to explain—to the southerner as well as to the nonsoutherner—why the South holds firm to such time-tested ideals as racial integrity and local self-government."

Commendations of the manuscript have come from such well-known figures as James F. Byrnes, former U.S. Supreme Court Justice and Secretary of State; Senators Strom Thurmond, of South Carolina, Harry F. Byrd, of Virginia, and Richard B. Russell, of Georgia; Gen. Mark W. Clark; Gov. Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina; and the Right Reverend Albert S. Thomas, retired bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of South Carolina. Some of their comments follow:

Senator BYRD: "A very fine contribution to understanding the terrible problem that confronts us by reason of the unwarranted and infamous decision of the Supreme Court."

Mr. Byrnes: "Extremists on both sides of this emotional subject of race relations will disapprove some of Mr. Workman's conclusions, but fairminded readers will be impressed by the accuracy of his statement of facts and the tolerance of his opinions. This book should be read by every person interested in the subject."

General Clark: "William D. Workman, Jr., has performed, I think, work of immense value to the Nation in his book, 'The Case for the South.' * * * I think that any fairminded American will derive a better understanding of this problem from reading Mr. Workman's thoughtful analysis."

Governor Hollings: "Both the friends and the enemies of the South should read this volume, and read it carefully. They will be brought closer together by its forthright statement of the South."

Senator RUSSELL: "Without rancor or bitterness and in layman's language, you have presented the South's side of the highly complex and potentially dangerous racial question calmly, fairly, and cogently. Unfortunately, the South's case—by design or otherwise—is so seldom heard in other parts of the country. * * * I believe your book can make an important contribution to a fuller and better understanding of this grave problem, and I recommend it to all Americans—northerners and southerners—who sincerely seek to restore racial and sectional harmony in our Nation."

Senator THURMOND: "'The Case for the South' * * * is the most eloquent and factual account I have read on the South's position in the current controversy over school segregation. * * * Every southerner should purchase one copy for himself and one or more copies to send to friends behind the Paper Curtain."

Bishop Thomas: "Consistent documentation gives this book great strength. * * * I hope the book will be read by the large number of people on whose views depend the maintenance of the vital principles of our civilization."

[From the Charleston Evening Post, Jan. 20, 1960]

SOUTH'S CASE ABLY PRESENTED

Elsewhere in the Evening Post today appears a review of a book which should help bolster the position of the South in opposing and resisting the drive to force racial integration upon this section.

In "The Case for the South" William D. Workman, Jr., forcefully hits at the ignorance, misunderstanding, and malice which separately or in combination characterize the assaults upon this section. He gives the reasons why the great majority of southerners are convinced that segregation is the best approach to the problem of adjusting to racial differences, and why they are determined to do all in their power to resist attempts to smash a social pattern under which whites and Negroes had been making steady progress in their relations.

Mr. Workman discusses the race question in all its aspects, and the publisher rightly characterizes his book as the only thorough work on the subject from the southern standpoint since the Supreme Court in 1954 overturned the law of the land to declare school segregation unconstitutional. Coming from the presses of a New York publisher, it is truly a break in the northern curtain which has been drawn to keep out light on the subject.

Southerners will find in this book a confirmation of what they know and feel. Even those in other sections whose minds have been closed or whose brains have been washed by the liberals and other agitators are likely to be impressed. We recommend this book to all who are concerned over the evil fruits of the compulsory integration drive.

WOODROW WILSON MEMORIAL

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, earlier today, on behalf of myself and Senators ANDERSON, BARTLETT, BIBLE, BYRD of Virginia, CASE of New Jersey, CASE of South Dakota, CLARK, COOPER, DODD, DOUGLAS, ENGLE, ERVIN, FULBRIGHT, GREEN, HART, HENNINGS, HILL, HOLLAND, HUMPHREY, JACKSON, JOHNSON of Texas, JOHNSTON of South Carolina, KEFAUVER, KENNEDY, KERR, KUCHEL, LONG of Hawaii, LONG of Louisiana, MAGNUSON, MANSFIELD, MCCARTY, MCGEE, MCNAMARA, MORSE, MOSS, MURRAY, MUSKIE, NEUBERGER, PASTORE, PROXMIRE, RANDOLPH, ROBERTSON, SPARKMAN, SYMINGTON, WILEY, YARBOROUGH, and YOUNG of North Dakota, I introduced a joint resolution—Senate Joint Resolution 152—authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson.

I also asked unanimous consent that this bill lie at the table so that other Senators who wish to cosponsor may do so.

The joint resolution, as I shall explain later, does not require the proposed commission to limit its studies to any particular kind of memorial. It does, however, suggest that there are two major alternatives. We could have a nonfunctional monument or we could have a living memorial, possibly a building that would vividly remind visitors of the Nation's 28th President while it serves those visitors in a specific and worthwhile way.

Mr. President, memorials serve a nation best when they help men remember that individual beings like themselves have been called upon to do great things for their fellow citizens and for their Nation. Often it is as important to remember a man's ideas as well as the man himself. We write his words on stone and raise his likeness above us so that all may see. As the people of this Nation once drew strength from the men we honor in our national memorials, so do present and future generations renew their faith in themselves, in the ideas that keep a nation strong, and in the capability of free men to meet future challenges.

Just as the Capitol Building in which we meet has become a symbol of representative government, so have the monuments and public buildings of our Capital City become familiar and important to the many millions of Americans who visit Washington, D.C., or see its scenes in postcards or in photographs. Of all the cities in our Nation, the District of Columbia is the one in which shrines are truly national ones. For 179 million Americans of 50 States, this city is as important as their own hometown or home cities because it is truly theirs. Its beauty, or lack of it, is a reflection on them; its tributes to great men of the past should be strikingly appropriate, constant reminders that no principle is born in a vacuum and that men must struggle within themselves and against outside forces before they can offer the ideas that guide others.

Mr. President, there should be room within the District of Columbia for a major memorial to fix national attention permanently on the greatness of Wilson. Until we have such a memorial in this city of symbols, we shall not have fittingly honored the man who felt that "our civilization cannot survive materially unless it be redeemed spiritually."

We shall not have done what should be done for the President who—and I borrow the words of Bernard Baruch—called upon men to civilize their own souls.

WILSON AND NATIONAL PURPOSE

In 1960 we often hear from soul searchers who ask whether Americans really have a sense of national purpose. We look ahead to a troubled decade and wonder whether we are as clearheaded as we should be about the policies and principles the United States should follow at home and abroad. Wilson's words remind us, however, that men can guide a nation well when they recognize their duty and are unconfused about their principles.

To Wilson, duty was never distant.

The man who was later to say "America was born to serve mankind" could, as a university professor, call one of his major addresses "Princeton in the Nation's Service." He was even more specific in another speech when, as university president, he said that the university was intended for the service of the country and it would be judged by the standards of the country.

As Governor of New Jersey, Wilson spoke about local government in 1911 at a rally of the Commission League of Trenton, and he was able to find universal principles even in the debate about the affairs of one city in one State.

"We are," said Wilson, "really here discussing a transaction that concerns mankind. If America fails in the making of city government; if she does not know how to solve the problem so that her people will be free, happy, and comfortable, then to whom shall the men of the nations look? I think I feel some of the great spirit of mankind which is abroad, whether we know, and a great meeting like this is one of the items in the great combined struggle of mankind toward the political light America is finding, for America is again taking on the armor of her indomitable perseverance and hope, and we shall again say to her enemies: 'We hold you in contempt; our light is bright and the day is ours to possess.'" And, as he submitted the peace treaty after World War I, President Wilson again saw the way that duty lay: "We cannot turn back. We can only go forward, with lifted eyes and freshened spirit, to follow the vision. It was of this that we dreamed at our birth. America shall in the truth show the way. The light streams upon the path ahead, and nowhere else."

America has been fortunate to have great men in the President's chair at critical times in history. Few have been so eloquent as Wilson; few could teach—and teach so magnificently—as they achieved so much. In 1960 Wilson is still a prophet; his words are a guide to future greatness and a reminder of work undone.

A SUITABLE MEMORIAL

Mr. President, I have quoted at some length from the rich store of Wilsonian wisdom in order to emphasize that our debt to this man is as great as our affection for him. A memorial would help us express both. The questions are, however, What is a suitable memorial? How shall we go about creating one?

One suggestion was made by the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission in 1957. The Commission's final report gave a long list of the many ways in which Americans had remembered Wilson in an observance which had lasted for more than 1 year. New books had been published. Plaques had been installed everywhere—one at the State House in Trenton, for instance. A formal dedication of the Wilson memorial and permanent tomb had taken place at Washington National Cathedral on Veterans' Day, November 11, 1956. A new bridge now under construction across the Potomac will bear Wilson's name.

But the Commission said that more is needed. Its report suggests that: "Congress take such action as may be necessary to assure the erection in Washington of a permanent memorial structure to Woodrow Wilson comparable in beauty, sweep, and grandeur to those already dedicated to Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. This recommendation is a product of careful consideration on the part of the Commission. It stems from an abiding conviction that Wilson's eminence as scholar, educator, statesman, and world leader, and especially his contributions to the Presidency itself as an institution, place him high on the list of great American Presidents."

The case for such a memorial is a very strong one, so strong that legislation for a monument might well be introduced at this time.

I have also been impressed, however, by other arguments made for a "living memorial"—perhaps a "Woodrow Wilson House" that could combine architectural beauty with a function related to one or several of the great ideas expressed by Wilson.

Within the past few months many Americans have written to me or responded to my questions about the form a suitable memorial could take. I ask unanimous consent to attach to this statement in the RECORD a résumé of their viewpoints. I might say at this time that I shall be happy to turn over copies of that correspondence to the proposed Commission because I believe that invaluable suggestions have been made in many of the letters.

The correspondence has confirmed my growing conviction that it would be presumptuous for one individual to limit the scope of the Commission or attempt to specify what form the memorial should take. As former President Truman says in his letter a memorial to Wilson should be the result of much thought and preparation; it must be worthy of the man.

Accordingly, you will notice that the joint resolution merely mentions the Washington International Center as a potential Woodrow Wilson House, and it does ask the Commission to include the center in its studies; but it does not require the Commission to limit its survey to the center. The center is described in the résumé to be attached to this address. Briefly, however, it serves thousands of Government-sponsored visitors who come to Washington each year. It provides lectures, tours, conversation, and meetings at airports for the visitors. Future growth for the center is now possible; a recent Ford Foundation grant that will permit the center to move to larger quarters.

Such a center might well serve to dramatize Wilson's concern for understanding among all nations; there certainly would be room for a monument to Wilson at such a site. The widow of the late President, Mrs. Edith Bolling Wilson, has indicated that such a center would be very satisfactory to her as a form of memorial.

The Commission, I hope, will give very careful study to this particular proposal.

INTERNATIONAL EFFORT?

Mr. President, Wilson was admired in many other nations, He fought, as we all know, for independence of national groups after World War I; he stirred all men who believed in a "universal dominion of right."

The popularity of Wilson among many peoples was demonstrated often during the centennial commission observances. In 1956, at Detroit, for instance, eight nationality groups—Armenian, Czech, Estonian, Latvian, Polish, Rumanian, Serbian, and Slovak—joined together for one tribute to Wilson. Thirteen Asian nations were represented at a memorial dinner in New York City. Wilson exhibits appeared in shop windows of Korea, Hong Kong, Lisbon, Tel Aviv, Buenos Aires, to mention a few.

I recite these facts only to emphasize that the store of international good will for Wilson might well encourage the Commission to decide that global efforts might be made if the Commission recommends that a public fund-raising drive should be organized to finance all or part of the costs of the memorial. Men in many homelands might wish to contribute, for example, to a "Pavilion of all Nations" that could be built as a related structure to a monument or functional building.

No further preamble is needed to stress that the Commission would have a formidable task. To honor Wilson in an appropriate way, we must search our own consciences and our life today to be certain that we understand the concepts he has willed to us in his writings, his speeches, and his deeds. We must be reminded of America as Wilson saw it—as a Nation where men were happy because they were free and free because they were equal, and safe because they did not wish to impose upon one another.

No American—from the South which Wilson knew as a boy and a young man, or from the North which he so well understood and defined in later years—could, in Wilson's eyes, fail to see the vision of this Nation as he saw it.

And—

As Wilson said during his first presidential campaign—

the vision has not changed. The multitude has grown, that welcome multitude that comes from all parts of the world to see a safe place of life and hope in America. And so America will move if she moves forward at all, only with her face to that same sun of promise. Just as soon as she forgets the sun in the heavens, just so soon as she looks so intently upon the road before her and around her that she does not know where it leads, then will she forget where it leads, then will she forget what America was created for: Here light will go out; the nations will grope again in darkness, and they will say: "Where are those who prophesied a day of freedom for us? Where are the lights that we followed? Where is the torch that the runners bore?"

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that suggestions which have reached me from a great number of great Americans be included with my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

OPINIONS ON WOODROW WILSON MEMORIAL

In May of 1959, Senator WILLIAMS announced that he was looking for "good, workable ideas" for the establishment of a Woodrow Wilson Memorial in Washington, D.C.

The Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission had in 1957 made a strong recommendation for a monument similar in size and beauty to those now honoring Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln.

A differing viewpoint was expressed, however, by the Honorable Francis B. Sayre, son-in-law of the late President Wilson, in a letter which reached the Senator during the summer months. Dr. Sayre said:

"It seems peculiarly fitting that a U.S. Memorial to Woodrow Wilson should take the form, not of a dead monument of marble or bronze, but of a meeting place in the Nation's Capital where men and women from every country of the world might come together to learn and taste of American ideals of peace and democracy.

"Woodrow Wilson's whole life was spent in the broadening and uplift of men's minds. During his academic life he was constantly teaching his students new ideals of democratic activity in the Nation's service; and in his later work in political and international life again he kept calling men of different races and cultures to a new vision of international peace and brotherhood.

"A true memorial to him must continue to build and inspire, as dead stone cannot do. It must possess the living power to fire men's imaginations and to build true foundations for international understanding.

"A significant beginning has already been made. For the past eight years our Government in its important program for cultural exchange has carefully chosen through our Embassies abroad over 5,000 foreign leaders and workers every year and brought them to America to gain special training and competence, each in his own field of work, and also to gain a better understanding of American ideals and the American way of life.

"To welcome in Washington and give initial direction to incoming groups of grantees, a small but devoted staff of professional workers and many volunteers are carrying on in a modest and quite inadequate international center. Could this project of incalculable importance be given a dignified and fitting memorial building in which the work could be increased and broadened and could the whole undertaking be expanded with congressional backing and approval, such a Woodrow Wilson Memorial would possess matchless possibilities for bringing home to countless people in the world Woodrow Wilson's ideals and vision for world peace.

"Could any congressional project constitute a more fitting memorial to the great American who gave us the first conception of a world united for peace than the building in the Nation's Capital of a Woodrow Wilson House, an international center, such as suggested?"

(A statement giving additional details about the center, and the announcement of a recent Ford Foundation grant to the center, is attached at the end of this résumé.)

Seeking opinions about the appropriateness of a "living memorial" or a nonfunctional monument, Senator WILLIAMS wrote to persons who had served in, or been associated with, the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission. He feels that many valuable suggestions were made, and he offers the following excerpts from letters in response to his questions:

President Dwight D. Eisenhower: "Thank you for your September 7 letter concerning suggestions which have been made for a Woodrow Wilson Memorial. My own preference would be for a Woodrow Wilson House rather than a statue, and I would of course be very much in favor of such a thing being done by private subscription. I shall, however, have the matter studied carefully, and you will have a report on it as promptly as possible."

Bryce N. Harlow, Deputy Assistant to the President, later reported, at the President's request: "Preliminary thinking inclines toward the belief that a broadly conceived memorial might primarily serve to honor Woodrow Wilson with a permanent monument available to all the American people while serving at the same time symbolically and usefully as an international exchange center, open to all foreign visitors and to private and public exchange people. Effort on such a scale would require wide public support for its establishment, maintenance and growth.

"Perhaps a procedure as outlined in S.J. Res. 128 recently passed by the Senate, which would establish a commission to formulate plans for a memorial to James Madison, might be used to study the feasibility of the International Center and of the Centennial Celebration Commission's recommendations.

"The President hopes, of course, that a memorial concept can be developed which will meet the test of public support and practicality and at the same time will serve the widest expressed needs."

Harry S. Truman, former President of the United States: " . . . I am very anxious to see a memorial to Woodrow Wilson erected in Washington that will stand up to those that have already been placed there for former Presidents. . . . I hope you will make a complete survey before you introduce a resolution that will not come out of committee or that will be turned down when it does come out. Woodrow Wilson is among the five or six great Presidents of the United States, and nothing should happen to give descendants of the former isolationists a chance to discredit him."

Felix Frankfurter, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court: "The general direction of my friend Sayre's letter greatly appeals to me. Dean Acheson has talked to me about his correspondence with you on the subject of a Wilson Memorial, and I think his suggestion gives an appealing concreteness to the Sayre idea. Perhaps I ought to reveal to you that I find myself increasingly allergic to the preoccupation with brick and mortar, or rather pretentious stone, in this town. It would not only be singularly appropriate to honor Woodrow Wilson with the embodiment of an idea, but it might even start a much needed emphasis on ideas in our national life instead of the current material emphasis."

William J. Brennan, Jr., Associate Justice of the Supreme Court: "I could not more fully agree that a suitable memorial to Woodrow Wilson in this Capital is particularly fitting. My own preference leans toward the form suggested by Mr. Sayre, primarily because I think it affords an opportunity for carrying forward the noble work which has given him an indelible place in our history. But whatever form the memorial takes, surely there must be a memorial, and I shall be most happy to participate in efforts to that end."

J. Lindsay Almond, Jr., Governor of Virginia: "Thank you very much for your letter of September 7 and I am very pleased that you are so interested in some sort of fitting memorial to President Wilson. Certainly few men have contributed more to the United States and its people than did President Wilson.

"I feel confident that nearly every Virginian will wish to support any movement to honor the last Virginia President."

Robert B. Meyner, Governor of New Jersey: "I heartily endorse the idea of erecting a memorial to Woodrow Wilson.

"It seems to me that it would be more in character with the ideals one associates with Woodrow Wilson to have a Woodrow Wilson House along the lines suggested by Mr. Sayre, rather than the more conventional type of monument. After all, Wilson began his career as a teacher. What could be a more fitting tribute to his greatness than a permanent institution dedicated to imparting the principles by which Wilson lived?"

A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, Senator from Virginia: "* * * I find that my Virginia friends would favor a memorial similar in type to those erected to Lincoln and Jefferson, to be financed by the Federal Government."

BURR P. HARRISON, Representative, Seventh District, Virginia: "* * * With him (Gen. E. W. Opie, chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission in 1956), I raise these questions:

"1. Would such a memorial be of 'similar size and significance' as those to the three other Presidents which in the opening paragraph of your letter you state should be the objective?

"2. Would such a house duplicate and dilute Mrs. Wilson's plan to dedicate the S Street house as a Wilson shrine?

"What hope do you think there might be of persuading the Government to return to the policy of constructing memorials entirely by appropriations from the public purse?"

Adlai E. Stevenson, former Governor of Illinois: "I have given some thought to the suggestion for a Woodrow Wilson memorial and I must say that I was impressed by Francis Sayre's proposal for a Woodrow Wilson House. It strikes me as perhaps being a more appropriate memorial than the usual type of monument and it doesn't appear to me that it would be inconsistent with the recommendations of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration Commission."

Douglas Dillon, Under Secretary of State: "Thank you for your letter asking for my views on a possible memorial for Woodrow Wilson. As a fellow Jerseyan I naturally have a particular interest in seeing such a project come to fruition.

"While I have not had the opportunity to give the matter a great deal of thought I do believe that a memorial in the form of a 'Woodrow Wilson House,' such as suggested by Francis Sayre, would be both a more fitting and a more practicable objective than a memorial such as that suggested by the Centennial Celebration Commission in 1956. I would also think that a substantial part of the funds could and should come from private sources as in the case of the Roosevelt, Truman, and Eisenhower Libraries."

Dean Acheson, former Secretary of State: "* * * I am wholly in favor of Dean Sayre's approach—that is, a living institution, not a dead monument. The same question was considered by the trustees or the advisory committee on the Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., fund. You can learn all about their thoughts and conclusions from Senator SALTONSTALL and Justice Frankfurter.

"As to the sort of institution which would be best suited, Dean Sayre's suggestion is a good one. Another would be another sort of Woodrow Wilson House, modeled on the Pratt House of the Council on Foreign Relations, in New York, or the Royal Institute of International Relations, Chatham House, 10 St. James's Square, London S.W. 1, or the Institute of Strategic Studies, 18 Adam Street, London W.C. 2.

"This could be an imposing house in the general area of the Capitol, with a good working library for those working on foreign relations matters, a staff producing information papers on matters on which accurate current information on emergent problems is highly desirable—Tibet, Laos, etc., and a large auditorium where foreign visitors could address a serious audience (at present, the Press Club monopolizes this function with less than desirable results).

"People could, for a small fee which would help operating expenses, enjoy library facilities and a preference at functions, purchase of publications, etc.

"This might incorporate, also, some of Mr. Sayre's suggested function, which, standing alone, suggests a sort of YMCA for foreign students, worthy, but of limited appeal."

Roger Ernst, Assistant Secretary of the Interior: "The Nation's Capital contains many fine memorials of various types to former Presidents and important and distinguished persons. The Department of the Interior certainly considers them to be an essential and desirable part of the National Capital Parks System. Several methods have been used to develop these memorials. Some of them were accomplished under sponsorship of private and semipublic organizations and foreign countries. Others were handled by special commissions established by Congress. Design and financing also have been accomplished in various ways. There have been extensive design competitions conducted and many times the commission organization in charge of the project has hired outstanding private designers to do the job. Financing has been handled in many ways, such as private donations, fundraising campaigns, foreign participation, and some use of public funds.

"All of the various methods have merit and it is difficult to say which is the best procedure; however, the special commissions established by Congress certainly provided a good means to carry out coordinated plans and design and the successful completion of some of our outstanding memorials.

"Regardless of the approach to develop a memorial, it requires, as you know, an act of Congress to establish memorials in the National Capital. For the most part, past legislation has stipulated that the plans, design, and location of the memorial located on public land must be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, the National Capital Planning Commission, and the Commission of Fine Arts.

"We are familiar with the work of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration Commission since Director Wirth was executive officer. The National Park Service worked closely with the Commission in carrying out their activities, including the 1956 report. You quoted one of the report's recommendations for a permanent memorial structure to Woodrow Wilson. We might add that the Commission was very helpful in securing the designation of the new bridge under construction at Jones Point as the Woodrow Wilson Bridge.

"We should like to observe that a proposal for a Woodrow Wilson House to provide a place where visitors from abroad could receive an introduction to this Nation is a matter which we believe should be explored with the Department of State. The question of an international fundraising drive might also be considered by that Department.

"The question of memorials in the Nation's Capital requires thorough study and analysis. We certainly believe that you are doing just that and we appreciate the opportunity to comment upon your suggestions."

William B. Macomber, Jr., Assistant Secretary, Department of State: "The Department is in full accord with Mr. Francis B. Sayre, who feels it would be especially appropriate that a memorial to Woodrow Wilson take the form of an International Center designed to introduce visitors from abroad to the American way of life.

"As you know, the Washington International Center of the American Council on Education is performing an extremely vital and valuable orientation service for foreign nationals visiting the United States under the exchange programs of the International Educational Exchange Service and the International Cooperation Administration. As these programs have expanded significantly during the past decade, the Washington International Center has outgrown its original building and is now desperately in need of new quarters.

"The Department would be happy to see the Washington International Center obtain a new location that would allow it to expand its activities to include the many visitors coming under all official exchange programs in addition to the IES and ICA programs presently being served. The success of international exchange programs in terms of the development of mutual understanding depends to a great extent upon the proper orientation of grantees.

"The Department would welcome, therefore, the consideration of an International Center as a memorial to Woodrow Wilson and suggests that, if such a course is decided upon, the program be combined with the Washington International Center's present search for new quarters. I suggest also that the director of the Washington International Center, Dr. Arthur A. Hauck, be consulted as soon as possible concerning the operations and future plans of his organization."

Stephen K. Bailey, professor of political science, Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, Syracuse University: "I am completely in accord with the views of Mr. Sayre and Mrs. Edith Bolling Wilson that the most fitting memorial to Woodrow Wilson at present would be a Woodrow Wilson House rather than a permanent memorial structure. I have no doubt that at some appropriate time in the future a permanent memorial will be erected to Woodrow Wilson's memory; but good taste in this type of architecture involves a proper sense of timing as well as nobility and effectiveness in style.

"I should like to go beyond Mr. Sayre's proposal, however. There are literally hundreds of thousands of American visitors to our Nation's Capital each year—in addition to the foreign visitors mentioned in Mr. Sayre's letter. My guess is that the American visitors need quite as much help in understanding the American Government as do visitors from abroad. Wilson was not only a great international leader. He was also a great President of the United States in the domestic field. He was also a great educator.

"With the cooperation of the existing universities in Washington, an extraordinarily effective educational and orientation center might be established for the benefit of all visitors to Washington—a kind of living museum with exhibits, documents, audiovisual presentations, and other instruments of education aimed at helping visitors understand the functions, purposes, and behavior of various branches and units of the Federal establishment. Tourists could not help but come away enriched—and they would have viewed the architecture and the institutions of our Government with a vastly heightened appreciation. For example, if visitors to the Senate gallery at first received a 15–30 minute presentation on the functioning of Congress they would be far less shocked when they see only six Senators on the floor. This is a simple example which could be multiplied almost infinitely.

"Let me conclude by saying that this idea of a living museum is not original with me. A young man named Thomas Hanlon, who lives in Washington, has been trying desperately to interest someone in this kind of facility. His plan was to limit such a living museum to the congressional branch. I see no reason, however, why the idea could not be extended to all parts of the Government.

"As a member of the board of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation I am naturally delighted in your interest in a memorial."

Mrs. Jonathan Bingham, member, board of directors, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "I like your and Mr. Sayre's thought to expand the Washington International Center into a Woodrow Wilson House.

"I wonder whether there would be a possibility of housing the Woodrow Wilson papers there—thus attracting historians as well as students. As you know, the Woodrow Wilson Foundation is involved in a decade-long project of having these papers collected, indexed, etc."

George M. Cochran, member, Virginia House of Delegates, Chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission of 1956–57: "The work of our Commission has been concluded and our Commission is no longer officially in existence. Consequently, any ideas which I have on the subject of a memorial are my own personal views and have no official sanction.

"It seems to be the consensus of interested persons in this community that a Woodrow Wilson Memorial in Washington should be primarily a memorial structure rather than a building devoted to such useful purposes as office space for international organizations. If some utilitarian purpose can also be achieved with a structure planned and erected primarily as a memorial structure such as the Lincoln and Jefferson Memorials, there would certainly be no objection to this combination of objectives."

Jonathan Daniels, editor, the News and Observer, Raleigh, N.C.: "If there were to be only one memorial, I would much prefer the suggestion in 1956 by the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration Committee for the erection of a permanent memorial structure comparable in beauty, sweep, and grandeur to those already dedicated to Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. It seems to me that this is the kind of memorial which the Federal Government should provide for this great man.

"The proposal for a Woodrow Wilson House as a sort of international center has, of course, much merit, and I naturally am impressed by the feeling of Mr. Sayre, and Mrs. Wilson with regard to this. It seems to me, however, that this type of memorial could be better provided by some semiprivate organization or foundation. I am not impressed by Mr. Sayre's feeling about dead stone. I believe that the beautiful memorials to Jefferson, Lincoln, and Washington cannot be so described."

Harold W. Dodds, president emeritus, Princeton University, N.J.: "* * * From all my study of Woodrow Wilson, I am convinced that Mrs. Wilson is right, and that he would much prefer something similar to a Woodrow Wilson House than a grand memorial.

"However, I do see problems in designing what purposes the memorial should serve and how they should be attained.

"How 'thousands of visitors from abroad each year could receive a memorable introduction to this Nation' calls for constructive planning and continuing financing, which I presume in this case would be subject to congressional appropriations.

"It might be possible to recover from the Library of Congress some Wilson memorabilia, such as awards and medals, etc., which could be the basis for furnishing an exhibition hall.

"Finally, I should not anticipate success in soliciting private contributions, unless a small handful of people can be persuaded to make most substantial personal gifts; and this has not occurred to any extent in any Woodrow Wilson memorial enterprise of which I am aware."

Robert F. Goheen, president, Princeton University, N.J.: "My own judgment is very strongly in favor of the ideas advanced by Dean Sayre. Nothing could be more appropriate than an edifice in which living work is going on in service to the cause of improved international understanding.

"At the same time, it would seem to me that plans should include development of a handsome building and site. I agree with the recommendation of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration Commission, at least in this respect, that architecturally the memorial to President Wilson should have a dignity and enduring beauty reflective of his stature."

Roswell L. Gilpatric, member, board of directors, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "* * * I would like to endorse the proposal made to you by Mr. Sayre. To my way of thinking, the work of an International Center would be a more appropriate memorial to Woodrow Wilson than the erection of a monument comparable to those dedicated to Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln."

Ernest A. Gross, member, board of directors, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "It strikes me that an international center would be preferable to a monument, but it raises problems of continuing financial support and administration which, of course, are minimized in the case of an architectural memorial.

"In view of the importance of the decision and the long-overdue tribute to one of the greatest Americans, I would like to give the most mature thought to your question.

"Permit me to add that I am delighted with your leadership and sponsorship of the project, which is a service not only to the Nation but to the world."

Dr. Mason W. Gross, president, Rutgers, the State university, New Jersey: "I was brought up in a family which thought that Woodrow Wilson was just about the greatest man who ever lived. I therefore am disposed to take this matter of a memorial most seriously.

"I am not as much against a monument as Dr. Sayre seems to be. Certainly both the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial say what they have to say very directly and appropriately. To add the requirement that this memorial should also have a useful purpose, it seems to me, is to divide our intent. It does seem to me that we can erect a memorial to Wilson simply by itself without having to be busy and fussy about continuing his work and his interest.

"I am also not oversold on the subject of a center for international students. International students are all the rage today, and there are many such centers both large and small. If this were a pioneering enterprise, I would go along with it, but I think that this is to throw the name of Wilson into a pot that is already boiling with activity.

"Wilson was the only highly trained intellect who has ever occupied the White House. He was more disciplined than Jefferson, and more of an intellect than Lincoln. He had a long and distinguished career before the war forced him into international complications.

"I suppose that a library is the most appropriate memorial to an intellect. But it is hard to know exactly what that library should contain, particularly in Washington where the Library of Congress inevitably dominates everything."

Pendleton Herring, president, Social Science Research Council, member, board of trustees, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "The memorial proposed for Woodrow Wilson in Washington, D.C., impresses me as highly appropriate; indeed I cannot think of a better way of symbolizing the values for which he strove in both educational and international affairs. I offer this comment as a personal opinion and not as a matter that has been considered by members of the Social Science Research Council.

"I cannot comment with any particularity about the Washington International Center. I have a generally favorable impression of its work.

"I think that the time has come to give much more attention to institutional and administrative arrangements for handling international cultural exchange activities. Such contacts are now a necessary and continuing part of our national life and yet much of this work is carried on in improvised and ad hoc fashion. The proposal you have in mind might serve to bring to public attention the scope and importance of exchange programs and provide more dignified and suitable support."

August Heckscher, president, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "Naturally I am interested in your letter of September 7. I do feel most deeply that a memorial to Woodrow Wilson in the Nation's Capital is something which this generation should not neglect. Wilson's fame increases with the years, and his standing at the very top of the list of great American Presidents is by now beyond dispute. In the years to come he will, I believe, loom even larger.

"As to the form such a memorial should take, attach great importance to the recommendations of Mr. Sayre, whose devotion to the War President has been so unwavering and whose appreciation of his qualities is perhaps unique among those who today are playing a role in affairs. It does seem to me that a memorial serving the living generation, especially young people in whom Wilson had so great an interest, would be most fitting.

"Perhaps you know that the papers of Woodrow Wilson are now in the process of being edited under the auspices of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation. The Foundation has raised something over $300,000 for this great work, but the total project will cost in the neighborhood of $1 million. It may be that you would want to consider support of this project among the possibilities for a memorial. The Wilson letters and papers form a magnificent collection which thus far have been scattered and largely unavailable to the public and even to historians.

"May only urge that if a building is constructed in Washington it be done in a style which reflects the fact that Mr. Wilson's contribution belongs to the present and the future. I would hate to see a building erected in his memory which speaks only of the past and would not represent the best that this generation can conceive and construct."

Chet Huntley, correspondent, National Broadcasting Co.: "Your letter outlined two possible types of memorial. I counter with the question which your letter anticipated: why not combine the two? Could not an edifice as fine as the Lincoln or Jefferson memorials be erected but which would serve the double purpose of housing the Woodrow Wilson House favored by Mrs. Wilson?"

Joseph E. Johnson, President, Carnegie Endowment for International Peace: "Personally, I am strongly in favor of a working memorial rather than a purely commemorative one. I know that the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial have come to have a special position in the minds and hearts of American and foreign visitors to Washington. On the other hand, I have the feeling that the same is not true of the Jefferson Memorial, which is a little more difficult to reach. Besides, I have always regretted that Mr. Jefferson, who was, if not the first American functionalist, certainly the second—Franklin being the first—should be honored by what is in essence an empty shell—a kind of ironic fate for the man who devoted his mathematical talents and agricultural interests to perfecting the first scientific plow, and who built in his own home at Monticello one of the most beautifully functional houses that I have ever seen, of whatever period.

"I have the feeling that to Wilson also a building had importance not for what it looked like or symbolized but for what took place in it. He was concerned with substance, not with form.

"To me, therefore, the idea of a Woodrow Wilson House which would have important functions as a meeting place or as a place to receive foreign visitors would be much more in keeping with his own spirit. I am interested to note that Mr. Sayre shares this view.

"There may, of course, be other working memorials under consideration. In any case, I like Mr. Sayre's idea.

"As for fund raising, I should think that it would not be inappropriate to have some public funds, but I feel also that an international fund-raising drive among peoples throughout the world who admired Wilson should definitely have a part."

Dr. Lewis Webster Jones, president, National Conference of Christians and Jews: "As you know, it was my privilege to serve as chairman of a committee, set up by the Legislature of New Jersey, to celebrate the centennial of Woodrow Wilson. I have, therefore, given a great deal of thought to this and I think the best way to pay tribute to our 28th President is by the living memorial outlined by Mr. Sayre."

Verbon E. Kemp, executive director, Virginia State Chamber of Commerce: "This matter has not received the official attention of the board of directors of the Virginia State Chamber. We find, however, that there is a strong preference in the Virginia organizations dedicated to the perpetuation of the ideals and policies of President Wilson for a permanent memorial similar to those erected in Washington in memory of Presidents Jefferson and Lincoln.

"However, the living memorial in the form of a Woodrow Wilson House for serving visitors from abroad is appealing. It should offer much of practical value. I am confident that you can count upon the support of Virginia for any memorial to Mr. Wilson, provided that it is in keeping with his stature as one of the greatest Presidents which have served our country.

"It was our privilege to present and dedicate a plaque to Mr. Wilson's memory in Paris last fall. It was placed on the walls of the Palais de Chaillot and the dedicatory ceremonies were arranged and attended by a party of 110 Virginians headed by former Virginia Gov. John S. Battle."

Arthur Krock, columnist, New York Times: "I greatly favor the idea of Dean Sayre for the memorial in Washington to his grandfather, Woodrow Wilson. My only suggestion is that as noble a statue of the President as sculpture can produce be put in a worthy setting either in front of the Woodrow Wilson International Center House or within the edifice, with a location comparable to Lincoln's within his memorial."

Mrs. Henry Goddard Leach, member, board of trustees, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "I agree completely with the point of view of Mr. Sayre that there should be a memorial which would contribute to the international exchange of students. It would seem to me exceedingly appropriate for a man of President Wilson's caliber. Such a memorial should, I think, be raised by public and private contributions. Most certainly it would be necessary to have a backlog of public contributions to start with."

Walter Lippmann, columnist, New York Herald Tribune syndicate: "I have no doubt that the best thing to do now is to follow the advice of the Reverend Francis B. Sayre. I heartily endorse it."

Robert J. Matteson, executive director, American Society for Public Administration: "You probably know that Woodrow Wilson was a pioneer in recognizing public administration as a special field of learning and endeavor. His essay on "The Study of Public Administration," published in the Political Science Quarterly, June 1887, clearly foreshadowed numerous developments. Many current doctrines about public administration were first enunciated here. In ASPA, we from time to time take note of Wilson's special contribution to our field.

"This all leads to hearty approval of your plans to memorialize Wilson and to the suggestion that the memorial might in some way recognize his key role in developing the public administration profession. As to type of memorial my personal preference is for something modeled after the international center you and Mr. Sayre have discussed. Our society as an organization does not, however, take positions on legislative and related matters."

E. Walton Opie, publisher, the Staunton (Va.) News Leader; national chairman of the Woodrow Wilson Centennial Commission in 1956–7: "The cause you are advocating is a great and commendable one. Keep up the good work and we'll see a noble monument rise to the 28th President. The idea of a combined functional and classic memorial appeals to me increasingly.

Miss Anna Lord Strauss, member, board of directors, Woodrow Wilson Foundation: "I believe that a Woodrow Wilson House where visitors to this country could be briefed on this country and its governmental and other patterns would be a much more live and important type of memorial to Woodrow Wilson."

Arthur Schlesinger, professor, Department of History, Harvard University: "In general a living memorial seems to me a better tribute than a static shrine. Moreover, Mr. Sayre's proposal would not only commemorate the spirit of Wilson but would also serve a vital function in the National Capital. Such a Woodrow Wilson House should, of course, contain facilities for commemoration of particular aspects of Wilson's career."

Senator WILLIAMS has also received other correspondence from persons who offered suggestions individually.

The Reverend Henry J. Davis, pastor of the Dundas Baptist Church in Dundas, Va., said that a Woodrow Wilson Institute or University should be established in Washington, D.C., with the help of Government funds, certain foundation funds, and private donations.

He continued: "I would also suggest that this institute or university be especially designed and planned to enroll advanced and graduate students of government, law, history, and economics. Only students who hold a standard bachelor of arts or bachelor of science degree from a recognized college or university would be permitted to enroll as a student—and then, only students of recognized ability. This institute or university would be, then, a graduate and post-graduate institution, attracting the greatest scholars of our country and the world on the faculty in the fields mentioned, and only graduate degrees would be conferred upon students completing their courses leading to the master of arts, doctor of philosophy, and doctor of laws, degrees.

"I believe that such a suggestion would have met with the full favor of the late President, since his heart and life was set on the subjects mentioned—government, law, history, and economics; he himself excelled in all of these studies, especially government and history. I also believe that this suggestion would meet with favor with his widow, Mrs. Wilson; his daughter, Mrs. Sayre, or any other close relatives and friends. I also believe this suggestion would meet with favor all over America and the world, once the full idea is made known in detail."

Among the suggestions received by Senator WILLIAMS before he received the letter from Dr. Sayre were these:

1. A melting pot plaza devoted to an internationalist theme as part of a waterfront redevelopment plan along Maine Avenue between F and L Streets.

2. A permanent place where modern problems of health could be presented to the public, in connection with the Health for Peace Act. A world's showplace for programs to combat health problems.

Senator WILLIAMS also submits the following:

A statement describing the Washington International Center and editorials from the January 15, 1960, edition of the Jersey Journal; and January 4, 1960, edition of the Staunton, (Va.) Leader; and the January 9 edition of the Louisville (Ky.) Courier Journal:

"WASHINGTON INTERNATIONAL CENTER

"Services and facilities of the Washington International Center, for the past 10 years located at 1720 Rhode Island Avenue NW., will be greatly expanded in the future with the acquisition of a 45-room mansion, Meridian House, as its new headquarters. This was made possible by a Ford Foundation grant of $500,000 to the American Council on Education for the purchase and furnishing of the building at 1630 Crescent Place NW., former home of the late Irwin Laughlin, a distinguished diplomat of the World War I era—Minister to Greece and Ambassador to Spain—from its present owner, Mrs. Hubert W. Chanler, daughter of Mr. Laughlin.

"Within the terms of the grant, an additional $200,000 will be provided to assist other private Washington agencies engaged in exchange program services. Five institutions—private, nonprofit, educational, scientific, and cultural groups—will be involved in the new corporation now being organized to operate the center and coordinate functions in the reception of foreign leaders, scholars and students. They are the American Council on Education, the Governmental Affairs Institute, the Institute of International Education, the Foreign Students Service Council, and the Institute of Contemporary Arts. The three latter groups will have officers in the new center.

"The Washington International Center's program of introduction to the life and customs of the United States was originated 10 years ago by the American Council on Education at the request of the Government. Operated as a council project under contract with the Department of State, the center has received well over 25,000 visitors in the last decade, representing more than 100 countries around the world. For the last several years, as the numbers of visitors coming under ICA and IES programs have steadily increased, the center's quarters have become correspondingly overcrowded. Expansion of the orientation program and allied services to other visitors, as well as easing the present space problems, will be possible in the center's new home.

"Meridian House, a four-story limestone structure built in 1922, was designed by John Russell Pope, architect for the Jefferson Memorial and the National Gallery of Art. It was, of course, planned for a style of gracious living of a bygone era. Yet as a setting typifying American hospitality at its best, it will provide international visitors comfort and space in which center traditions of warm and friendly welcome may continue in a more relaxed atmosphere than has been possible in recent years because of overcrowding. Not least of the advantages offered by the beauty and spaciousness of Meridian House are the surrounding gardens and the terrace with its 50 handsome linden trees.

"The house was described as 'perhaps as fine a piece of work of its kind as this country can show' in an article by Matlack Price in the Architectural Forum for August 1929. The article declared: 'The whole manner of this house, deriving so definitely from the 18th century France of Louis XVI, is grand without being grandiose; impressive without being pompous; rich without being ornate.'

"Research into the source of the name for Meridian House unearthed an interesting little sidelight on history. When the Capital City for the struggling new Nation was in the planning stages nearly 200 years ago, George Washington wanted it laid out in a 10-mile square, diamond shaped in order to encompass the little ports of Alexandria and Georgetown. The north-south meridian line bisecting the diamond, 77 degrees, 2 minutes, 12½ seconds west of Greenwich, was the basis for 16th Street, running right through the White House. Meridian Hill, Meridian Park, and Meridian House are all reminders of this almost forgotten fact."

"[From the Jersey Journal and Jersey Observer, Jan. 15, 1960]

"A MEMORIAL TO WILSON

"President Eisenhower and former President Truman rarely agree on any public question, and Adlai E. Stevenson has had his differences with both. All three, however, join in favoring a memorial in Washington to Woodrow Wilson. More than 40 other prominent Americans take the same stand, according to Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, JR., who advocates a commission to decide what form a memorial should take.

"As the President whose leadership saw us successfully through World War I and created such an enduring institution as the Federal Reserve System, Wilson deserves commemoration. His administration was wrecked on the League of Nations, but if the United States had supported that body it might have headed off the Second World War. Historians, who disagree as often as most people, join in reckoning Wilson among our six foremost Chief Executives.

"The form of the memorial is yet to be determined. Merely another monument would hardly suit. President Eisenhower and Stevenson, according to Senator WILLIAMS, would like a memorial international exchange center for receiving and directing visitors who come to Washington under various exchange programs. Perhaps a more comprehensive creation will be found which would apply to Wilson's domestic achievements as well as to his vision in foreign affairs."

"[From the Staunton (Va.) Leader, Jan. 4, 1960]

"WILSON MEMORIAL PROGRESS

"Yesterday's news release by Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, Jr., of New Jersey, telling of reaction to the proposal for a major memorial to Woodrow Wilson in the Nation's Capital encourages the belief that Congress may soon take the action necessary to this end. Senator WILLIAMS announced plans to introduce a bill for a memorial to the 28th President within the next few weeks.

"The New Jersey Democrat is following up energetically the recommendation to Congress by the U.S. Woodrow Wilson Centennial Celebration Commission for a major Wilson memorial in Washington. The Commission envisioned a classic-type memorial comparable to those to Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln, but Senator WILLIAMS has been impressed by proposals for a living memorial, such as an international center at which Government-sponsored visitors—some 25,000 a year now—would be received.

"Recent announcement of a $500,000 grant to the Washington International Center for spacious quarters does not seem to have reduced Senator WILLIAMS' interest in a Wilson center of some kind as a memorial to Staunton's immortal. He stated that he has an open mind as to the form of memorial, and quoted a number of leaders, including President Eisenhower, as favoring a living, or utilitarian, memorial.

"There is no good reason why the two ideas, classic and functional, could not be acceptably combined to attain a truly noble memorial to the 28th President. In any event, Congress should delay no longer in giving such recognition to the greatness of Woodrow Wilson and offering the inspiration of his ideals and achievements to the millions who visit the Capital. Public funds to this end should be provided, although President Eisenhower is quoted by Senator WILLIAMS as advocating popular subscription.

"Nearly all of the wealthy adherents of Mr. Wilson, especially those who served under him in his great crusades for domestic reforms and international organization for peace and world progress, are dead. Too few living Americans know and appreciate the Wilson leadership to contribute funds sufficient for a memorial of such magnitude that it would inspire study of this, the first American world statesman, and his times. Precedent justifies the use of public funds for a major Woodrow Wilson memorial."

"[From the Louisville (Ky.) Courier-Journal, Jan. 9, 1960]

"HOW TO TRANSLATE THE WILSON DREAM

"We agree with Senator WILLIAMS of New Jersey, along with many others, that Woodrow Wilson should have a memorial in Washington. But, please, not the kind of monument of which the National Capital already has enough, even though some of them are majestically beautiful.

"Mr. WILLIAMS is preparing legislation to create a commission to draw up a plan for a Wilson memorial. He adds the recommendation that the commission should specifically consider a suggestion he has heard in many quarters that the memorial take the form of an international center. Here Government-sponsored visitors from many lands, including not merely the VIP's, could be received and hospitably lodged.

"This is an excellent suggestion. Some devout Wilsonians have been thinking in terms of something like the Washington Monument, or the Lincoln or Jefferson memorials. This newspaper happens to be itself a devout Wilsonian, but we also happen to think that Woodrow Wilson's dream could be far better translated than in marble or bronze. The best tribute to his memory in Washington would be a living, continuously useful center of international understanding.

"A monument-type memorial to Franklin D. Roosevelt is already being planned, but we still think, as we have said before, that a human-type memorial of a sort that would give practical effect to his ideals would be more appropriate. We think exactly the same thing about the Wilson project."

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution lie at the desk until Monday evening of next week so that other Senators who desire to do so may become cosponsors of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am grateful to the 47 Senators who have already indicated their desire to be cosponsors of the joint resolution, and to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] who, while not a cosponsor of it, has indicated his support of the measure I have offered to create this Commission.

Mr. MOSS. Mr. President, Woodrow Wilson is the supreme example in American public life of the scholar of government being called to assume the post of Chief Executive of his State and the Nation.

The president of Princeton University became the Governor of the great State of New Jersey, the President of the United States, and the founder of the League of Nations.

The National Capital has suitable memorials to Presidents Washington, Jefferson, and Lincoln. I feel it is time to turn our attention to the establishment of one to the memory of the great President of World War I, and it is with a great deal of pleasure that I join the distinguished junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. WILLIAMS] and others in sponsoring this joint resolution to establish a Commission to formulate the plans.

In the light of international events since his untimely death, Woodrow Wilson appears as a statesman with a clear vision of the future. As he so well saw and so well said, America's great task, as yet unfinished, is to make the world safe for democracy.

His nomination, his election, and his career as President were filled with drama. He was nominated by the Democratic National Convention in Baltimore in 1912 on the 46th ballot. The leading contender, Champ Clark of Missouri, was unable to secure the two-thirds necessary at that time due to the still-loyal following of the thrice-defeated William Jennings Bryan.

And a dramatic and acrimonious split in the Republican Party contributed to Woodrow Wilson's election. When Theodore Roosevelt left the White House, William Howard Taft—father of one of the most influential men ever to sit in this body, the late Robert A. Taft of Ohio—became President. Believing that President Taft had deserted the Roosevelt principles, particularly on the question of conservation of natural resources, he reentered the presidential arena at the head of the Bull Moose Party.

It should be remembered that Wilson's first term was a most fruitful one in the field of domestic legislation and reform. Healthy business competition was stimulated by establishment of the Federal Trade Commission and passage of the Clayton Antitrust Act. The Federal Reserve Act strengthened and stabilized the monetary system. The Underwood tariff lowered schedules, and important advances were made in Latin American relations through cooperation with Argentina, Brazil, and Chile in the settlement of our dispute with Mexico.

He worked unceasingly to keep the United States out of the European war. When he believed this to be impossible—when the Imperial German Government declared unrestricted submarine warfare—he prosecuted the war energetically, but always with the great purpose before him of establishing a lasting peace. He sought to make the sacrifices of his countrymen meaningful in terms of a better world for their descendants.

In regard to the memorial itself, several proposals have been put forth. As Senator WILLIAMS has said, they all deserve careful consideration.

I know that those taking the leadership in this matter have in mind a monument that will compare favorably in scope and grandeur with those we have raised to Washington, Jefferson and Lincoln. With this I agree.

It has been suggested also that the memorial might take the form of a functional building—a living memorial it is being called—a headquarters for an organization related to areas of Wilson's contributions to American and world government.

While this idea might lead to the most suitable memorial to President Wilson, the function to be performed should not overshadow the personality of the President.

One problem in a functional memorial is that it may come to be visited principally by that relatively narrow segment of our people, and of visitors from abroad, who are interested in the function. And that the great majority of those to whom we wish to bring the message of Wilson's ideals and ideas may pass it by.

As I now conceive it, the memorial should be of such form, and offer such access and other facilities, as will assure it a permanent place on the itinerary of those who come to Washington to go sightseeing. Especially I would want to be sure that the hundreds of thousands of young people who visit us every year have forcefully called to their attention this man's dedication to the public service.

I look forward to speedy approval of this joint resolution by the Congress, and wish the commission Godspeed in its work.

Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish to express my gratitude to the Senator from Utah for his support of the joint efforts in connection with the joint resolution which I introduced earlier today, to create a Commission to study the possibilities in the nature of a memorial to Woodrow Wilson.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the Senate adjourned, pursuant to the order previously entered, until tomorrow, Friday, January 22, 1960, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 1960

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Very Reverend Stephen J. Chrepta, rector of St. Vladimir's Pro-Cathedral and dean of St. Basil's College, Stamford, Conn., offered the following prayer:

O God, the Creator and Redeemer of the world, we glorify Thee and humbly give Thee thanks for the countless blessings which Thou hast bestowed upon us. We thank Thee, in particular, for the freedoms which we enjoy in our beloved United States of America.

We beseech Thee, O Lord, Ruler of the Universe, to graciously look down upon our President and the Members of Congress, that they may advance in all virtues, and continue in health to govern this land for Thy glory and the welfare of its people. Guide and illume them with wisdom in their deliberations. Strengthen them in charity for our people and toward all humanity. Grant that nations recognize in them Thy unselfish instruments of peace and the hope of the oppressed, as embodied in the Captive Nations Week resolution which they enacted.

We pray especially for the Ukrainian and all other enslaved peoples, brutally subjugated by the forces of communism. In particular, we pray for the Ukrainian people who are the first victims, and who have suffered unmercifully four decades of the ruthless liquidations, starvations, and inhuman tortures of this dreadful scourge, which even threatens the peace of the world.

Fortify the faith of Thy Ukrainian children, O Heavenly Father, keep hope burning in their hearts, grant them perseverance during their captivity, alleviate their sufferings, protect them from the guile of their enemies, that all trouble being removed, they may freely serve Thee.

We also implore Thee, O God, the guardian of peace and charity, give our enemies true charity, and grant them remission of their sins. By Thy might deliver us from their snares, so that lasting peace and harmony may again be restored among nations, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Thy Son, who with Thee liveth and reigneth in the unity of the Holy Ghost forever. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. McGown, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate requests that the House of Representatives return to the Senate the bill (S. 1282) entitled "An act relating to acreage allotments for Durum wheat."

STONEWALL JACKSON

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to invite the attention of the House to the fact that today is the 136th anniversary of the birth of one of history's true geniuses. On January 21, 1824, in Clarksburg, W. Va.—then Virginia—Thomas Jonathan Jackson was born.

In Clarksburg, Harrison County, he was known as Jonathan, but since that warm June day of 1861, at nearby Manassas in Virginia, he has been known and revered as "Stonewall."

It is not my purpose here to review his military feats. It is sufficient to state that his campaigns have been studied by military leaders throughout the world, probably more so than the campaigns of any other great leader.

Two days ago was the anniversary of the birth of another revered military leader of the Confederacy, Gen. Robert E. Lee. It detracts nothing from the reputation of General Lee to point out that without Stonewall Jackson, Lee's military stature would be somewhat less. It was Lee himself who recognized the genius of Jackson who, at the time of the secession of Virginia, was an obscure professor at Virginia Military Institute. In fact, it was a point of Lee's own greatness that he could recognize ability in others and knew how to use that ability to the best possible advantage.

Mr. Speaker, we are proud in Clarksburg and in Harrison County that Stonewall Jackson was born there and spent his boyhood either in Clarksburg or at his grandfather's farm and mill a few miles south. His birthplace still stands in Clarksburg and is appropriately marked. His boyhood home, the farm and mill of his grandfather, is now owned by the State and operates as a State 4-H encampment. Today Jackson's Mill is one of West Virginia's proudest shrines. Several years ago a monument to the great Stonewall Jackson was erected on the grounds of the Harrison County Courthouse in Clarksburg.

In making these anniversary remarks, I would be remiss if I did not pay some tribute to Mr. S. J. Birshtein and Mr. J. Z. Terrell, of Clarksburg, great admirers of Stonewall Jackson, whose tireless efforts have contributed greatly to keeping the memory of this great American alive in the community of his birth.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that any Member who may desire to comment on the life and character of General Jackson be permitted to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, it is a useful privilege to recall on the floor of this House, as we do from time to time, the history of our Nation—its times of trial, its hours of triumph and achievement. It is with particular pride that I associate myself with our distinguished West Virginia colleague [Mr. BAILEY], in marking the anniversary of the birth of Thomas J. (Stonewall) Jackson, who lies in honored rest in Lexington, in the Seventh Congressional District of Virginia.

In Lexington, too, stands the only home this great soldier ever owned, and there is Virginia Military Institute—still training men in the science of arms where Stonewall Jackson helped train them prior to the bloody conflict of which we soon shall mark the centenary.

Jackson needs no words of mine to secure his place in history, but his exemplification of qualities which have contributed much to the growth and strength of the United States are well recalled today as we face new trials. He had faith, courage, resolution, ingenuity, integrity. They served him well, and he spent them willingly in the cause for which his conviction and honor impelled him to fight.

As the centennial of the war in which he was to die nears, there have been some suggestions that we should not be planning to celebrate a conflict. Celebrate, of course, is inappropriate. Wars are crosses to be borne in man's faltering plodding toward eternity. There are lessons to be learned from them, however, and not merely military wisdom to be passed on to succeeding generations of soldiery.

Stonewall Jackson's exercises in the maneuverability of land forces remain classics. He was a soldier who knew his craft, but he was neither a mercenary nor an ambitious opportunist. He hated the carnage of war but he fought with determination and resourcefulness because he had, as had Lee and so many other men of honor and inherent good will, thought the matter through, and found no other recourse for principles strongly held than the desperate one of arms.

We are a nation strong, proud, and free because we have been willing to do the necessary as we saw it, in many times and places, and because honor has had value for us. This we need to remember, if we are to remain strong, proud, and free, and it is in this spirit of national self-examination that we rightfully may recall in public observances the causes, events, and effects of our past conflicts. In this way the national spirit can draw forth new vitality from the experiences of history and the people new courage and resolve from the lives of such authentic heroes of power and sensitivity as Stonewall Jackson.

Under the leadership of Mr. Jay W. Johns, of Charlottesville, Va., the Stonewall Jackson Memorial, Inc., has acquired and is preserving Jackson's home at Lexington. It is building there, through the collection of Jackson possessions, correspondence, photographs, and documents, a center of Jackson study.

With the approaching centennial focusing renewed attention on Jackson's exploits, plans have been going forward for the development, under such nonprofit private auspices, of some of the battlefield sites associated with the campaign in the Valley of Virginia which have not been set aside in the past as Federal or State historical reservations.

It is hoped, too, that electrical maps may be placed at one or more points in the valley to provide visitors to the area with a clearer mental picture of the actions.

In this spirit of serious historical inquiry and solemn reflection, the centennial programs may be developed as useful contributions to the clarification of our past struggles for the information and guidance of new generations.

THE LATE HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. KASTENMEIER. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce officially to the House of Representatives the death of the Honorable Charles Hawks, Jr., a former Member of Congress from the Second District of Wisconsin, who died in Philadelphia on January 6, 1960.

A distinguished predecessor of mine, Mr. Hawks served in the 76th Congress. During that time, however, he became well known and well loved for his integrity and dedication to the service of his constituents, his State, and his country. Many of you who knew him personally will receive the news of his passing with a feeling of deep sorrow.

Born to a distinguished Horicon, Wis., family he grew up in a business atmosphere, was trained in business, graduating from the University of Wisconsin School of Commerce, and followed a career of business until the economic and international storms of the thirties and early forties brought him into the political arena.

He served his home county as a county supervisor prior to winning election to Congress in the fall of 1938, and he served his country in Congress during the opening days of the Second World War—a time of change requiring men of courage, determination, and conviction. These he brought with him and these he applied to the tasks at hand.

His ability was quickly recognized with election to four committees and his momentum carried him to national prominence as the national campaign manager for the 1940 presidential aspirations of Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire.

I know that those of you who knew him in Congress will join with me in expressing deepest regrets and sincere sympathy to his mother, his wife, Mrs. Hawks, his son, Charles II, and his daughter, Mrs. Richard Post. It is our hope that they may find some solace in the memory of a son, a husband, and a father whose life was well spent in honored service and in knowing that a host of friends grieve his passing.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to do so may have permission to extend their remarks at this point in the RECORD on the life and character of the late Honorable Charles Hawks, Jr.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I was deeply saddened to learn of the passing of my good friend the Honorable Charles Hawks, Jr., a former Member of Congress who represented the Second District of Wisconsin.

We both served as freshmen during the 76th Congress, and I had the privilege of knowing him well. He was a hard worker devoted to serving his constitutents and his country.

I always admired Charlie for his grasp of governmental affairs. This knowledge was readily recognized and after leaving Congress he associated himself with industry, dealing closely with Federal departments. But Charlie continued his interest in public affairs and kept up his very close association with Members of Congress and his former colleagues. I was always grateful for his warm friendship.

Charlie was one of the most loved Members that ever served in the House of Representatives. Personally, I have lost a dear friend and one for whom I had great regard and affection.

Those of you who were fortunate enough to know him, I know join me in expressing sympathy to his mother, devoted wife, Lucille, and their son and daughter.

TRANSFER OF VON BRAUN TEAM TO NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a House joint resolution which proposes to waive the 60-day waiting period before the President's plan for transferring the Von Braun team from the Army Ballistic Missile Agency to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration can take effect. The transfer would take effect immediately upon the enactment of the joint resolution.

Under section 302(c) of Public Law 85–568, the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958, the President is authorized for a period of 4 years after the date of enactment of this act to transfer appropriate space functions from any other department or agency of the Federal Government to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration. According to the law, any transfers made before January 1, 1959, were to be accompanied by a report from the President to the Congress concerning the nature and effect of such transfer. This was to be in the nature of an informational report. No formal action by the Congress was indicated. Under this authority, the President transferred the Vanguard project from the Navy and the Jet Propulsion Laboratory from the Army to NASA.

For transfers of functions to NASA after December 31, 1958, the President is required under the law not only to submit a full and complete report to the Congress setting forth the nature and effect of the proposed transfer, but the proposal is to lie before the Congress for a period of 60 calendar days following the transmittal. The transfer cannot take effect until this 60-day waiting period has elapsed. During such period, if the Congress is opposed to the transfer, it can enact a concurrent resolution stating its opposition, in which case the transfer plan is killed.

Under the authority just described, the President has transmitted a plan to the Congress proposing transfer of the Development Operations Division—and supporting personnel—directed by Dr. Wernher von Braun, from the Army Ballistic Missile Agency to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

This proposed transfer comes before the Congress during a time of widespread concern that our national programs for space science and exploration are lagging far behind those of Soviet Russia. In view of such concern, I see no disposition on the part of the Congress to oppose the transfer, notwithstanding possible reservations that some Members may have about it.

From one point of view, it could be argued that the transfer of jurisdiction and functions, with all the accompanying administrative, fiscal, and operating adjustments that must be made, may have a disrupting and delaying effect on the performance of the Von Braun team. The fact of the matter is, however, that the Von Braun team has not been allowed to function in the most efficient way. It is an innocent victim of interservice rivalries and inertia and indecision at the Department of Defense level in determining military missions in space.

Had our defense officials—military and civilian—worried less about who was going to do the space job and more about how it was to be done, this country would not be in second place. The Army had resources and know-how to do the space job; what it lacked was a full and clear mandate in space.

Consequently, we are confronted with this situation: To oppose the transfer of the Von Braun team to NASA is to condemn it to continued underutilization because of present restrictions on Army missions; to endorse the transfer incurs the temporary risks of disruption which is an inevitable feature of all major reorganizations but holds forth the promise of a greater and more sustained space effort in the future.

The Von Braun team will not be removed from its present home in the Redstone Arsenal. The arsenal will become, in a sense, a joint operation of Army Ordnance and NASA. The President has assured the Congress in his message of January 14, 1960, transmitting the plan that "every effort will be made to prevent the dislocation or disruption of ongoing missile or space vehicle projects." Also, according to the President's statement, military weapon systems related programs now under development by the Von Braun team will be continued by the Army, which will have the privilege of utilizing the skills of the transferred personnel, as necessary, with reimbursement to NASA for the use of such personnel.

It was contemplated in the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 that the President would find it necessary and appropriate to make transfers of space functions to NASA in order to prevent needless duplication and build up that agency as the key Government unit in space science and exploration for peaceful purposes. Since the President has seen fit to exercise the transfer authority delegated by the Congress, we in the Congress should support these transfers unless compelling circumstances dictate otherwise.

The present critical state of affairs, with new evidence coming in almost every day of Soviet Russia's superiority in space activities, is not a time for leisurely debate and overly cautious consideration. The burden of performance in space activities is vested by law in the President and the Administrator of NASA. Any move now is better than no move. We can only hope that the President and the Administrator will follow through in response to what I believe is a national will and a national determination to overcome our lagging efforts in space. In other words, if we have any doubts, we should resolve them in favor of the President's action.

The best way, it seems to me, that the Congress can record its desire that the administration move ahead vigorously in space exploration is to waive the 60-day waiting period during which the transfer plan is to lie before the Congress. That is the purpose of the joint resolution which I have introduced.

Technically, it might be said that the details involved in this transfer require at least 60 days and possibly many more days to be worked out and that therefore the resolution is not needed. More important, I believe, than the technical details of working out the plan is the high purpose that this resolution would serve in signifying to the Nation that the Congress favors speedy action and supports any constructive endeavor of the administration to make up for deficiencies in space programs.

Furthermore, by enacting a waiver resolution, the agencies concerned with giving effect to the transfer will proceed with firmer purpose and more precise steps in the certain knowledge that the Congress endorses, and does not intend to strike down, the transfer plan.

My proposal is not without precedent. I could cite examples of House and Senate action to move ahead the effective dates of reorganization plans submitted by the President. For example, when President Eisenhower submitted Reorganization Plan No. 1 of 1953 proposing to transform the Federal Security Agency into the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the plan was to take effect 60 days after transmittal, according to the terms of the enabling legislation. By House Joint Resolution 223, enacted in the 1st session of the 83d Congress, the effective date was set ahead to 10 days after enactment of the joint resolution. This was a matter far less urgent than the space function transfer now pending, but the Congress believed it was important to expedite action where agreement on the measure was general.

Nothing will be lost, and something may be gained, by prompt action. If the Congress decides at a later time that other transfers and reorganizations are necessary, which have not been proposed by the President, the Congress can enact legislation on its own. In point of fact, the President has submitted concurrently with the report on the transfer plan, a series of amendments to the National Aeronautics and Space Act of 1958 designed to overcome what he now regards as certain deficiencies in the act. The Committee on Science and Astronautics, on which I am privileged to serve will, I assure you, give careful consideration to the amendments proposed by the President.

In the meantime, the prompt enactment of the joint resolution I have proposed will give the President and NASA Administrator Keith Glennan a clear field of action in one specific phase of our national space effort.

There is another useful purpose which this resolution can serve; namely, to express the sense of the Congress that the Von Braun team should remain essentially intact and be permitted to continue its teamwork in the national interest. It may be that continuance of the Von Braun team as a team is implicit in the fact of the transfer. My resolution would make this arrangement explicit through a congressional statement of policy.

Shortly before the President made his first public announcement of the proposed transfer last October, Administrator Glennan called me at my office in Fresno, Calif., and advised me of the President's intention. After a discussion of the matter, I told him that I would be inclined to support the transfer providing that it would not lead to a breakup of the Von Braun team.

Administrator Glennan assured me that the Von Braun team would be left intact, but I believe that this informal assurance, which other Members also may have received, should be translated into a formal expression by the Congress. Consequently, my resolution contains appropriate wording to that effect. While this wording is in the nature of a preamble or a declaration of policy rather than in the resolving clause, which technically is confined to excepting this transfer plan from section 302 of the National Aeronautics and Space Act, nevertheless the passage of the resolution and its signature by the President will formally record the administration's promise to do what I believe the Congress wants to be done; namely, to make sure that the Von Braun team will continue to work as a team in furthering the national space effort.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR NEXT WEEK

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HALLECK. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time to inquire of the majority leader as to the program for next week.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HALLECK], may I say that there is no legislative program for next week.

Mr. HALLECK. Does the gentleman expect to secure permission to adjourn from today until Monday?

Mr. McCORMACK. Yes.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

ACREAGE ALLOTMENT FOR DURUM WHEAT

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate of the United States:

Ordered, That the House of Representatives be requested to return to the Senate the bill (S. 1282) entitled "An act relating to acreage allotments for Durum wheat."

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request is granted.

There was no objection.

HEARINGS ON BILL, H.R. 9511, TO CANCEL $15 BILLION IN GOVERNMENT SECURITIES REQUESTED

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, several Members of the House have asked me about the status of a bill I introduced to cancel $15 billion of Federal debt obligations now being held by the Federal Reserve System.

The bill is H.R. 9511 and is fully discussed at page 264 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 11, 1960.

In order to advise any who may be interested, the correspondence between the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency—to which the bill has been referred—and me concerning a hearing on the proposal is inserted herewith.

My letter to the chairman and his reply are as follows:

JANUARY 18, 1960.

Hon. BRENT SPENCE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking and Currency, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CHAIRMAN SPENCE: January 11, 1960, I introduced H.R. 9511. The object of this letter is to ask you for a hearing on this bill.

If a hearing is granted, it will be appreciated very much, I assure you.

Sincerely yours,

WRIGHT PATMAN.

JANUARY 20, 1960.

Hon. WRIGHT PATMAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR COLLEAGUE: I have your letter of January 18, asking that hearings be scheduled on your bill, H.R. 9511. I am requesting a report from the Federal Reserve Board on this bill and I will advise you as soon as it is received.

With kind regards, I am,

Very sincerely,

BRENT SPENCE.

FEATHERBEDDING

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, today's column in the New York Times by Arthur Krock is particularly pertinent. Those who worried about the national welfare during the recent steel strike could well take a few minutes to peruse this article.

Last week I was on a nationwide radio program with a Democratic Member of Congress from Pennsylvania who defended featherbedding. It seems to me that the Krock article contains far more logic than any attack that I made on featherbedding. Mr. Krock suggests that union leaders would declare war on the legislator who pressed any of the suggestions that he set forth. Union leaders have already declared war on the Republican Party. Furthermore, I have been told by a number of union presidents that they were out to "get" anyone who supported the Landrum-Griffin bill. The real question is not who is out to get whom or whether it is unwise in an election year to introduce legislation to prohibit monopoly. The question is, Would the American public benefit by labor being subjected to antitrust laws similar to those now applied to business? I think they would and have asked the Legislative Drafting Service to prepare proper legislation to accomplish the tenets set forth in the Krock article.

The column follows:

ON REVOKING THE UNIONS' ANTITRUST IMMUNITIES

(By Arthur Krock)

WASHINGTON, January 20.—Prof. Dudley W. Johnson, of Lehigh University, in a letter on this page of the Times of January 18, questioned whether removing from antitrust laws the special immunity of organized labor would effectively check the unions' monopoly powers to (1) prod inflation by enforced annual wage increases, and (2) halt essential national production by control of the labor supply of nationwide industry. "Those who advocate the further application of antitrust to labor," wrote Professor Johnson, "would be doing a great public service if they would develop the details of such proposals."

This department relayed Professor Johnson's suggestion to several lawyers with great experience in antitrust litigation. The response of one, Joseph W. Burns, of 535 Fifth Avenue, New York City (which included the views of a partner, Blackwell Smith, that are precisely pertinent to the professor's inquiry), are summarized below, with some material quotes.

Burns, agreeing that "the public interest required a curbing of union monopoly power," does not believe "the antitrust laws are the vehicle by which this curbing should be accomplished. * * * What we really want is—

"Not to subject labor unions to these vague, unpredictable antitrust laws—so vague they can mean anything a court wishes them to—but to stop union practices which are against the public interest. * * * There are two separate problems. * * * One is whether legislative curbs should be placed on union economic monopoly power to balance the restrictions placed on business monopoly power. The other is whether legislative curbs are necessary to protect the public interest, regardless of whether the curbs balance restrictions on business."

When Congress, this antitrust lawyer continued, decides "at what point the public interest and convenience require that labor stop asking for more, it can write a law to cover it." Regardless of whether a strike is local or nationwide, in Burns' opinion the basic question is whether labor must give up its right to strike when a strike conflicts with the public interest, just as policemen and firemen have had to do in most States.

This view merely feeds the doubts of the antitrust approach expressed by Johnson. But in a speech several weeks ago to a business advisory group in New York City Blackwell Smith developed the details sought by the professor. "Acts to set up 'unnatural barriers' to trade and 'restrict a free market,'" he told the group, "become illegal automatically if they are used as an expansion device for [industrial] monopoly. * * * [But] matters which are obviously illegal, such as ganging up to put a man out of business, suddenly become legal if done to apply and extend union monopoly power."

Recommending the antitrust approach to the now immune labor monopoly as the only one which really goes to the heart of the matter, Smith suggested these amendments to present law:

1. The first antitrust rule for business is that "no two separate entities can combine or conspire to restrict production or control prices." Extended to labor, this would prevent a combination of all union members in separate plants to shut down an entire industry.

2. The second antitrust rule is that "no limited legal monopoly, such as the utility or the patent monopoly, can be extended to control other activities outside its own strict boundaries." This prevents such a monopoly from "forcing someone to take an unwanted product or service by tying in [these] with the controlled item [the labor supply, for example]." In following that line for unions, "featherbedding would be the first casualty."

3. The third antitrust rule is that no nonlegalized monopoly may use its power "to exclude or foreclose others, restrict production, or control prices." Extended to an industrywide union, the union "could not * * * stop production in a whole line of commerce or an entire area."

These changes in the antitrust laws meet the request for specifications, and they would narrow, not remove, labor's special immunity. However, since the union leaders would declare war on any legislator who pressed such measures, both major political parties will shun them. The attitude that "something must be done to curb the labor monopoly, but not what you suggest," will continue to prevail among lawyers and in Government. This suits the AFL–CIO very well indeed.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE UKRAINE

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSTERTAG. Mr. Speaker, we all know what impact the Captive Nations Week resolution made last year upon the Communist dictatorship and upon world opinion. It struck at a great Communist weakness, by underscoring again the falseness of the Communist claims of complete unity and monolithic power.

One of these captive nations is the Ukraine which established itself as a free and independent nation on January 22, 1918. The 42d anniversary of that event will be marked tomorrow.

Tragically, the Ukrainians did not enjoy their liberty for very long. It was soon trampled by a ruthless Russian Communist Army and brought under the tyranny of Moscow. Even today this Communist tyranny continues in the form of executions of Ukrainian freedom fighters and mass deportations to Siberia.

It is clear that the flame of freedom and liberty continues to burn brightly among the more than 40 million Ukrainians. Devotion to the cause of liberty serves as a strong bond between all freedom-loving men throughout the world. On this important Ukrainian anniversary we reaffirm our support of the cause of freedom everywhere until all freedom-loving peoples may one day enjoy the blessings and richness of true liberty.

SURPLUS FARM COMMODITY UTILIZATION

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute, to revise and extend my remarks, and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to bring to your attention again this legislation on utilization research designed to use more surplus farm commodities in manufacture. In the last session the other body passed S. 690. The House passed the Abernethy bill, H.R. 8639, which I am a sponsor of, on utilization research. The Department of Agriculture has just issued a splendid communication showing the wonderful possibility of using farm surplus in manufacture. I think you will find it on your desk. Please read it.

Mr. Speaker, it is my belief that we can get the other body to accept the House version of our utilization research bill. I hope every Member of the House, as well as the Speaker, will work toward that end because the House version is much superior to the Senate version. As one man said, "In moments of controversy my perception is quite fine. I always see two points of view, the wrong one and mine." Ours is the right version.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture bulletin is as follows:

PROGRESS AND PROSPECTS IN AGRICULTURAL UTILIZATION RESEARCH REPORTED

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, January 1960.

The effort to find new and wider outlets for farm products as foods and as industrial raw materials moved ahead on many fronts during the past year, according to the U.S. Department of Agriculture.

Commercial use of research results expanded in a number of important areas, and promising new results were announced that offer sizable future market opportunities for agricultural commodities. For example:

Wash-and-wear cottons gained wider public acceptance. More than 800,000 bales of cotton are now used annually as a direct result of utilization research in this field. Present cotton wash-and-wear garments represent the culmination of many years of systematic study at USDA's Southern Laboratory, at New Orleans, in cooperation with industry. The published results of these studies constitute most of the world's technical literature on wash-and-wear cottons and provided the technical basis for today's expanding production of these goods.

Use of animal fats in plastics and in livestock feeds continues to increase. USDA's Eastern Laboratory at Philadelphia developed epoxidized oils, which are now going into markets requiring about 40 million pounds of inedible fats each year. The laboratory is also responsible for the development, under contract, of fats as an ingredient of animal feeds, a market that is now consuming about 500 million pounds of fats annually. The most recent research contribution in this field is a compound called vinyl stearate, which provides a superior internal plasticizer for vinyl plastics. A market for at least 100 million pounds a year of this new chemical is expected to develop in the near future.

Dehydrated mashed potatoes are on the market in two forms—granules and flakes—both produced by methods developed through utilization research. About 20 million bushels of potatoes will be used in these products during the coming year, and even larger markets are anticipated in subsequent years.

Dialdehyde starches, a new family of industrial chemicals derived from corn, were put into semicommercial production by two companies during the year. The process for making these chemicals was developed at USDA's Northern Laboratory at Peoria, Ill. Dialdehyde starches have highly promising industrial possibilities for the tanning of leather, for production of paper products with greater wet strength, and for many other uses.

High-amylose corn, which yields starch that is more than 50 percent amylose and has attractive industrial possibilities not open to ordinary starch, is in limited commercial production. This corn and the new uses for the starch it contains is a development of Federal-State-industry research. A quarter of a million pounds of high-amylose starch was made from the 1958 crop of this new corn; acreage was doubled in 1959. The starch is now being evaluated by industry for use in adhesives, films, and paper additives.

Chemicals from turpentine totaling about 2 million pounds are being used as catalysts or initiators in the production of "cold" rubber as a result of research by USDA's Naval Stores Station at Olustee, Fla. About 90 percent of GRS cold-processed synthetic rubber made in this country utilizes turpentine chemicals developed and patented by the station.

Phosphomannan, a new product produced by fermentation of starch, is attracting industrial interest as an adhesive and thickening agent. Some 30 companies are evaluating this material and 4 have already expressed interest in producing it commercially. This recent product of utilization research at the northern laboratory offers another sizable industrial outlet for corn.

Plastic foams made from castor oil are gaining acceptance by industry. Known as urethane foams, they can be produced in rigid or elastic form. About a million pounds of castor oil were used in these products in 1958. Chemists at USDA's Western Laboratory, Albany, Calif., have recently developed methods to give these products better water resistance and shrink resistance, which are expected to expand markets for them.

Other promising recent developments include:

Water-soluble zein, a chemically modified protein of corn, potentially useful in lacquers and printing inks.

A breakthrough in the basic chemistry of wheat gluten, which was previously thought to consist of two proteins but is now known to contain six, each with distinctive properties.

A new antioxidant for alfalfa, which preserves the vitamin A and vitamin E content of dehydrated alfalfa meal for as long as 6 months.

A new cotton card—an attachment for conventional cotton textile machinery—which reduces costs, improves quality, and reduces waste in cotton processing.

A new compound, known as coumestrol, discovered to occur naturally in certain legumes, which exhibits hormone activity similar to that of the synthetic hormone stilbestrol and may provide a basis for improved feed additives.

In basic research on soybean oil, USDA chemists have made this oil radioactive by feeding radioactive carbon to soybean plants during growth. This radioactive tracer technique provides a means for following the mechanism of selective hydrogenation of the oil and will greatly aid in the development of edible soybean oil products of improved physical and nutritional characteristics.

To inform potential users and the general public of the results of utilization research and development, USDA scientists working in this field have, during fiscal year 1959, published 493 research papers in technical journals; obtained 96 new patents; issued 79 licenses for royalty-free use of patents; presented 527 talks before national audiences on their findings; participated in 78 radio and TV broadcasts, and issued 145 press releases describing their work.

In other words, three to four times each day during each of the 365 days of the year, the public was informed of some new contribution of utilization research and development, in the continuing search for new and wider uses for farm products.

Utilization research and development is a major segment of USDA's overall research program, which also includes studies of farm production, marketing, home economics, and forestry.

Funds available for all USDA research have been increased about 100 percent over the past 7 years. Yet because of increased costs, the Department's capacity to do research has actually increased only about 40 percent. The problems facing agriculture still exceed in number and magnitude the current capacity to attack them.

The aim of utilization research and development is to maintain and strengthen traditional markets for the products of agriculture and to create new markets for them. This research is conducted by USDA in 4 main laboratories and 10 smaller ones. It employs about 1,600 people, half of whom are scientists, and is supported by about $16 million in directly appropriated funds. In addition, up to $4 million a year may be spent during the next 5 years for utilization research overseas, supported by foreign currencies derived from the sale abroad of U.S. farm surpluses under Public Law 480.

The emphasis in this work currently is on expanding the use of surplus crops—the cereal grains, cotton, and vegetable and animal fats and oils. The main effort is on development of industrial uses for these crops, as these uses offer the greatest opportunities for economic use of large volumes of surplus commodities. Research also seeks to lower processing costs for food and feed products, and to develop products that have built-in convenience and are less perishable than those now available.

Worthwhile new uses for farm products must be practical uses. Scientists today can make anything from agricultural products that can be made from other organic raw materials, such as petroleum. But utilization research scientists recognize that they must create from agricultural materials the properties desired in the final product, and that the final product must be able to sell at a competitive price. They are not interested in "one-shot" uses for farm commodities that are not economic—for example, industrial alcohol from grain, when technical feasibility has been demonstrated but economic practicality has not.

Like all research, utilization research is necessarily a continuing job. Research constantly seeks to outmode the products it creates. It must continue to improve the products it has developed and to develop still more satisfactory products to replace them.

The outlook is good for increasing substantially the use of agricultural products. For example, in the case of cereal grain an additional 500 million bushels per year can be used by 1975 if research is able to do its job in the following areas:

One hundred and seventy million bushels for use in paper products. Today about 20 million bushels of grain are used in these products. But if we can modify grains or their starches to endow them with new properties of value in papermaking, improved paper products might be made that would contain as much as 5 percent of cereal grains.

One hundred million bushels for industrial chemicals and other nonfood products. Each year, some 40 million bushels of grain go into such products as surface-active agents, antioxidants, polymers, plasticizers, packaging films, chemicals for metallurgical processing, and many other materials. New chemical products now under development from USDA laboratories offer potential outlets for an additional 100 million bushels.

Fifty million bushels for use in producing biological agents for pest control. Work now under way by USDA scientists indicates that it may be feasible to grow biological agents for control of insects and other farm pests using fermentation techniques with cereals in the nutrient medium. An example is milky spore disease of Japanese beetles, which at present can be produced only on the insects themselves.

Two hundred and fifty million bushels in food products. In the food use of cereals there is opportunity for increased consumption and a need for new cereal food products to encourage it. If we ate the cereal products our nutritionists say would be good for us, the United States by 1970 should consume about 925 million bushels of grain a year as food, instead of the 675 million bushels currently consumed.

Another example is the potential large-volume market for agricultural raw materials in the plastics industry. Use of plastics in our economy is expected to continue expanding by leaps and bounds. Today's total annual consumption of plastics, about 6.6 billion pounds, may well increase to some 10 billion pounds by 1965 to supply demands for such products as packaging and industrial films, molded and extruded products, plastic foams, containers, paints, and synthetic rubber.

Agricultural raw materials are suitable for the manufacture of a multitude of plastic products, if they can be made economically. The vegetable and animal oils, starches, and proteins are good starting materials for plastics production. The aim of utilization research is to place farm-grown materials into as much of this expanding multi-billion-pound market as we can as rapidly as possible.

Research can create expanded markets for farm products. It already has. How many new products and new markets can be developed, and how fast, depends on the size and vigor of the effort devoted to the task.

FORTY-SECOND ANNIVERSARY OF UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, January 22, the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence will be observed in ceremonies throughout the country. Commemorated in the hearts of more than 40 million Ukrainians, this day provides us with an opportunity to reaffirm our adherence to the principle of self-determination for all captive nations peoples.

Ukrainian independence was first proclaimed January 22, 1918, following the collapse of the czarist Russian Empire in 1917. Unfortunately, this long-sought freedom lasted only until 1920, when the Ukrainian Republic was overrun by the Communists and forcibly incorporated into the Soviet Empire. Despite the ensuing years of tyranny and subjection, the Ukrainian people have kept alive their cherished goal of national freedom and independence.

The courage of the Ukrainian people stands as an inspiration to all liberty-loving people who are dedicated to the preservation and restoration of human freedom everywhere. On this anniversary all Americans join in the prayer that the captive peoples will soon once again be free.

INTEREST RATES ON LONG-TERM GOVERNMENT INDEBTEDNESS

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, the proposal to abolish the legal ceiling on bond interest rates at this time is a poor way to turn off the faucet of bank credit from adding its flood of purchasing power to the existing inflationary spiral.

I maintain that the present tightening of credit has been a deliberate man-made effort to drive up interest rates to their present artificial rates, with the cooperation of Wall Street, the bankers, and the Federal Reserve Board.

The Federal Reserve Board was organized to aid the fiscal activities of the Government. It has available many weapons, such as open market operations, the discount, and the reserve requirement, to establish interest rates at any level up or down to enable the Government to borrow long-term funds without breaking the interest ceiling.

President Eisenhower has asked for authority to release the control we now have over all the interest rates on long-term Government indebtedness. If this were done, hundreds of millions of dollars in bonds could be issued bearing a 5½- or 5¾-percent interest rate and extending into 20 or 25 years. When Government, through the constitutional right to regulate the value of money, ceases to regulate it by surrendering to the economic royalists, we are then crossing the thin wavering line between liberty and tyranny.

Raising the interest ceiling would take money out of the pockets of a great many of the people in order to find its way back into the pockets of a few. It would decrease the real incomes of all people receiving fixed incomes, and prices would be higher and each dollar would buy less. It will drive up the cost of homes, hospitals, schools, and roads; and the burden of these increased costs would be placed upon the backs of our citizens.

A careful study of the situation reflects that at one time when interest rates were held down, it would have been possible to refinance the long-term debt. It makes me wonder why the administration waited until the interest rate was at the highest point before it asked for the change. It seems to me that there is a fundamental principle of fiscal policy involved in this matter of interest rates that should be met head on with candor and courage, and that the soundest policy to follow would be the retention of the present historical interest ceiling.

PASSENGER TAX SHOULD BE REPEALED

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota?

There was no objection.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. Speaker, the President's budget message for the fiscal year 1961 proposes to extend for another year present excise tax rates. In the same message the President emphasizes that fiscal progress is attainable only if economic growth is not interrupted.

The truth of the matter is that retention of the excise tax on the domestic transportation of persons is inconsistent and in conflict with economic growth both in the transportation industry itself and in those industries that use and depend upon transportation of passengers.

I am convinced that the reduction of the transportation tax from 10 to 5 percent as of June 30, 1960—which was voted in the last session of Congress—must be carried through to its logical conclusion by a complete repeal this session.

I take this position on the basis of three important considerations which, in my opinion, should be controlling.

First of all, there is no question but that this tax tends to depress business and discourage patronage of our domestic transportation facilities. Both the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission, in statements by their respective Chairmen, have emphasized that consumption of transportation is elastic and increases with reduced cost. Both Chairmen specifically stated that removal of the tax would result in substantial additional commercial revenue for the air, rail, and surface transportation companies.

Mr. Speaker, I believe it is self-evident that our airlines, our railroads and our bus companies are vitally dependent upon increased passenger revenues if they are to survive. I read with great interest the remarks of my distinguished colleagues, Mr. METCALF and Mr. HERLONG, who proved conclusively that our transportation establishment is at a crossroad.

I firmly believe we cannot afford to jeopardize the economic life of these companies by continuing a tax, an avowed purpose of which was and is to discourage the use of transportation facilities.

Moreover, the brake on business this tax imposes is not confined merely to the transportation companies whose revenues are thereby artificially curtailed. The depressant effect extends to every business that requires or uses our domestic passenger facilities.

A second objection to this tax is that it discriminates unfairly against a number of important classes of people and areas. It discriminates against long haul passengers and areas in this country where average travel distances, due to geographical factors, are great. South Dakota is a good example. Because of the great distances between cities in this region and because there is great reliance on commercial transportation, these passengers pay more taxes to travel than passengers in the East where distances between cities are substantially shorter.

Moreover, the tax discriminates against States that depend on tourism as an important business. Because the tax increases the cost of travel, it acts as a deterrent to tourists traveling, for example, to visit the beautiful Black Hills area of South Dakota and nearby Mount Rushmore.

The tax discriminates against business activities in which travel of personnel is necessary as distinguished from businesses that do not necessitate travel. It discriminates against the transportation of passengers as compared to the transportation of freight, for which Congress has repealed the tax. It discriminates against domestic travel as compared to travel abroad, for which no tax is levied.

One of the most important inequities of this tax is that it discriminates against the lower income brackets. For people in the lower income brackets a 10-percent premium on the right to travel can make the difference between being able to travel or not.

The tax discriminates against our international-flag carriers and handicaps them in their competition with foreign-flag carriers. My distinguished colleague from the State of Florida cited the very appropriate example of a Paris, France, to Dallas, Tex., flight wherein a passenger buying his ticket from a U.S.-flag carrier would be taxed on the portion of the trip within the United States whereas he would not pay the tax if he purchased the ticket from a foreign carrier.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that this situation affords the foreign carrier a formidable pricing advantage and I certainly concur with my distinguished colleague that incalculable amounts of revenue are being lost by our international-flag carriers as a result of this tax.

Finally, I believe that when the offsetting factors are subtracted from the gross yield of the transportation tax, it is clear that this tax is an unproductive one. Some of these offsetting factors that reduce the $225 million gross yield are the following:

First. Businesses deduct the dollars spent on the transportation tax from the total on which their income taxes are assessed. This results in approximately $70 million in deductions per year which must be subtracted from the gross yield.

Second. Every dollar of domestic commercial revenue that is discouraged by this deterrent tax reduces the total available for taxation under other provisions of the Internal Revenue Code.

Third. Every dollar of commercial revenue lost by our international U.S. flag carriers by reason of the price handicap imposed on domestic portions of flights abroad similarly reduces the total available for taxation.

Fourth. Every dollar of earned commercial revenue that is discouraged and diverted from the subsidized local service or helicopter industries by reason of this tax must be supplied by Federal subsidy, and offsets the transportation tax yield dollar for dollar.

Mr. Speaker, it is evident that this tax cannot be justified on fiscal grounds. The truth is it is questionable whether it produces any net revenue, and it is clearly true that whatever the net yield, it cannot justify the discriminatory and depressant features of the tax. I submit that this tax is a potent factor interrupting and impeding this Nation's economic growth, especially the transportation establishment, and that it should be repealed in its entirety this session.

Consequently, I believe the President's recommendation to extend the excise tax on transportation would tend to defeat the purpose we all agree is vital—the uninterrupted growth of our economy. I am hopeful that this session, for the first time, the question of repeal will be permitted to come to the floor for a vote, and I am confident that if it does the tax will be repealed.

REPORT ON RUSSIA BY VICE ADM. HYMAN G. RICKOVER, U.S. NAVY

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Resolution 407 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, upon requisition of the chairman thereof, not to exceed ten thousand additional copies of the hearings entitled "Report on Russia by Vice Admiral Hyman G. Rickover, United States Navy."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all the language in lines 1 through 6, inclusive, and insert the following—

"Resolved, That there shall be printed ten thousand additional copies of the hearings entitled 'Report on Russia by Vice Admiral Hyman G. Rickover, United States Navy'. Of these additional hearings, five thousand copies shall be prorated to all Members of the House of Representatives, and five thousand copies shall be made available for the use of the House Committee on Appropriations."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REPORT ON THE INTERNATIONAL GEOPHYSICAL YEAR (FEBRUARY 1959)

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration I call up House Resolution 408 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Appropriations, House of Representatives, upon requisition of the chairman thereof, not to exceed four thousand additional copies of the hearings entitled "Report on the International Geophysical Year (February 1959)".

With the following committee amendment:

On line 2 strike out the word "upon" and on line 3 strike out "requisition of the chairman thereof,".

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FACTS ON COMMUNISM: VOLUME 1, THE COMMUNIST IDEOLOGY

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Concurrent Resolution 449 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the publication entitled "Facts on Communism—Volume 1, The Communist Ideology" prepared by the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, Eighty-sixth Congress, first session, be printed as a House document; and that there be printed thirty thousand additional copies of said document of which six thousand shall be for the use of said committee and twenty-four thousand copies to be prorated to the Members of the House of Representatives for a period of ninety days after which time the unused balance shall revert to the Committee on Un-American Activities.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I should like to ask the gentleman if these have been cleared with the minority members of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. They have been cleared with the minority members of the committee and also with the minority leader.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I thank the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 10, after the word "Representatives" insert a period and strike out the balance of line 10 and lines 11 and 12.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NOMINATION AND ELECTION OF THE PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT, ETC.

Mr. JONES of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on House Administration, I call up House Concurrent Resolution 457 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed as a House document the publication entitled "Nomination and Election of the President and Vice President of the United States, Including the Manner of Selecting Delegates to Political Conventions"; and that there be printed an additional fifty thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives, said copies to be prorated to the Members and Resident Commissioner.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE LATE HONORABLE WILLIAM LANGER

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK].

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, in the recent death of our late colleague in the Congress, and a personal friend of mine whom I admired very much, Senator William Langer, we have lost not only a colorful political figure, but one who had a rare capacity for friendship, and above all, loyalty to the principles and policies that he believed in. I was proud to count Bill Langer among my closest, personal friends. He was a legislator of stalwart independence of thought and action. His courage as a legislator was outstanding and well known to all. Bill Langer was a formidable debater, a legislator and public official of consummate skill and one who served, with great devotion, his constituents and his friends.

Our late friend, Bill Langer, enjoyed a good fight and he was loved and admired by countless of thousands of persons, even by some who did not wholly agree with him because of the fact that he was a fighter. Typical of the way his constituents felt about him was the often quoted remark: "If a farmer complained he had no washer for his wringer, he could depend on his old friend Bill to get it for him." This determined his state of mind in helping others who came to him, particularly the sick, then unemployed, and the underprivileged. The above saying dramatizes a very real trait in Bill Langer's character and this trait was naturally ingrained in him. The more one needed Bill Langer's help, the surer such a person was that he would come to their aid with all the driving force and energy of his great heart and able brain. For Bill Langer was not a fairweather friend. He was the kind of a friend who loved to find an opportunity to give aid when it was really needed.

It was just like him to stay with his late wife, Mrs. Lydia Langer, in her illness all through the bitterly contested campaign of 1958. While he was up for reelection in a hard-fought campaign, he did not make a single campaign speech, staying at the bedside of his wife and stating, "I just won't leave Lydia." This is the kind of love and devotion between husband and wife that is an inspiration and example for all others to follow.

In the passing of Bill Langer, one of the most courageous and distinguished political figures in the legislature of our Nation, has taken the journey into the Great Beyond. Those who knew Bill Langer and the nobility of character that he possessed, will greatly miss him.

To his loved ones left behind, Mrs. McCormack and I extend our deep sympathy to them in the great loss and sorrow. I know that the outstanding life that their late father led, his great courage in the many years that he rendered public service, and his noble outlook of life, will always be a source of consolation to them.

THE CHALLENGE OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

The SPEAKER. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, as this Nation confronts the challenge of economic competition with Soviet Russia, it is becoming apparent to more and more Americans that victory or defeat hinges to a large extent upon the degree of responsibility exercised by those who represent labor and management at the pinion of our free economy: the bargaining table.

Clearly, we can fall far behind and lose out in this vital struggle if we, as a Nation, should be so foolish as to forfeit the advantages of our free economic system by continually indulging in prolonged nationwide strikes, inflationary wage settlements, or by refusing to utilize efficiently the technological advances which increase the rate of productivity.

The preservation of free collective bargaining—as well as our free enterprise system itself—depends, I believe, upon a rapid development, in the ranks and leadership of both labor and management, of an enlightened and responsible outlook which takes into account the national interest and the public good.

Now that the steel strike settlement has granted the leaders of management and organized labor a brief reprieve—it should be apparent to them that they must raise their sights a notch toward higher ground. If they do not, someday they could find themselves hanging together on the gallows of government dictation.

The responsible approach of government to the difficult problems we face in this field must be essentially nonpartisan—nonpartisan in the sense that neither labor nor management should receive favored treatment for the sake of political gain or selfish economic advantage. This does not mean that both sides are always equally guilty in every labor dispute. However, it does mean that government bears a solemn, fundamental obligation to hue strictly to policies which are in the overall best interest of the Nation.

Because these considerations are so vital, the people are looking for an answer in this election year to the question: Which party is better able to provide the kind of leadership that is needed in this field?

While I gladly tip my hat to those rugged individuals on the other side of the aisle who have dared at times to rise above partisan pressures; nevertheless the fact remains—as was pointed out by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BYRNES]—that the Democratic Party is seriously and hopelessly divided against itself.

Clearly, the Republican Party—as the party of unity, with democracy within its ranks and a philosophy based upon principle—is the party which is better equipped today to provide the kind of responsible, nonpartisan leadership so essential in this explosive field of labor-management relations.

In considering the relative positions of labor and industry today, it is significant to note that they have gone through somewhat similar cycles of development. Both are now powerful, gigantic economic forces in America. That was not always the case. The credentials of the Republican Party for leadership in this field are underscored by a review of the development cycles of these two economic forces.

THE RISE OF INDUSTRY

When our Constitution was written, industry was an underdog compared to the vast agrarian interests, the plantation owners, and shippers. Alexander Hamilton grasped the importance of encouraging industrial development. He advocated protectionist policies that paved the way for the rise of industrial capitalism. By the 1890's, however, far from being the underdog in our economy, industry was reaching the monopoly stage.

Unreasonable transportation rates oppressed the farmers. The vast financial power of industrial monopolies stifled the growth of a labor movement. Industrial monopolies moved into the political realm and, in effect, put legislators on their payrolls.

In the face of this situation, Theodore Roosevelt republicanism came to the front and provided an opportunity for the people of America to demonstrate that they, not the captains of industry, were still the boss. Earlier a Republican-controlled Congress, in 1890, had passed the first antitrust law. Theodore Roosevelt and later, William Howard Taft, led a crusade to break up the trusts which had placed special interest above the public good.

Theodore Roosevelt and William Howard Taft did not evaluate industry's relative position by looking in a rearview mirror. Instead, they saw the difference between Hamilton's day when industry was down under, and their day when industry was up on top.

With enactment of the antitrust laws and the enforcement which gradually followed, anguished cries came from some business leaders that the laws, restraints, and enforcement would stifle industrial growth. The opposite was true. The restraints restored freedom and competition in industry at large and improved the general health of our economy.

THE RISE OF LABOR

Now, let us turn to the rise of the labor movement. In many respects, its development parallels that of the earlier rise of industry.

For several reasons, the labor movement in America began in an underdog status. Unions were confronted with the difficult job of proving to the public and prospective members that they supported a free enterprise economy and that they would not become instruments of violence and gangsterism.

Realizing this, important American labor leaders of an earlier day rejected the goal of political power. In building the American Federation of Labor, Samuel Gompers, for example, had one objective—the betterment and growth of the laboring man. He refused to set off class conflict. He strongly supported the free enterprise system. And, as to the inside workings of the union, one biographer says that he believed the labor movement should be "a voluntary organization of wage earners with mutual problems and common ideals. He—Gompers—put his faith and trust in voluntary principles and never wavered in that course."

As labor unions grew in membership and economic power, the aims of some labor unions began to change. During the period when the Sherman antitrust law of 1890 and the Clayton Act of 1914 were taking privileges and immunities away from business, the labor movement was being granted—and rightly so—some special immunities. But all labor leaders did not exercise the statesmanship of Gompers, and as the 20th century wore on the special immunities of organized labor were soon being abused by some leaders.

Some unions made a mockery of democratic rule. They resorted to various forms of coercion. In some unions, an iron curtain was virtually drawn between the union rank and file and their union leaders.

A comparison is apparent with the earlier rise of industry. In both cases, abuses sprang out of special immunities which each enjoyed in their infant stage.

As the public in earlier decades had demanded business reform, so did the public last year demand labor reform. Just as the Republicans had provided leadership in the movement for business reform, so did Republicans again provide leadership and support in the drive for passage last year of the bipartisan labor reform bill.

SIMILARITIES IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF LABOR AND INDUSTRY

So, we see a great similarity in the rise of industrial and union power in the United States. For labor and management alike, Republicans have supported and led the fight for remedial reform legislation. Enactment of the Sherman antitrust law, the Taft-Hartley Act, and the labor reform bill of last session all indicate that, when the overall public good is endangered, the people will rise up to assert their will, and that Republicans historically have provided the vehicle for reform in both business and labor.

Looking to the future, union and industry leaders, as partners, must cope realistically with the problems which arise through technological advances. There is no statesmanship in union policies which fight progress through featherbedding and outdated work rules.

At the same time, good management must approach these problems with understanding and patience, and a realization that sometimes work habits cannot be changed overnight.

The union movement and the whole Nation have just as important a stake in the goal of increased production as does industrial management. For it is greater production through cheaper and more efficient means that has brought the majority of our craft union workers into the middle income group in America.

How do we attain increased production which will place more and better goods at lower prices in the hands of more consumers?

By increasing the efficiency of the tools in the hands of the workers. And these tools come into being in a free economy through the investment of funds that have been saved. Yes, tools and industrial jobs come from savings. And, parenthetically, it is important to add that the willingness of people to save depends upon their confidence in the stability of the currency. Their confidence in the stability of the currency is undermined and destroyed when wage-price spirals continually fan the flames of inflation.

Some enlightened labor leaders are becoming concerned over the fact that foreign steel now can be sold in Cleveland $55 per ton cheaper than steel produced right in Cleveland. To meet such foreign competition, union leaders as well as management should be crusading for, not against, better tools, greater plant modernization and increased productivity.

Enlightened union leaders are justifiably concerned about the price of the products produced by their members. In the face of stiff foreign competition, union members are confronted with the grave and real threat of being priced out of their jobs.

THE RECENT STEEL SETTLEMENT

Against that background, I should like to discuss some aspects of the recent steel strike settlement.

It should be clear that if the settlement eventually results in higher steel prices, steel workers as well as consumers will suffer.

Although many people throughout the country are understandably disturbed about the possibility of inflationary effects, there is another side of the steel strike settlement which should not be overlooked. The head of one steel company has put it this way:

> We have been in this wage-price spiral for 20-odd years. You can't stop a great wave dead in its tracks all at one crack. We have made a great effort * * * to stop it. * * *
>
> Now, the settlement, as actually made, gives an advance of about half in the next 3 years of what we have had in the past 3 years. That's a pretty fair step forward.

Mr. Roger Blough, chairman of the board of United States Steel, has noted that the average annual increase in hourly employment costs resulting from the recent steel settlement will be 3½ to 3¾ percent. In other steel settlements during the postwar period, says Mr. Blough, hourly employment costs have been rising at an average rate of 8 percent a year. It is significant that the postwar trend has been cut in half by the recent settlement.

It is interesting also to compare the average annual increase in employment cost resulting from the recent steel settlement with the increases involved in settlements made in other related industries during 1959:

Aluminum industry, 5.2 percent.

Can industry, 4.5 percent.

Kaiser—steel—3.82 percent.

Steel, 3.75 percent.

Although many people are not satisfied with the terms, the settlement of the steel dispute can be viewed as a constructive achievement for another reason. Whether we like it or not, 1960 is an election year and the political fur is flying.

A resumption of the steel strike would have brought urgent cries for immediate legislative action. Such legislation could not have been considered in an atmosphere of calm, unemotional deliberation. On the contrary, there were understandable fears about the kind of legislation that might have been enacted under such circumstances.

In discussing the considerations and pressures which finally brought about the settlement, one steel executive said this:

The thing that really ended the matter—really what finally made us capitulate—was the politicians in Congress.

The real pressure that developed was the fear of a Democratic Congress and what they would do if they had to meet an emergency. If there was a threat of a resumption of the strike, Congress would be proposing all kinds of laws to prevent it, and these laws would not be the kind that would be carefully considered or thoughtfully discussed. They would be emergency laws passed in order to force a settlement of the strike. It was the fear of that kind of law, as well as the threat of the steel strike being resumed, which most of us thought would do a lasting damage to our employer-employee relations and to the whole country.

Vice President NIXON and Secretary of Labor Mitchell have been subjected in some quarters to charges of political involvement in the steel settlement. Paradoxically, they actually helped to extricate the steel dispute from the mire of politics, in a highly political year. In a real sense, the settlement has given the process of free collective bargaining another chance for survival.

However, in my view, the steel settlement has not lifted from Congress the responsibility to study, in a calm and deliberate manner, the problems involved in nationwide strikes, and to consider possible changes in existing laws.

I believe that one basic principle should underlie consideration of such future legislation: It is sounder and wiser to limit the power of those who violate the public interest than it is to heap on mountains of Government controls. If the Government eventually becomes a price and wage fixer, we may have curbed monopolistic practices in labor and business—but, in so doing, we will have created a gigantic monopoly of Government.

There have been suggestions of laws to create rigid factfinding boards before a strike occurs. There is a real danger that such boards could be quickly turned into political weapons to administer prices and wages. Let us pause and think deeply before rushing to enact such legislation.

Much more commendable for immediate implementation is the suggestion advanced by President Eisenhower in his state of the Union address. He said:

The national interest demands that in the period of industrial peace which has been assured by the new contract, both management and labor make every possible effort to increase efficiency and productivity in the manufacture of steel so that price increases can be avoided. * * *

It is my intention to encourage regular discussions between management and labor outside the bargaining table, to consider the interest of the public as well as their mutual interest in the maintenance of industrial peace, price stability, and economic growth.

DIFFERENCES IN THE WAYS REPUBLICANS AND DEMOCRATS FACE THE AGE AHEAD

The immediate duty of my party, and of every Member of Congress, is to do his utmost to enlighten the public about the crisis we face in the labor-management field. For if the public is awakened, the special interest groups will also begin to realize that labor as well as the whole Nation benefits through increasing production, maximizing inventive genius and technology, encouraging savings for new investment to create new jobs, providing noninflationary wage increases to put more money into consumer hands, and promoting national growth of a dynamic and creative economy.

Unfortunately, I fear that many of my colleagues in the other party continue to view the future through a rearview mirror, reflecting the depression decade of the thirties. Many Democrats, particularly those who follow the line of the Democratic advisory council, continue to tag themselves as "reactionaries" and "partisans" by standing timidly and fearfully on the threshold of the 1960's. Seemingly, they prefer to spend all their time squabbling over the way the cake is sliced instead of helping to bake a larger cake so everybody can have a bigger slice.

Republicans, on the other hand, believe that we must move with the times and not live in the past.

We believe that our contest with communism depends upon forward-looking statesmanship—from union leaders, from management, from this Congress, and from each political party.

We believe that we can preserve our free enterprise system and continue to promote the prosperity of labor and of all Americans.

In closing, I call upon Republicans and all my colleagues in the Congress to address themselves with renewed vigor and imagination to the call of industrial statesmanship. For, with responsible leadership and faith in a dynamic America, men of good will can advance to new horizons in human understanding and economic progress in the decade of the "soaring sixties."

Mr. Speaker, I have quoted from portions of a recent article by Columnist David Lawrence, which appeared in the January 18 issue of the Washington Star. I ask unanimous consent that the article be reprinted in full at the conclusion of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. ASPINALL). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

(The article referred to follows:)

[From the Washington Star, January 18, 1960]

THE STEEL PACT IN GRAY AREA

(By David Lawrence)

Executives of the various steel companies have been reviewing what really happened in the settlement of the steel strike, and most of them have come to the conclusion that maybe the final agreement reached was not as bad for them as it has been painted.

There is a tendency to agree with what President Eisenhower said about the pressure of circumstances, rather than the pressure of Government, as the paramount influence in bringing about the settlement.

The head of one company put it this way:

"We have been in this wage-price spiral for 20-odd years. You can't stop a great wave of that kind dead in its tracks all at one crack. We've made a great effort in the steel business to try to stop it. We made some mistakes as we went along but, by and large, we tried our best to slow the thing down.

"Now, the settlement, as actually made, gives an advance of about half in the next 3 years of what we've had in the past 3 years. That's a pretty fair step forward. The thing that really ended the matter—really what finally made us capitulate—was the politicians in Congress.

"The real pressure that developed was the fear of a Democratic Congress and what they would do if they had to meet an emergency. If there was a threat of a resumption of the strike, Congress would be proposing all kinds of laws to prevent it, and these laws would not be the kind that would be carefully considered or thoughtfully discussed. They would be emergency laws passed in order to force a settlement of the strike. It was the fear of that kind of law, as well as the threat of the steel strike being resumed, which most of us thought would do a lasting damage to our employer-employee relations and to the whole country. We would have had a difficult time ever getting repeal of the drastic, ill-considered legislation that would have been passed."

The head of another steel company believes the adverse nature of the settlement has been overemphasized. He says:

"No one, of course, could ever say this settlement was a victory for the steel industry, for we did not accomplish our main objectives of a noninflationary settlement and change in work rules which would promote efficiency. Nevertheless, as Mr. Blough, of United States Steel, pointed out, we did reduce the rate of increase in employment costs to about 3¾ percent as compared with an average of 8 percent throughout the postwar period. This is no mean accomplishment. In addition, we alerted the public, including the steelworkers, to the importance of the work-rule issues, and one may hope that this could bring some fruitful results as time goes along.

Some writers contended, for one thing, that if the industry had settled on the union offer of 15 cents an hour prior to the strike, this would have meant 37½ cents for a 30-month period as compared with 41 cents in the actual settlement. The kind of 15-cent-an-hour offer made by the union prior to the strike was the same as the 1956 settlement which resulted in an employment cost of 81 cents an hour for the 3-year period. This is exactly what would have happened had we accepted the original so-called 15-cent offer. The union never counts the related costs of wage increases—for overtime, holiday pay, vacation pay, etc.—nor did they at that time look with favor at any limitation of the cost-of-living clause.

"In addition, some writers painted the picture of the Kaiser settlement as being more favorable than the industry's settlement. This is not true. The Kaiser settlement cost about 5 percent per annum as compared with 3.75 percent for the industry settlement. The Kaiser wage increase becomes effective July 1 as compared with December 1 for the industry. Furthermore, the industry has an offset against the 3-cent cost-of-living clause in excess insurance costs; Kaiser has no such offset. In addition, the industry is settled for an extra year which is in itself an advantage. A settlement which was better than the Kaiser, can industry, aluminum or copper settlements also was quite a remarkable achievement.

"So what am I saying? Simply that this deal was not 'all black' nor 'all white.' It was in the gray area. If those who believe in this cause keep at it, additional progress can be made with the hope that intelligent people can truly arrest inflation over a reasonable period of time."

Both the foregoing expressions from executives of two important steel companies were spontaneously made, independently of one another, in an informal review of the controversy. It is conceded that, while the industry paid a heavy price in the cost of work interruption, the drawing of public attention to the basic issue of work rules was a gain in a long-range sense for management.

Just what the political gains or losses will be remain yet to be determined. The administration's position is that it acted as an informal mediator and that it made no promises about future legislation and gave no sanction to any agreement on prices. The steel men say privately that each company will have to decide for itself whether or not to increase prices and when such prices would go into effect.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BYRNES of Wisconsin. I would like to compliment the gentleman from Michigan on the statement he has just made. I think he has analyzed the problems extremely well. He has made a valuable contribution not only by analyzing the differences between the two parties in their approach to this subject but also to the general thinking of all of us with respect to the problems that exist.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. ROGERS of Colorado. In the gentleman's discussion he has outlined that the Republican Party has since 1890 backed up the antitrust laws. He states the Republican leadership has carried out the enforcement of those laws. Then he made a reference to the relation of labor in connection with the antitrust laws.

The question I want to ask is this: Is it the Republican Party's position that organized labor should now be under antitrust laws?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman has called attention to a subject that is very complex. There are some who believe that all problems in this field could be solved in one swoop simply by subjecting labor unions to the Sherman antitrust law. I do not agree.

I am not saying that labor unions automatically should be brought under the same antitrust laws that apply to business. However, I do believe that some type of reasonable monopoly control, tailored fairly and appropriately to fit labor organizations, should be considered by the Congress along with other legislative proposals which bear on the cause and effect of nationwide strikes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the gentleman on the excellence of his speech.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I thank the gentleman.

THE CHALLENGE OF ENLARGING ECONOMIC FREEDOM FOR OUR CHILDREN: PART I. THE PERILS TO ECONOMIC FREEDOM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RHODES] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, in the opening speech of this series, the chairman of the Republican policy committee noted four qualities which we consider essential for successfully meeting the challenges of the age ahead. Indeed, any party that would go through the 1960's without these qualities would be merely a conspiracy to gain power, a machine devoted to self-serving ends, an organization incapable of meeting the opportunities of the age.

We now shall consider the challenge of preserving—even more of expanding—economic freedom for future Americans. I shall review the economic peril to freedom. The following speech of this series will present a dynamic program for us to roll back this peril, and actually enlarge economic freedom for our children. For a party to comprehend this challenge requires that party to possess the fourth essential quality: It must have a perspective which projects beyond immediacy and temptations to live each day for the political advantages thereof, and sees America as it must be in the year 2000 and beyond.

Today, because of our foreign policies outlined in earlier speeches of this series, no American boys are now fighting with weapons of war to preserve the freedom of our children. But, a fierce decisive war is being waged on another battleground to preserve the freedom of those children. That is the battleground of the American economy. The battle is between two diametrically opposed groups: the one which thinks fiscal responsibility amounts to being miserly with the Federal purse strings, that it is a negative, standpat, hold-the-line approach. The other group is convinced that fiscal irresponsibility is a deadly enemy that can put our children in a harness with no escape, and that continued irresponsibility can so tighten the harness that those children will be defenseless before the Sino-Soviet economic competition.

We Republicans firmly believe that the destruction of freedom by fiscal irresponsibility can occur in two ways:

First. By the vast Federal expenditures which inevitably create new bureaucracy, more federalization, and greater centralization in Washington. The octopuslike growth of such statism sends tentacles into every crevice of American life. By subsidizing activities, it can subsidize ideas, from the top down, as in a totalitarian state.

Second. It can occur because of the mammoth Federal expenditures from an unbalanced budget which undermine the value of the dollar, suck the average American into a whirlpool of inflation and rising taxes. This treats with brutality persons on fixed incomes and pensions and gradually destroys the freedoms of choice and action of each member of every American family—father, son, housewife, and daughter.

This is tyranny.

Strangely enough, we seem to have forgotten that such tyranny is not new to our history. It is as old as the struggle between the Colonies and the Crown when these United States were formed.

The tyranny George III imposed on the Colonies was one of mercantilism—a centrally directed economic system in which London dictated to every colonist, deprived him of freedom, and weighed him down with unjust taxation.

This drove the Colonies to military revolt, just as today bureaucracy, inflation, and high taxes are driving the average American to a sense of frustration—the feeling that his Government is something apart from him.

THE BIRTH OF ECONOMIC TYRANNY IN OUR TIME: THE RATCHET WHEEL

How did an American society which bled in such a valorous overthrow of taxation and bureaucracy in 1776 fall prey again in our day to the same economic forces?

The road back to economic tyranny began during the depression of the 1930's. The Roosevelt administration met the dilemma with short-range expediency for immediate needs. Indeed, those needs were staggering, and much had to be done to take care of the wants of thousands of innocent victims of a financial crisis.

Plainly, some social and fiscal improvements were needed in our capitalistic economy. But many responsible Americans were horrified when they realized New Deal policies were heading us, pell-mell, toward permanent deficit financing and subsidization. In such modified socialism, they saw accumulation of tremendous economic and political power by a Government bureaucracy.

The New Deal started in motion a one-way economic ratchet wheel that has never been stopped.

The teeth of this inflationary ratchet wheel spin against a catch of reckless spending. It can whirl in but one direction—the way of higher prices. It is not reversible. Since the New Deal, it has spun dizzily and continuously on a spoke of economic ruin. Every new click means a higher price. Each revolution produces a debt carryover from one administration to another, from one generation to another. For all time, every turn destroys a part of the dollar.

The inflationary ratchet wheel was started ostensibly to get more money into the hands of the underprivileged. What began as a plan to soak rich Peter to pay poor Paul, however, resulted in soaking Paul to pay Paul. Eventually, the masses of the people who were to have benefited under this plan found themselves in the grip of rising taxation and discouraging inflation.

In applying the inflationary and deficit financing cure to the malady of unemployment, the Roosevelt administration made the illness worse. This is now clearly recognized even by most members of the other party. I quote from a February 26, 1959, speech of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BOWLES]:

But, Mr. Speaker, let us face the fact that the New Deal failed in its second major objective, which was to restore full employment and prosperity to our country. In 1940, more than 8 million Americans were still unemployed; 14½ percent of the working force.

Mr. Speaker, I include as part of my remarks a table documenting the lack of effect of New Deal policies on unemployment:

	Deficit (billions)	Unemployed (millions)	Percentage of unemployment
1931	$0.5	8.0	15.9
1932	2.7	12.1	23.6
1933	2.6	12.8	24.9
1934	3.6	11.3	21.7
1935	2.8	10.6	20.1
1936	4.4	9.0	16.9
1937	2.8	7.7	14.3
1938	1.2	10.4	19.0
1939	3.9	9.5	17.2
1940	3.9	8.1	14.6

War orders beginning in 1939 pulled us out of that depression.

Two other unemployment cures of the New Deal equally failed. First was the cheap money policy, and its corollary, low interest rates. Ironically, from 1933 to 1939 unemployment increased as interest rates were lowered.

Secondly, those administrations encouraged labor leaders to follow monopolistic practices by injecting inflationary wage hikes into the expiring body of economic soundness. Both the Roosevelt and Truman administrations favored a rising wage schedule, regardless of production and its effect on inflation. These escalator clauses, as much as any other single factor, produced an inflexible, irreversible, inflationary pressure. Today, union members have administered wages, rather than competitive wages. The shortsighted worker believes this system of regimentation protects and helps him. But, the longsighted worker knows that eventually it will hurt his prosperity, as well as destroy purchasing power, and his freedom.

The Roosevelt and Truman administrations applied similar economics to farm prices. Millions of dollars were poured into a parity system. Prices were maintained at high levels. Uneconomic farmers were subsidized in a type of farming that was not to their best interests. Their products were priced out of the real market, but were maintained by artificial supports financed by other groups in our society.

Today, everyone agrees the farm program is critically sick, that surpluses have become a national headache. Subsequent administrations never can entirely undo the harmful effects of Roosevelt and Truman policies in the field of agriculture.

Here again we pause to consider how important is that fourth quality of a wise political party: The long-range perspective to see beyond immediacy and easy temptations of any particular crisis, any special month or year. Sincerely, I do not believe that either of those two administrations would have inaugurated this tragic farm program, if Scrooge's Ghost of the Future could have let them stand for a moment with us now to see the monster their easy solutions created.

I turn now to specific examples of how this tyranny of deficit financing has oppressed different sectors of our society. And please note that in each case, we Republicans like to think in terms of real disposable income—that is, the real purchasing power from the income of an individual or a family. In other words, the gross national product is not the sole measure of our economic health. The real disposable income, or the family spending and investing money, is a much closer thermometer of the freedom and prosperity of our citizens.

Consider first the tyranny of inflation over the pensioned: What has happened to the real disposable part of a $1,200 pension between 1939 and 1959? The following table which I shall insert reveals that due to inflation, it lost 52.1 percent of its value:

Year	Yearly amount received by pensioner	Purchasing power of the pension
1939	$1,200	$1,200
1953	1,200	623
1959	1,200	575

It is significant to note that the inflation which almost cut the purchasing power of pensions in half during the Roosevelt and Truman administrations was to a large extent arrested during the Eisenhower administration. I believe it would have been totally arrested had the Republicans controlled Congress.

Next, consider the tyranny of inflation over the widow: For years, one head of a family sacrificed to provide for his survivors. His principal provision for his widow was in life insurance—almost $30,000 worth—that he took out in 1929 just before the depression. He had given up many vacations in order to pay up his policy, but he was comforted by the thought that after his death his widow would have few financial worries. When he died in 1953, his $30,000 policy was worth only $19,230 in terms of purchasing power of the dollar when he took out the policy.

Thirdly, consider the tyranny of inflation over the school teacher: Based on nationwide statistics, the average college faculty salary has risen almost three times since 1939. That looks good on the surface. But, when you account for the effects of inflation and taxes, a married faculty member with two children was $47 better off in 1939 than today. So, it would appear that the gigantic spending programs of the previous administrations, which in 10 years caused our dollar to lose half its value, hurt rather than helped our college faculties. There should be a lesson in this for those who seek federalization of education as the way to meet Russian competition.

Lastly, consider the tyranny of taxes and inflation over household spending money: Taxes and inflation have prevented the average American family from increasing its real disposable income as rapidly as our growing economy warranted. Mr. Speaker, I include as part of my remarks a table showing the tyranny of spenders on an average family:

Year	Average family income in terms of that year's dollars	Minus taxes	Real disposable family income in terms of purchasing power of 1940 dollar
1929	$2,908	$2,821	$2,305
1940	2,247	2,171	2,171
1950	5,195	4,716	2,748
1953	6,147	5,375	2,814
1959	7,328	6,438	3,110

It becomes apparent that between 1940 and 1959 the average family income increased by $5,081 in terms of paycheck figures, but it increased by but $939 between 1940 and 1959 in actual value after accounting for increased taxes and inflation. During a period when the gross national product increased over four and one-half times, the real household spending money had increased considerably less than one time. Why? Because of the legacy of the New-Fair Deal inflationary and tax policies.

Let us account for some of the 1958 money a typical American family receiving $5,000 did not get because of taxes. The Federal income tax took $491, and as an average, other Federal taxes took $147. Then there is the startling figure of the economists—$173—which is the share of the Federal taxes on corporations which is passed on to the consumer in terms of higher prices. Directly, $811 has disappeared from that $5,000 earnings. It has reappeared in Uncle Sam's pocket. This does not take into account the purchasing power lost through inflation.

Of this $811, $38.50 went to support farm prices, $4.12 went to provide rural electricity, $4.99 went to the Housing and Home Finance Agency, and $85.56 went to pay the interest on the national debt. So, let us turn to this national debt.

DEBT RESPONSIBILITY

Who is responsible for this debt whose annual interest payments cost that $5,000 breadwinner over $85 a year?

Is it the Executive or the Congress? Treating the executive first, I now request consent to place in the RECORD a table which demonstrates conclusively that since the turn of the century, over 90 percent of our debt increases occurred during Democratic administrations.

(See table A.)

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. The second table I shall insert reflects the spending record of the Congress. During this century, when the opposition has controlled the House of Representatives our national debt has been increased by over 100 percent of our total present debt. During the 26 years the Republicans controlled this body, the debt was reduced.

(See table B.)

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. My point in including these tables is to show that the other party while in the White House and in control of Congress—whichever approach is used—has had the characteristic of high spending. It has the tendency to downgrade the importance of fiscal responsibility. I realize that the last three wars have occurred when that party controlled the White House and Congress. These wars did contribute greatly to our staggering national debt. Perhaps the fact that that party was in power when wartimes demanded deficit spending bred in it the habit of peacetime deficit spending, or to put it another way, the short-range crisis viewpoint of all problems.

In any event, much of this high spending during peacetime was done under the guise of kindness to the common man, a kindness, unhappily, which turned into a tyranny over the common man.

We have already seen whom this tyranny oppresses. We took examples of the elderly living on pensions, the widow, the dedicated schoolteacher, and the typical American family that becomes bonded to taxes and rising prices. These were groups especially hurt by the 50 percent decline of the dollar from 1939 to 1949. These are not the millionaires, not the society of the rich. These are the common everyday people that make up this great country.

That leads me to another observation about the second quality we have called essential to a political party being beneficial to the Nation. I refer to a coherent political philosophy based on principle. The political philosophy of the opposition party supposedly has been one of helping the common man. Yet, we see now how the New and Fair Deal philosophy perpetuated beyond the crisis which gave it birth, has boomeranged to hurt the common man. In other words, this philosophy about helping the common man by the economy of deficit spending is a camouflage of true facts.

Will some constructive thinkers accuse us of dwelling too much on the past? Will they say that the depression of 1929 to 1939 was indeed a difficult dilemma, as was the postwar adjustment of 1945–1949? Will they maintain that at least the Democrats tried different solutions, and even if they erred on the side of an expediency that hampered the dynamic forces in our economy, at least we should give them credit for experimenting? At least, should we let the dead bury the dead?

Here is how I answer:

Were this dead past really dead, I would agree not to disturb it. But, as we enter a decade of tremendous promise, that dead past reaches out and clutches at our economic vitals until we realize it is not dead at all. Especially the Democratic advisory council has made an idol out of those past policies of deficit spending, inflation, and subsidization. Apparently it intends to apply them to the decade ahead, if an advisory-council-sponsored President again enters the White House.

The Democratic advisory council still lives in the 1930's. They peer through that rearview mirror and attempt to apply to our prosperous economy the same program of regimentation which started our economic difficulties in the first place. Their methods can steal from our grasp the opportunities of the age ahead. The advisory council's Leon Keyserling has become the economic spokesman of his group and his philosophy is that deficit spending is the road to prosperity.

The Democratic council thus far has been unable to comprehend what made America the greatest producer, the most prosperous Nation in history. The American inventive and productive genius has given us our standard of living. Every American, and especially every worker, has had a direct interest in our industrial capitalism. And it is the duty of government to be continually watchful that industrial monopoly does not destroy that interest of the worker.

At least until recently, the Marxian concept that wages and profits are in conflict has been disbelieved in America. And if it is beginning to be believed now, responsible are the two previous administrations which encouraged union monopoly to demand higher and higher wages even when inflationary, and even when destructive of the creative capital necessary to give the unemployed new jobs.

Yet, the advisory council has no legislative or executive power today. So, the Congress cannot altogether shirk the blame for its attempt to perpetuate these New-Fair Deal policies since the exponents of those bizarre policies departed from the White House and took refuge in the Democratic advisory council.

Since then, this Congress has been controlled by the opposition for nearly 6 years. The spending actions of the majority clearly illustrate another inherent lack in the opposition party. I speak of the lack of unity, the first quality we called essential for the decade ahead.

The other party is the product of political disunity. And ironically, it does win its congressional elections through the use of political disunity, by dividing the people into special interest groups and promising each group whatever it asks. Because it does not have any unifying principle behind the political philosophy, a candidate in the Far West can run on a platform conflicting with that of a candidate in the Deep South, or on the east coast.

In effect, those candidates, when in Congress, can reconcile their differences by each taking what they want from the Treasury. This is government by special interests. The cumulative results of government by special interests, as we noted earlier, is enlarged centralization, and rising prices. Now it reaches proportions where it becomes that economic tyranny we discussed.

There are indeed discerning Democrats who do have strong economic principles which they would not sacrifice and bend for political advantage. Let not my indictment be taken as a mass indictment of everyone in that party. But let my indictment be taken as an indictment of that party as a nationwide party organization. That organization, because of its disunity, cannot possibly stand on one principle, one philosophy, which it can and will serve. Such is its tragedy as it faces the challenges of the age ahead.

Naturally, these conditions of its existence make it impossible to center its attention on the problem of preserving economic freedom for future Americans. And today those disunities make it impossible for it to serve the average American consumer, such as the housewife buying household goods. Rising prices hurt every family in America.

In the subsequent speech of this series the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CURTIS] will outline ways that Republicans propose to stabilize our economy, so that the consumer and the family will be protected. He will outline ways for economic freedom to be enlarged for all our children.

We Republicans are in a position to carry out this program, because we possess party unity, party philosophy based on principle, party democracy, and party foresight for future generations of Americans.

TABLE A.—Executive debt responsibility

[In millions]

	Increase	Reduction
1901–13 (fiscal years 1901–13) Republican		$81
1913–21 (fiscal years 1914–21) Democratic	−$22,463
1921–33 (fiscal years 1922–33) Republican		1,761
1933–52 (fiscal years 1934–53) Democratic	−239,405
1953–59 (fiscal years 1954–59) Republican	−19,321

TABLE B.—Congressional debt responsibility

[In millions]

Fiscal years	Majority party responsible in Congress (House)	Debt increase	Debt reduction
1901–11	Republican		$78
1912–19	Democratic	$23,260
1920–31	Republican		7,898
1932–47	Democratic	238,272
1948–49	Republican		6,608
1950–53	Democratic	13,078
1954–55	Republican	7,297
1956–59	Democratic	12,024

NOTE.—These tables are compiled by the surplus or deficit of each fiscal year for which the President in table A and the Congress in table B were responsible (although not necessarily in office that year).

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I think the presentation the gentleman has made is one of the most forceful and all inclusive on the question of inflation and deficit spending that I have heard. I think the problem he discussed is the most serious problem facing this country today. Inflation and deficit spending have stirred me to the point where I believe that unless drastic steps are taken by this Congress to reduce spending we are going to be in very serious trouble.

I just wrote to a constituent recently about what happened in France a few weeks ago. You may know that up until a few weeks ago the franc was of little value, but since that time the French people are handling something that they have not seen since their grandfathers' day—a franc which is worth 20 cents, which is what its traditional value should be. But in order to get this they had to turn in 100-franc notes, which means that inflation had reduced the old currency to 1 percent of its former value.

The point is that if inflation in the United States runs as far as it has in France, the dollar will be worth a penny. That means that 100 paper dollars will be needed to buy one hard American dollar.

This inflation in France has run for 40 years. Ours has gone for about 20 years. So today, if we were to get a hard dollar, we would have to turn in two for one. If we go the way of the French, then we are going to be in the same situation that they had to correct, because they have had to fight the wars that we have, of course, but in addition they have spent a great deal of money that they did not have for many social schemes, wherein they were trying to do something for the so-called common man. As a result, they are in this trouble. They have now corrected it by this great sacrifice on the part of all of their people.

I certainly commend the gentleman, and I hope that his words will ring throughout the country.

Mr. RHODES of Arizona. I thank the gentleman for his contribution also. The gentleman is correct when he says there are many lessons we can learn from the French. Another lesson is the effect it has on the country when you have a monopolistic situation between big labor and big business. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. GRIFFIN], who just preceded me, mentioned this.

The idea of such a monopoly, of course, would be that if big labor wanted a wage increase it would go to big business and big business would give the wage increase, increase prices and in the end the consumer would pay the bill. That happened in France for many years. One of the things which the now President of France, I am sure, is trying to correct is that situation where nobody thought of the consumer at all until it became too late. I certainly hope that here in the United States we will learn that lesson before we find ourselves in the situation economically that the French find their great nation now.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Rhodes of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include extraneous matter and tables.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

UKRAINIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and include extraneous matter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, the history of many nations of Europe is a sad blending of tragedy and misery, of woes and vicissitudes, but that of the Ukrainians is almost uniformly one of unmitigated and unrelieved suffering. It is almost beyond comprehension how a nation of so many, today numbering some 42 million, could be held down for so long by unwanted alien rulers in their homeland, yet that is a tragic fact in the modern history of the Ukrainian people. Since the middle of the 17th century, this large body of gifted, industrious and gallant people have not been allowed, except for the brief period of 1918–20, to enjoy the fruits of free and independent life in their historic homeland. Through the turns and twists of fortune they have not been the masters of their fate. They have been held down under the unrelenting hand of alien despots. They have endured hardships, privations, misery. They have been ruthlessly oppressed and persecuted for clinging to their national ideals, for dreaming and cherishing their independence and freedom. Yet no oppressive measure, no amount of severe persecution was to force them to abandon and forgo their yearning for freedom. Oppressions and persecutions united the Ukrainians against their foes, and toward the end of the First World War, when the Czarist Russian regime was overthrown, the Ukrainians proclaimed their independence and established the Ukrainian Republic.

That was done on January 22, 1918. Unfortunately, the Ukrainian Republic, thus born amid joy and jubilation, was surrounded by powerful and greedy enemies, all eager and anxious to pounce upon the new state. Early in 1920 the Ukrainian Republic was attacked by surging Communist forces. Soon the country was overrun by the Red army; then all Ukrainian opposition was ruthlessly crushed and the Ukraine's independence brought to an end. Since then, for nearly 40 years, the country has been submerged in the vast Soviet Empire. During all that time, the Ukrainians have been suffering under Soviet totalitarianism. Of course, all peoples under Soviet tyranny suffer, but some suffer more than others, and some have suffered for a longer period of time than most. But the 42 million Ukrainians who constitute the second largest ethnic element in the Soviet Union have perhaps suffered more, have sacrificed more, both in the number of victims and in wealth, than any other minority group. They have borne the heavy yoke of the Kremlin longer than any other minority group in the Soviet Union. They have died in concentration camps by the millions. In slave-labor camps, in prisons, in the distant Siberian wilderness, they have been driven to starvation and death. The Soviet regime has been hard and harsh on all nationality groups, but particularly so on the individualistic and independent-spirited Ukrainians. Fortunately, Communist totalitarian dictatorship has not been able to break the spirit of freedom among them. These people have struggled against their oppressors, fought them with all the means at their disposal, even though for taking such a stand they have paid a terrible toll in human lives.

Today the once-prosperous and productive fair Ukraine is a land of the unhappy and the unfortunate, where all its inhabitants are held down and ruthlessly oppressed by the agents of the Kremlin. The whole country is practically sealed off from the free world. There is no trace of freedom. The country is one large prison for its inhabitants, and they all are driven to work under all sorts of hardships and privation for their Soviet overlords. Their most cherished possession is their spirit of freedom. Inhuman Kremlin agents have resorted to every trick, have used every means of torture to deprive the Ukrainians of this priceless possession, but, fortunately, they have not succeeded in their task. Today, even under the most relentless of totalitarian tyrannies, the stout-hearted Ukrainian clings steadfastly to his national ideals and still preserves his fervent love for freedom.

On the 42d anniversary of their Independence Day I am glad to join these liberty-loving Ukrainians in the celebration of their National Independence Day.

THE CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK RESOLUTION

Mr. Speaker, this Congress has every right to take full pride in the passage of the Captive Nations Week resolution last year. As we approach another summit, all Americans should reread this resolution, which is now Public Law 86–90. We should also examine the reasons why Khrushchev was unusually perturbed by this resolution.

Among the captive nations listed in the resolution is Ukraine. On this observance of the 42d anniversary of the Independence of Ukraine it is most fitting to include in my remarks a study made of the resolution and its effects by its originator, Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, a professor of economics at Georgetown University, Washington, D.C. To my knowledge his article, entitled "The Captive Nations Week Resolution," is the only documented study of this congressional achievement so far. The article appeared in the September 1959 issue of the authoritative East European journal, The Ukrainian Quarterly.

Professor Dobriansky, who is also the national chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, analyzes in this study both the resolution and the Presidential proclamation, and traces the immediate consequences of these documents up to Khrushchev's article in foreign affairs. I believe that after carefully reading this study each Member of Congress will be firmly convinced of the necessity to concentrate our efforts on the majority of captive nations in the Soviet Union itself.

The indicated article by Dr. Dobriansky from the Ukrainian Quarterly follows:

THE CAPTIVE NATIONS WEEK RESOLUTION

(By Lev E. Dobriansky)

The Captive Nations Week resolution, passed by the U.S. Congress last July, is now a vibrant part of living history. Its impact on international events was unmistakably shown by the reaction it produced in Moscow. Many were taken by surprise with this reaction, others viewed it as the expected. The resolution and the Presidential proclamation which is based upon it were immediately subjected to all sorts of analyses.

Some held they were bad; a number favored them but contended that the timing was poor; and many hailed the event in every respect. Most commentators, analysts, and newsmen in this country never really grasped the full meaning and significance of these documents. Worse still, a number of them in their typical haste garbled up the facts leading to the passage of the resolution.

In the judgment of this writer the world has not heard the last of these documents. Their deep importance is yet to be revealed in thought and action. Their influence will still be felt in many quarters of the world. Vested in them are possibilities and prospects which time itself will unravel and cause to be realized. Particularly here in the United States the potential developments suggested by the contents of these documents are so immense and promising that at this time a methodical exposition of all aspects surrounding this subject is clearly necessary. Because of its historical bearing, the subject deserves close documentation and study. An examination of the documents themselves, a description of the background to their realization, a systematic review of the chief events produced by them, and a brief analysis of the subject with an eye to its futural significance would be in order in any such study.

PUBLIC LAW 86–90 AND THE RESOLUTION

To appreciate the total meaning of the resolution, it is obviously a sine qua non for one to read every clause in it. Unfortunately, too many who were quick to comment on it, failed to meet this requisite. Their comments plainly showed this. The resolution is now Public Law 86–90, a law of the land. It reads as follows:

"Whereas the greatness of the United States is in large part attributable to its having been able, through the democratic process, to achieve a harmonious national unity of its people, even though they stem from the most diverse of racial, religious and ethnic backgrounds; and

"Whereas this harmonious unification of the diverse elements of our free society has led the people of the United States to possess a warm understanding and sympathy for the aspirations of peoples everywhere and to recognize the natural interdependency of the peoples and nations of the world; and

"Whereas the enslavement of a substantial part of the world's population by Communist imperialism makes a mockery of the idea of peaceful coexistence between nations and constitutes a detriment to the natural bonds of understanding between the people of the United States and other peoples; and

"Whereas since 1918 the imperialistic and aggressive policies of Russian communism have resulted in the creation of a vast empire which poses a dire threat to security of the United States and of all the free peoples of the world; and

"Whereas the imperialistic policies of Communist Russia have led through direct and indirect aggression, to the subjugation of the national independence of Poland, Hungary, Lithuania,, Ukraine, Czechoslovakia, Latvia, Estonia, White Ruthenia, Rumania, East Germany, Bulgaria, mainland China, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, North Korea, Albania, Idel-Ural, Tibet, Cossackia, Turkestan, North Vietnam, and others; and

"Whereas these submerged nations look to the United States, as the citadel of human freedom, for leadership in bringing about their liberation and independence and in restoring to them the enjoyment of their Christian, Jewish, Moslem, Buddhist, or other religious freedoms, and of their individual liberties; and

"Whereas it is vital to the national security of the United States that the desire for liberty and independence on the part of the peoples of these conquered nations should be steadfastly kept alive; and

"Whereas the desire for liberty and independence by the overwhelming majority of the people of these submerged nations constitutes a powerful deterrent to war and one of the best hopes for a just and lasting peace; and

"Whereas it is fitting that we clearly manifest to such people through an appropriate and official means the historic fact that the people of the United States share with them their aspirations for the recovery of their freedom and independence: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the third week in July 1959 as 'Captive Nations Week' and inviting the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities. The President is further authorized and requested to issue a similar proclamation each year until such time as freedom and independence shall have been achieved for all the captive nations of the world."

Since it was this writer who substantively provided and wrote these clauses, in addition to the basic ideas of the resolution itself, he regards the following as the essential ideas of the measure: (1) the unity-in-diversity nature of our own Nation, (2) the farce of peaceful coexistence of nations with an existing Iron Curtain, (3) the belated recognition of the majority of the captive nations in the Soviet Union, (4) the awareness of Rusisan Communist imperialism and colonialism since 1918, and (5) the basic, determining position of the captive nations in our worldwide strategy against Moscow's cold war threat. These are the essential political views in the resolution which are in complete accord with history and provide fundamental guidelines for American foreign policy. In order to interpret accurately the reasons for Mr. Khrushchev's outbursts against the resolution, one must first comprehend perceptively the meaning of these ideas. Nikita the Sanguine, more than anyone else, fully and instinctively understood the pointedness of truth in the resolution and responded accordingly. It not only disturbed his present plans of political-psychological ruse for the American people but also frightened him with its possibilities in the cold war which he has absolutely no intention of ending. For him to end the cold war is like taking a motor out of a car and expecting it to operate.

These fundamental ideas must be borne in mind if any sound analysis is to be made of the resolution. Before one embarks on this analysis, he should draw certain evident comparative observations between the congressional resolution and the ensuing Presidential proclamation. The proclamation that was issued by President Eisenhower contains the following:

"Whereas many nations throughout the world have been made captive by the imperialistic and aggressive policies of Soviet communism; and

"Whereas the peoples of the Soviet-dominated nations have been deprived of their national independence and their individual liberties; and

"Whereas the citizens of the United States are linked by bonds of family and principle to those who love freedom and justice on every continent; and

"Whereas it is appropriate and proper to manifest to the peoples of the captive nations the support of the Government and the people of the United States of America for their just aspirations for freedom and national independence; and

"Whereas by a joint resolution approved July 17, 1959, the Congress has authorized and requested the President of the United States of America to issue a proclamation designating the third week in July 1959 as "Captive Nations Week" and to issue a similar proclamation each year until such time as freedom and independence shall have been achieved for all the captive nations of the world:

"Now, therefore, I, Dwight D. Eisenhower, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate the week beginning July 19, 1959, as Captive Nations Week.

"I invite the people of the United States of America to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities and urge them to study the plight of the Soviet-dominated nations and to recommit themselves to the support of the just aspirations of the peoples of those captive nations.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington this 17th day of July in the year of our Lord 1959 and of the Independence of the United States of America the 184th."

Now, a comparison between this document and the preceding one shows instantly the marks of historical devaluation, a supposedly softening tone, and some befogging of the issues and identities. The proclamation was drafted and prepared in the Department of State. By professional bent the Department's members are addicted to diplomatic circumlocution and fringe expressions of the truth that obfuscate calling things by their right names. However, the proclamation had to be alined with the resolution and the latitute for verbal sophistry and obfuscation was in this case somewhat more restricted than is ordinarily the case. Nevertheless, many who read the proclamation without bothering to scan the underlying resolution wound up with the same platitudes and misconceptions about the captive nations. In short, they missed the crucial point of the whole event, including the reasons for Khrushchev's explosion.

It should be evident to the careful reader that certain sloppy and imprecise terms were introduced into the situation by the proclamation. Soviet communism is a meaningless abstraction without any objective foundation. The motivation for its use is the misleading desire not to implicate the Russian people for what Moscow does. Stubborn facts show that the imperialistic and colonial enterprise is peculiarly Russian, but, according to some, we are not to be guided by facts. Woodrow Wilson had no theoretical difficulties in differentiating between German imperialism and the German people and thus designating the first as our clear-cut enemy. Nor had Franklin D. Roosevelt with regard to Italian fascism, German nazism, and Japanese imperialism. Today, we are asked to pursue phantoms rather than be guided by historical experience and properly identify the enemy. The resolution clearly identifies the enemy; the proclamation fails to do this.

Another equally and purposely confusing term is "Soviet-dominated." The undiscriminating reader cannot but leave with the impression that this means dominated by the Soviet Union. If, in the light of the resolution, this point were raised, the Department would defend itself by pointing out the general scope of the proclamation which speaks of captive nations "throughout the world" and alludes to nations "on every continent." Briefly, guarding itself in this manner, it would hold that a meticulous reading of the proclamation would indicate a complete conformity with the resolution since all the captive nations are implied by these inconspicuous phrases. On this score, its defense is invulnerable. The drafters of the proclamation could, moreover, argue that "Soviet-dominated" means dominated by Soviet Russia which, historically, is the case since 1918. In this, too, it squares off with the resolution. Quite plainly, the letter of the law is met with, but the intention to crystallize the truth differs between the resolution and the proclamation. In the cold war, some fail to realize that tremendous capital gain can be obtained by properly exploiting the truth. Paradoxically, it is usually the same individuals who will protest violently against using the methods employed by the deceiving Russians. A proper exploitation of the truth means to face it squarely, precisely, and unqualifiedly. This, more than anything else, can destroy the deceptive designs of Moscow. The resolution does this, and the result proved it.

In spite of all this, the President deserves our highest praise and compliments in issuing, forthrightly and courageously, this historic proclamation. His defense of the action taken grew bolder as the days went by. There aren't superlatives enough to praise adequately the act of leadership shown by the Congress on an extraordinary bipartisan basis. In years to come, more so than now, the wisdom and vision of this act will be fully comprehended.

THE BACKGROUND TO THE RESOLUTION

The background to the resolution is an interesting one. The idea was conceived a year ago when this writer was on the faculty of the National War College. Then, as now, he was increasingly concerned over the growing indifference in many American circles toward not only the status but also the strategic value of the captive nations. Then, as now, the chief thrust of Russian propaganda was in the direction of obtaining American accession to the vast empire built by the Russian Communists since 1918. When Mr. Khrushchev speaks of "peaceful coexistence," he means nothing more than American acquiescence to the permanent security of his empire. His two-fold purpose in obtaining this guarantee of the territorial integrity of his empire is to gain time for its consolidation, which would come easy with the broken wills of the captive nations, and to secure further his base for cold war operations in the open field of the free world. This situation existed last year as, indeed, it exists today.

In planning any such resolution a ripe condition is necessary. The occasion presented itself with the Russian Communist murder of Imre Nagy. The writer prepared a concurrent resolution on Captive Nations' Days in which he interested Congressman CRETELLA, of Connecticut. Mr. CRETELLA submitted it with a prefaced address on July 2, 1958.[1] Those who now call for a Captive Nations' Year might be reminded that this original resolution was designed to observe the independence and other historic days of the captive nations throughout the year. The aim was to keep the subject of national captivity steadfastly before the American public. When the resolution was considered by the House Judiciary Committee, its chairman broke a tie vote and cast his vote against it. One of the chief reasons given in opposition to the resolution was that it involved too many days of observance. From a psychological point of view, this was a valid objection. Obviously, the alternative was to compress the observance within the span of a week.

This year two occasions arose for a propitious reintroduction of the idea, namely the Geneva Conference and the forthcoming visit of Vice President NIXON to Moscow. Both occasions were sufficiently close to our own Independence Day which carries its own symbolic weight. Making allowances for developments over the past year, the resolution was revised in both form and content but the essential political ideas were preserved. A comparison of the two resolutions will readily show this. The target period was, therefore, the week following the Fourth.

For several reasons the writer sought the cooperation of Senator DOUGLAS but insisted from the start that the measure must be bipartisan. He recommended Senator JAVITS of New York to cosponsor it in the Senate and indicated that a similar bipartisan basis would be formed in the House. The cooperation extended was exemplary and most encouraging. It underwent some changes in style and wording, but the substance throughout remained intact. This writer has even to redress a few of these stylistic changes in order to preserve the meaning of the resolution.

On June 22 Senator DOUGLAS introduced the resolution which became known as Senate Joint Resolution 111.[2] Senator JAVITS, of New York, joined with him. It was originally planned to have the resolution on the table in the Senate for 2 days. However, in order to permit extensive cosponsorship the period was lengthened to a week. In this time the writer employed facilities to inform the majority of Senators of the resolution and this opportunity for their cosponsoring it. In addition, the committee of which he is chairman swung into action to alert all interested organizations and groups of what was transpiring. In the meantime, on June 23, Congressman BENTLEY, of Michigan, introduced a parallel measure in the House, numbered House Joint Resolution 435. By the end of this week in June, the Senate measure was being cosponsored by Senators Moss, Bush, Lausche, Scott, Hartke, Green, Dodd, Humphrey, Hart, Neuberger, Keating, Young of North Dakota, Engle, Curtis, Langer, Morse, and Case of New Jersey.

Once this action was completed, increasing attention was given to it by individuals and groups who communicated with the legislators and expressed their support of the measure. Because of the shortness of time, after the resolution was referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee, it was decided to amend the observance period to the third week in July. The decision was made to allow time for the preparation of ceremonies in the event that the measure passed the Congress and the President issued a proclamation. Concerning the time coincidence with the NIXON visit, Senator DOUGLAS was perfectly correct in stating that this was unpremeditated. However, as far as this writer was concerned, it really made no difference whether the week would be proclaimed immediately after the Fourth or in the third week. Due to the new elements contained in the resolution, Khrushchev would have exploded before NIXON'S visit as well as during it.

The resolution was unanimously passed by voice vote in the Senate on July 6. In large measure, Senator EASTLAND, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was responsible for this expedition. He cannot be thanked too graciously for his foresight and solid support. On this, the vicious and nonsensical comments on the Senator's role by Walter Lippman, who curiously on one day wrote favorably about the resolution and later strongly opposed it, need not be taken seriously. With the momentum increasing in tempo, the sturdy House majority leader, Congressman MCCORMACK, then entered into the picture to facilitate the passage of the measure in the House. Meanwhile, Congressman FEIGHAN, on July 8, introduced House Joint Resolution 459 to parallel the amended measure of the Senate.[3] The Congressman from Ohio told the House that in our so-called negotiations with Moscow on Berlin and other issues, it is "nothing short of amazing that the subjugation of the captive millions throughout the Communist empire has not even been mentioned."

The role played by Congressman MCCORMACK was crucial to the passage of the resolution in the House. His efforts, too, cannot be praised enough. When he presented it on July 9, he declared that "this is a very important resolution that will have tremendous effect on the minds of men and women everywhere throughout the world who are subjected to Communist dictation and who desire to be free under their own law."[4] Congressman BENTLEY, a sponsor of the resolution, joined with the House majority leader to see its passage through. Congressmen JUDD, WALTER, and others spoke eloquently in favor of its passage. The measure was unanimously passed by voice vote on July 9. Despite the limited comments of some observers, it is difficult to see how any right-thinking American could possibly object to the contents of this resolution. The speed with which it passed Congress in itself attested to the solid contents of the resolution.

As indicated above, on July 17, the President issued his proclamation. Events moved swiftly the following week. Church ceremonies were held in many cities and on July 23, Mr. George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO stated: "The observance of 'Captive Nations' Week' by the American people has provoked Mr. Khrushchev to more bluster and to still louder threats. This outburst by the Soviet dictator is only a demonstration of the inherent weakness of his sprawling slave empire." At one of the President's news conferences the question was raised as to whether Mr. NIXON had a strike against him before his departure for Moscow. The President answered in part: "Well, no. I wouldn't think of it in that way . . . I don't think there is any specific relationship between the two things."[5] The fact is that there was a very definite relationship. However, it is significant that the following Sunday, the President joined in prayer for the oppressed nations at a Presbyterian Church in Gettysburg, Pa. The minister, Rev. Robert A. MacAskill keyed his sermon to the proclamation and rightly declared: "Communism is doomed. It is doomed because it denies the divine origin of humanity and the authority of God. The verdict is already pronounced."[6]

This writer sent a telegram to the President which in part was referred to by David Lawrence whose column lauded day after day both the resolution and the proclamation.[7] The first paragraph of the message read: "As the originator of the Captive Nations' Week idea and resolution, I cannot adequately express in words our profound gratitude for your well-worded proclamation and also for your personal participation in a prayerful observance of the Week in Gettysburg, Pa." It should be emphasized that Mr. Lawrence was one of the few commentators who grasped the full import of the resolution. His articles make for worthwhile reading on this vital subject. Later, there were others, too, who developed its significance. The following month, for example, George E. Sokolsky wrote an article on "The Captive Nations" in which he said: "Nevertheless, it has been characteristic of Russion history that what the Russians take, they never give up willingly. Russia has been like a rolling snowball, gathering size as it rolled on and on." He rightly observed further "that all Russians smile when they

[1] H. Con. Res. 347, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 104, part 10, page 12989.

[2] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 11, pages 11398–11399.

[3] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 10, pages 13006–13007.

[4] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 105, part 10, pages 13116–13117.

[5] Transcript of news conference, UPI, July 22, 1959, No. 1.

[6] The Washington Post, Monday, July 27, 1959, p. 1.

[7] David Lawrence, "U.S. People and Khrushchev," Washington Star, Aug. 6, 1959.

see Americans. It looks more like a belly laugh watching the fools part with their money." [8]

THE MUSCOVITE REACTION

Were the resolution and the proclamation embarrassing to the Vice President? Was this operational move illtimed? Was it an unfair provocation directed at colonial and imperialistic Moscow? These were questions raised when the violent reaction set in from Moscow. To each of these questions, the writer answers in the negative. But before substantiating our answers, it is necessary to review the type of reaction produced by the two historic documents.

The resolution and the proclamation struck as a lightning bolt in Moscow. Khrushchev precipitously decried the resolution and viewed as vague NIXON's aim in coming to Moscow. In Warsaw at the time he rather foolishly railed, "The only enslaved peoples are in the capitalistic countries." [9] The blunt speciousness of this statement is sufficient to indicate the complete bankruptcy of his position. A report from Warsaw that the "proclamation of this week as Captive Nations Week in the United States had hit a raw nerve here" couldn't have been more aptly stated.[10] Radio Moscow screeched and Pravda chimed in with a half-page blast against the United States. Great perturbance was displayed over the "coincidence in the timing" of the proclamation and NIXON's visit. Moscow viewed the resolution as a "new provocative anti-Soviet campaign." One begins to wonder who is hysterical when he reads these cries of pain and Khrushchev's further spasm that this "hysterical campaign" of "petty provocation" proves that "panic-stricken monopolists * * * are losing the faculty of controlling their own actions." [11]

To this writer, such evidences of Russian political behavior are typical and normal. They confirm a historically based interpretation that once the grizzly bear is cornered, he'll howl and bellow but his fear is paralyzing. Peoples and nations who have bordered Russia for centuries, like the Poles, Lithuanians, Ukrainians, Georgians and others, know this truth best. Khrushchev's tirade at the Soviet-Polish Friendship Rally in Moscow that Captive Nations Week was a "direct interference in the Soviet Union's internal affairs" is an old Russian technique to deflect any world interest in the imperial and colonial spoils of Moscow.[12] Actually, the affairs of the Soviet Union per se are no more internal than those of a jailer incarcerating independent, innocent citizens. Khrushchev knows this all too well, and he fears it morbidly. In fact, as the UPI dispatch well observed, "At the end of his 40-minute speech, as if unable to get the subject off his mind, Khrushchev returned to the 'enslaved peoples' theme." Truly, the marks of a worried tyrant. Such mouthings as "It would be a good idea if NIXON, who has just landed, would come and have a look at the 'enslaved people' gathered at this stadium," are even politically childish. Indeed, his captive audience may well have been doubly captive.

The profound effectiveness of the resolution and the proclamation is further seen by the Russian puppet opposition to it. The puppet Czech regime, for example, lodged its protest against Captive Nations Week, dubbing it "a new American provocation and a hostile act." [13] Other puppets reacted similarly. Needless to say, puppets could hardly react differently.

Further enlightening evidence of the deep penetration made by the resolution and proclamation was furnished in the NIXON-Khrushchev exchanges. The Bear just kept whining with pain, showing to the world his weakest organs. Before the television cameras, Khrushchev again cried, "I cannot go on without saying it—if you would not take such a decision (Mr. Eisenhower's proclamation of Captive Peoples Week) * * * your trip would be excellent." Then the professed atheist blurted, "why this was necessary God only knows. What happened?" [14] The answer to his question is quite obvious. The American people are not as naive as he presumes them to be. The theatrics of controlled cultural exchanges, international cocktail parties, futile talkathons and other superficialities do not blind the American people to the real issues. Without this Captive Nations Week event and its impact, Moscow would have kept on deceiving itself on this score.

The additional exchange at Khrushchev's villa even makes for comical reading. The New Class host suggested that NIXON "take a boat ride on the Moskva River so you can see how our slaves live." [15] To which NIXON (chuckling) said: "Yes, the captives." Later, when they were in the boat, "crowds gathered around and Mr. Khrushchev each time pointed to them and said 'captive people.' They replied, 'No, no, peace and friendship.' * * * Mr. Khrushchev poked Mr. NIXON in the ribs in good humor and said: 'Here are your captives. You can see how happy they are.'" These and other occurrences clearly add up to a troubled mind. The Vice President doubtlessly was aware of the old Potemkin Village trick which Khrushchev played on him with these selected crowds.

So deeply had the resolution-proclamation pierced Moscow's most sensitive chord that lesser lights joined in the Bear's whining chorus. When NIXON met the Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Matskevitch, this old MVD functionary immediately launched into the Captive Nations Week subject. "The Soviet people," he exclaimed, "were surprised and alarmed that the Senate passed the captive people's resolution." [16] Of course, there is no real entity such as "the Soviet people" to be alarmed about anything. The alarm was sounded in the Kremlin alone. It is interesting to note, also, that reference to the resolution is in terms of "captive peoples," although the resolution precisely speaks of nations, emphatically including those in the Soviet Union. In the area of foreign consumption, this important distinction is one that Moscow consistently seeks to avoid. About this time, too, Pravda again assailed the United States for the resolution, calling it "a coarse, dirty venture of American imperialists." Also significant is the fact that when NIXON prepared for his Siberian tour, Khrushchev made a flying trip to always restless Ukraine to deliver a self-assuring address.

U.S. REACTION TO THE REACTION

The reaction on the part of some of our officials to this Muscovite reaction appeared to be one of puzzlement. As one report had it, "U.S. officials are somewhat puzzled and slightly annoyed, but also amused, by Soviet irritation over President Eisenhower's proclamation of Captive Nations Week." [17] To this writer, it is not surprising that they were puzzled because very little study and imagination have been exercised by our Government with regard to the captive non-Russian nations in the Soviet Union. This, above all, was the new and most vital element in the resolution which stunned Moscow.

At another news conference, the President gave his reaction in response to a question on timing. This reaction is most important for us to note. The President said: "I said frequently that the United States would never believe and never accept the idea that a true peace had been established in the world until every single nation had the right to express its own views about its own destiny, and said the United States would always use whatever peaceful methods were available to it to bring about this opportunity." [18] These are extremely powerful words that deserve every measure of careful implementation in deed, especially, as concerns the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. This can be done with the most minimum of risks of a hot global war.

In the Senate, the most eloquent reaction to the reaction was expressed by Senator KEATING, of New York. "Mr. President," he stated, "the finest testimonial possible to the importance and effectiveness of Captive Nations Week is to be found in the yelps of anguish emanating from Premier Khrushchev and other Red leaders. We have hit the Communists where it hurts them and their blithering rejoinders about interference in their internal affairs merely points up what a tender spot the plight of the enslaved peoples is in their wall of iron." [19] Much of the same was expressed by private American citizens. For example, Francis B. Stevens, formerly with the State Department, wrote in the following vein: "For Mr. NIXON, the trip has been even more revealing. He has seen two very sensitive Soviet nerves exposed, as evidenced by Khrushchev's massive abuse of the American interest in the fate of the captive peoples, within and outside the Soviet Union, and the livid rage of the Soviet press at the U.S. standard of living displayed at the American Exhibition." [20] The Vice President seemed to sense this when, in reply to Matskevitch's troubled observation, he uttered: "We will have differences from time to time. We disagree with your comments on this resolution."

There were a few newspapers, commentators, and others who criticized the resolution-proclamation. Curiously enough, some used the very same spurious points which punctuated the Muscovite reaction. An editorial in the Washington Post, titled "Irritating the Bear," advanced arguments on poor timing, peaceful coexistence, the exclusive alternative of war, and embarrassment to the Vice President.[21] A number of these arguments grace Moscow's propaganda portfolio. Popular reaction in Washington to this writer's reply to the editorial was extremely encouraging and comforting.[22] Another of these few examples was the article by Henry N. Taylor in the Scripps-Howard newspapers. He, like Khrushchev in a recent article, questioned the inclusion of Ukraine, Georgia, and other non-Russian nations in the resolution.[23] Failing to understand the basic importance of this inclusion, not to speak of the purpose of the resolution, the author reveals his own pitiful

[8] These Days . . . "The Captive Nations," Aug. 19, 1959.

[9] The New York Times, July 22, p. 1.

[10] The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., July 23, 1959.

[11] The Washington Post, July 24, p. A8.

[12] UPI, press dispatch, Moscow, July 23, 1959.

[13] AP, Prague, July 24, 1959.

[14] Reuters, Moscow, July 24, 1959.

[15] AP, Ernest Barcella's notes, Moscow, July 26, 1959.

[16] The Evening Star, Washington, D.C., July 25, p. A-3.

[17] AP, July 23, 1959.

[18] UPI, Transcript of news conference, July 29, No. 20.

[19] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 11, pp. 14060-14061.

[20] U.S. News & World Report, Aug. 10, 1959, p. 39.

[21] The Washington Post, editorial, "Irritating the Bear," July 24, 1959.

[22] The Washington Post, editorial page, July 29, 1959.

[23] Henry N. Taylor, "We Preach: Do Nothing—United States Gives Lipservice," July 27, 1959.

lack of knowledge concerning East European history when he makes the supposedly determining point that these areas were taken over by the Czars, "some as far back as 75 years before Nikolai Lenin." Compared with the popular American reaction to this whole development, these few critical sources stand out like sore thumbs.

THE PURPOSE AND MEANING OF THE RESOLUTION

The above documented review of events demonstrates sufficiently the undeniable impact and effectiveness of the resolution. The timing of the resolution couldn't have been better, though by happenstance the week coincided with NIXON'S visit. Had the observance been 2 weeks before, the Muscovite reaction would have been the same. Pavlov's dog wasn't trained in Russia without purpose. Moreover, the resolution was in no way embarrassing to NIXON. On the contrary, it provided him with a God-sent opportunity which, for reasons of his own, he took only partial advantage of. Spurred by what he witnessed, he did decide to visit the only captive nation of his tour, namely Poland. While in the U.S.S.R., his tour never went beyond the territorial bounds of Russia. It is an open secret that NIXON was not allowed by Moscow to travel in the captive non-Russian countries within the Soviet Union. Had he traveled in Lithuania, Ukraine, Georgia, and elsewhere, one wonders whether the reception wouldn't have surpassed his Polish experience. Moscow didn't take any chances. Should the President finally decide to visit the U.S.S.R. this fall, it will be interesting to see if the same restriction will apply. Then, too, the President himself saw no embarrassment to NIXON. Really, in short, the parties that were embarrassed and showed it angrily were the Muscovite captors.

On the subject of embarrassments, that caused the Rumanian legation here, which was concerned with the Rumanian exposition in New York, or to the Polish Embassy and its fake celebration of the 15th anniversary of the "Manifesto of Independence," our concern couldn't be less. When Czech Russian puppets in the diplomatic colony denounce the resolution-proclamation as "a gratuitous insult," it is abundant enough to know from whom it comes.[24]

Reflecting accurately and impeccably the history of Russian Communist imperialism these past 41 years, the resolution lists those nations as captive which have, directly or indirectly, fallen under the foreign domination of Moscow. Obviously, the basic criterion is the destruction of national independence. In this fundamental sense the Russian nation cannot be construed as captive. There is no doubt that in the sense of a search for surcease from domestic totalitarian tyranny there are many Russian captives. But with equal doubtlessness, they weren't the ones in Khrushchev's packed stadium or on the Moskva River. It goes without saying that we should always hold out to these individual captives the hope for democratic rights and liberties. But the best and most efficacious way to further this hope is by striving to cut the institutional nexus between Russian colonial imperialism and domestic Russian totalitarianism. The one feeds on the other. This nexus has existed for centuries and is the key to Russian imperial power, whether under the Whites or the Reds. About the domestic end of this nexus, one of our commentators couldn't have stated it more effectively when she wrote recently: "One of our problems in dealing with the Soviet Union is that we forget the Russion people's long conditioning to autocratic government and their legacy of ignorance. In 1901, Henry Adams, on his first trip to Russia, wrote of his amazement at the primitiveness and passiveness of the Russian masses. He called them a 10th century people. By now they have leaped across centuries in technical progress, but they have lacked bridges to individual freedom or representative government." Lest we forget, a genuine and nonsentimentalistic friendship with any people presupposes first a true, realistic awareness of their state of being.

With these necessary points in mind, let us see wherein the historical significance of both the resolution and the proclamation lies. For the first time, our Government has taken official cognizance of the tremendously important fact that the Soviet Union itself is an empire. By these documents we have shown for the first time that we are fully aware of the captive status of all the non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. Indeed, for the first time we have faced the fact that the majority of captive nations are in the Soviet Union and Asia. Historically, the nations in Central Europe, such as Poland, Hungary and others, would never have become captive to Russia if other non-Russian nations, like Ukraine, Georgia, Turkestan, and others, had not fallen under the imperialist and colonial domination of Soviet Russia. This is a stubborn truth we cannot escape. It is an elemental historical truth that these documents confirm. It is this confirmation that rocked Khrushchev.

Unfamiliar with East European and Central Asian history, many of our commentators interpreted the resolution-proclamation to mean only an observance for the captive nations in Central Europe. Had they bothered to read the documents, they would have understood that our freedom appeal was and is being made to all captive nations. The appeal of freedom does not arbitrarily stop at the borders of the Soviet Union. Those who think so are pursuing an illusion. What American with a sense of justice would deny the opportunity for national freedom and independence to the peoples of Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, White Ruthenia, Ukraine, Georgia, Armenia, Turkestan, and others? When Khrushchev wails about interference in "internal Soviet affairs," his cries are as specious as when he bellows about our interference in the so-called peoples democracies in Central Europe. For him, when any country comes under Moscow's imperialist and colonial domination, it then becomes an "internal affair." The truth is that affairs concerning national freedom aspirations both within the Soviet Union or any other part of Moscow's far-flung empire are essentially international affairs.

It was not particularly enlightening for some of our Governors who recently visited the Soviet Union to speak of it as a nation. Even those in the Kremlin hesitate to speak in this vein internally. When basic, elementary truths escape us, how much value can be assigned to the conclusions and recommendations made by these touring Governors? It is patently evident that the legalistic facade of the Soviet Union befogged their understanding of the foremost issues within this substrate empire.

Khrushchev recognized the psychological blow that the resolution and proclamation represented. For too long he has boasted of the allegedly rapid strides made by Moscow in economic development, in military prowess, in scientific achievements, in cultural betterment, and the like. He has compared these with those of our Nation. But one need only ask whether these inflated accomplishments would have been possible without the captive resources of Ukraine, Turkestan, Georgia, and other rich non-Russian nations subjugated within the Soviet Union. If the United States were an empire extending itself northward and southward, it would parasitically avail itself of resources that would make our achievements unsurpassable. Fortunately, we are not that kind of a nation. The plain fact is that without the rich resources of the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R., Russia itself would be a second- or third-rate power.

The well-founded perspective laid down in the resolution and the proclamation truthfully devaluates the boasts and bluff of Khrushchev's comparisons with the real achievements of our Nation. This is what troubles Khrushchev most. On the basis of this historical perspective, the economic, scientific, and other comparisons made between the substrate empire and our Nation are out of real context. Psychologically and politically, it is hardly comforting for Khrushchev and his propaganda apparatus to have the world know that Russia's strength, such as it is, is parasitically built on captive resources both within and outside the Soviet Union. Yet this is the moving truth which we have scarcely tapped. The resolution and the proclamation it called into being have in themselves begun to tap it.

The editorial in the New York Times was only partly correct when it stated that the real purpose of this Captive Nations Week observation, therefore, is to keep the plight of the peoples freshly in our mind.[25] Emphasizing actually the less important aspects of the issue, it continued, "It may help them to know that we have not forgotten them. It ought to help us, in the moral sense, if we continue to remember." All this is true but the greater purpose was to accentuate again the strategic political and military value of all the captive nations, both within and outside the Soviet Union and, necessarily taken as an aggregate. In the cold war, as well as in any hot war, they possess the highest priority on our scale of national interest because their enemy, the imperialism and colonialism of Moscow, is our enemy. Without them, Russia would be small, harmless, and clumsy. Made consistently insecure about its captive millions, Moscow would not push as vigorously its borderland policy in Iraq, Iran, and elsewhere; and such organizations as the Central Treaty Organization, which has replaced the old Baghdad Pact, would not be under the same pressures.[26] Troubleshooters, like Vladimir Y. Semichastny, the defamer of Pasternak, would be sent to areas like Azerbaijan to try to deal with the Moslemic country's bourgeois ideology.[27] Is it Moscow's policy anyway to place Russians in the second secretaryship of the party in the captive non-Russian republics. For our national interest and the goal of world freedom, these and countless other results would manifest Moscow's basic insecurity which we could insure by preventing it from ever thinking that we would accede in any circumstances to the permanent captivity of the over 20 enslaved nations.

Senator JAVITS, of New York, furnished certain appropriate and striking comments on the resolution. He said in the Senate, "Laid bare, communism is seen to be imperialism by force—but with better propaganda technicians."[28] Cutting through all the nonessentials, the Senator struck at the root of the issue by declaring, "We in the West have no fear of such a free expression. Khrushchev can answer this challenge only by allowing free elections under U.N. auspices for self-determination in the captive nations." Senator SCOTT, of Pennsylvania, also put his finger on the basic issue when he observed, "If Mr. Khrushchev says we meddled, then [24] Fred Theroux, "That 'Captive Nations Week' Has Many Diplomats Puzzled," the Sunday Star, Washington, D.C., July 26, 1959, p. C-3.

[25] The New York Times, editorial on "Captive Nations Week," July 20, 1959.

[26] A.P., Ankara, Turkey, Aug. 20, 1959.

[27] The New York Times, Aug. 15, 1959.

[28] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 105, pt. 11, pp. 14063-14064.

my answer to him is that, in my judgment, it is as proper to ask questions of a jailor as to who is in the jail and why they are there." [29]

KHRUSHCHEV'S MANIFESTO IN FOREIGN AFFAIRS JOURNAL

The so-called article by Khrushchev in the advance October issue of Foreign Affairs is more of a Muscovite cold war manifesto than anything else. It abounds with worn-out, trite propaganda generalities which no more deal with the real issues of the struggle than does a Russian lunik. The supposed competition between capitalism and socialism, for example, is no more real than that between capitalism and mercantilism in our day. With unsurprising naivete the editors of this journal afforded the Moscow tyrant an advance medium for his propaganda in preparation for his visit to this country.

Mention is made here of this "article" because it has special pertinence to our subject. Khrushchev offers further excellent confirmation of our thesis on his troubled mind by hammering away again at the captive nations resolution. It is evident that he was preparing to meet questions in this country that will deal with the non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. His method will be use of the non sequiturs in the "article" and the exhibition of non-Russians whom he was assembling for his entourage. The latter technique will be like the one used by the ten U.S.S.R. writers who visited Washington in August. It was reported then that Alexander B. Chakovsky, editor in chief of the Foreign Literature magazine, complained about the captive nations resolution and "pointedly indicated two or three fellow writers visiting from the Georgian and Lithuanian Soviet Republics as contented representatives of the 'captive nations.'" [30] Khrushchev will try this same old patent-medicine man trick when he will undoubtedly point to the Don Cossack writer, Mikhail A. Sholokhov, as a "contented" Cossack. It wasn't without political purpose that he visited the writer in Cossackia—one of the nations mentioned in the resolution—and invited him on his tour of America. Judging by the names on the official party list, there will be other puppets put on similar display to discredit the captive designation of these non-Russian nations. The deceptive exhibit would "prove" as much as President Eisenhower would if he were to display a Foster or Browder abroad as the personification of communism in America.

In the euphemistic article Khrushchev says, "The authors of the resolution call for the 'liberation' of the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and even a certain 'Ural area.'" He continues: "This ill-starred resolution was regarded by the Soviet people as an act of provocation" with which, democratically, he concurs. Then the payoff paragraph: "It would be interesting to see, incidentally, how the authors of this resolution would have reacted if the Parliament of Mexico, for instance, had passed a resolution demanding that Texas, Arizona, and California be 'liberated from American slavery.' Apparently they have never pondered such a question, which is very regrettable. Sometimes comparisons help to understand the essence of a matter." [31]

Comparisons certainly do help to understand and a few here will demonstrate the emptiness of Khrushchev's troubled statements. First, taking the initial statement above, it is as accurate as Khrushchev's, or his writer's, understanding of American history. The resolution does not speak of any Kazakhstan or Turkmenistan; it mentions Turkestan, the whole Moslemic nation which the Russians sought to divide and bury back in the twenties. Also, that certain 'Ural area' is Idel-Ural, also made up of Moslems whom Moscow fears greatly in the event of any upheaval. The second statement is, of course, just spurious identification of the peoples in the Soviet Union with the tyrants.

It is the last statement which is the most illuminating. Some of our leaders in public life have used precisely the same specious argument which Khrushchev makes use of. Texas, Arizona, and California are supposed to be comparable to Ukraine, Lithuania, Georgia, or any other non-Russian nation in the U.S.S.R. Implied, too, is the false comparison between our Federal Union and the artificial Soviet Union. Moreover, the unwary reader is supposed to infer that there is no more slavery of these non-Russian nations in the Soviet Union than there is any slavery of these three States in America.

Now, it should first be pointed out that the only type of parliament in Mexico which would come out with such a resolution could only be one similar to the Moscow puppets in Warsaw, Kiev, Peiping, or Budapest. Second, and here again Khrushchev's ghost-writers slipped on U.S. history, Texas, Arizona, and California entered the American Union voluntarily; Ukraine, Lithuania, Georgia, and the other captive non-Russian nations were conquered by Russian forces and forced into the Soviet Union. Third, our United States is a voluntarily formed Federal Union of States with citizens who consciously identify themselves as American nationals; the Soviet Union is in reality an empire of many nations under the domination of Russian Moscow, with Ukrainians identifying themselves spiritually and consciously as Ukrainians, Georgians as Georgians, Lithuanians as Lithuanians, etc. In terms of national identity, the term "Soviet" is sheer nonsense. Fourth, the native language spoken in Texas or Arizona is the same as in New York or Maryland; the native language in Aremenia is Armenian and is not the same as in Russia, and so with Ukrainian, Georgian, Lithuanian, etc. Fifth, the histories of Texas, Arizona, and California can hardly or seriously be considered as national histories independent of the growing history of the American Nation; the genuinely national histories of Lithuania, Georgia, Ukraine, Turkestan are not only independent of the history of Russia but even precede it by centuries.

In scholarly fashion, one could go on and on with these substantive distinctions which only serve to devastate Khrushchev's call for a comparison. We are not aware of hundreds of thousands of American refugees and escapees in Mexico; but we are fully cognizant of millions of such refugees and escapees from the Soviet Union. Nor are we aware of any independence movement in Texas, Arizona, or California; the evidence of this movement in Lithuania, Ukraine, Georgia, and the other captive non-Russian nations is literally mountainous.

Mr. Khrushchev is presently posing as a self-confident competitor, unafraid of ideas and ready to accept any challenge. On this score, we can provide him with a challenge of his life. Let's test this comparison between Texas, Arizona, and California and let us say, Ukraine, Lithuania, and the Caucasian nations (Georgia, Armenia, and Azerbaijan), to compare with the area of California. Under U.N. auspices and with strict guarantees safeguarding the outcome, let us put it to a vote whether the natives, i.e., the permanent residents in our three States want to join Mexico, remain in the United States, or be completely independent and Lithuanians in Lithuania, Ukrainian nationals in Ukraine, similarly Georgian-speaking Georgians in Georgia and so forth want to remain in the Soviet Union or have their own independent states. Once the outcome is decided upon, the U.N. is to have complete jurisdiction over the areas in order to permit the steady implementation of the popular decision.

This is just one of numerous interesting challenges which could be thrown at Khrushchev. It is the result of the Captive Nations Resolution. We can have him on the run. Imagination, initiative, courage, and abidance with the truth are the only necessary weapons. His sputniks, luniks, and "missilniks" are all relative "puniks" as compared with these weapons which are available to us for the asking.

KHRUSHCHEV AND HIS CAPTIVES

Mr. Speaker, on this, the observance of the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine, I brought to the attention of our Members the study made on the Captive Nations Week resolution by Dr. Lev E. Dobriansky, of Georgetown University. This first study covered developments preceding the passage of the resolution and immediately succeeding it, including the article by Khrushchev last August.

However, since August 1959, Moscow and its puppets have continued to show a very troubled concern about the resolution and its implications. The story of this is presented in a sequel article by Dr. Dobriansky in the December issue of the Ukrainian Quarterly. Titled "Khrushchev and His Captives," the article is a further documented study of the resolution and its effects.

The contents of this and the previous article by Dr. Dobriansky form a necessary background for our thinking about the forthcoming summit. In terms of our dedication to freedom and the moral and political principles upon which the resolution itself is based, it is plainly unthinkable that a summit agenda would exclude the captive nations, both within and outside the Soviet Union.

The indicated article by Dr. Dobriansky from the Ukrainian Quarterly of December 1959 follows:

KHRUSHCHEV AND HIS CAPTIVES

(By Lev E. Dobriansky)

When Khrushchev almost burst a blood vessel or two over the Captive Nations Week resolution last July, the press organs of the world widely publicized the event, and people generally surmised that an extremely sensitive chord in the Russian Communist Empire was struck. About this they couldn't have been more right and more acutely perceptive. Though it is little realized, the ramifications of this resolution extend into every conceivable area—the political, economic, psychological, cultural, scientific, religious, and diplomatic. Extensive captive resources of whatever type, particularly including those in the Soviet Union, can hardly be heralded as a firm foundation for power and growth in any human situation. Khrushchev sensed this instantaneously last summer. But the story did not end there. As far as this writer knows, the press and analysts of the Soviet Union have completely overlooked the additional painful cries of Nikita the Sanguine against this gnawing resolution. In short, they have failed to take note of the real depth of psychopolitical penetration achieved by the congressional passage of the resolution.

It is the aim of this article to cover this uncovered story since last July and also to interpret Khrushchev's continued rantings against the resolution in the light of most recent developments. It will, moreover, furnish some indication of the futural significance of the resolution, now Public Law

[29] Ibid., p. 14105.

[30] The Washington Post, Aug. 17, 1959.

[31] The New York Times, Sept. 3, 1959, p. 4.

86–90, especially in a promising and hot presidential year. This article is, in essence, a necessary sequel to an earlier one which described with considerable documentation the origin, development, and effects of the resolution.[1]

In a way, the fact that the subsequent events pertaining to the resolution have been overlooked suggests in itself the lack of appreciative understanding in this country of the content and meaning of this document. We seem to prefer to spend an inordinate amount of time and resources on economic, military, and other comparisons between ourselves and the Soviet Union which, in most cases, rest on false conceptual premises anyway. Warnings of different threats by Moscow are conjured up almost daily nowadays that the mounting development of a deep political neurosis in this country would certainly be no cause for wonderment. Present trends of confusion and exaggerated thought regarding the Soviet Union and its prodigious power were anticipated by this writer soon after the Mikoyan visit.[2] The acceleration of these trends was also foreseen prior to the arrival of Khrushchev.[3]

The extent to which naive thinking about Moscow's fraudulent peace intentions has been pushed in many sections of our society is a measure of Khrushchev's propaganda victory here. Ingenious remarks recorded daily by the high and the low about Nikita really wanting peace are clearly indicative of our defective understanding of the nature of the struggle. As the writer recently emphasized in an address to the 10th annual meeting of the All-American Conference To Combat Communism, "Khrushchev has so effectively administered tranquilizing cold war pills to major sectors of our society that an increasing number of Americans aren't even aware of the great strides made by imperialist Moscow in this perilous phase of the permanent cold war."[4] The marked incursions made by Moscow this year in Latin America, South Asia, and Africa are advances of the most serious import. Indeed, Khrushchev's singular victory of exacting an invitation to this country has in itself produced confusion and doubt here; it has entrenched the power of Khrushchev with new airs of respectability and legitimacy. The freedom hopes of millions of patriots in Moscow's empire have been scalded, while false impressions of Moscow's inflated power have become more widespread among the newly independent nations. Scanning all of this, our most loyal allies situated about the periphery of the Russian Communist empire could not but become increasingly uneasy about our world leadership. This result of Khrushchev's propaganda victory explains the reason for President Eisenhower's decision to visit many of these areas. All of these developments form the backdrop for Khrushchev's aim to extricate the one psychopolitical thorn lodged deeply in his side—the Captive Nations Week resolution.

NIKITA'S CAPTIVE SPECTER

By all evidence, the cardinal objective of Khrushchev's maneuvers and protestations these past 2 years have been the rapid consolidation of Moscow's empire and Western accommodation to it. This is essentially what he means by "peaceful coexistence" and "noninterference in the affairs of others." The fraudulent issue of "communism versus capitalism" is his expedient propaganda deflector, aimed to distract Western attention from the real issue between Russian imperialist slavery and freedom. In these respects, he has realized tremendous progress, but a specter has befallen him, like a black cat crossing his path of progress. Fraught with all sorts of possibilities, the specter of his captives haunts Khrushchev and the mirror of this specter was opportunely presented by our own Congress.

After the July outburst, Khrushchev decided to crack this mirror further with certain observation in his so-called article in the Foreign Affairs periodical. His comments are quite illuminating. He writes:

"You disagree with us? Prove by facts that your system is superior and more efficacious, that it is capable of ensuring a higher degree of prosperity for the people than the socialist system, that under capitalism man can be happier than under socialism. It is impossible to prove this. I have no other explanation for the fact that talk of violently 'rolling back' communism never ceases in the West. Not long ago the U.S. Senate and House of Representatives deemed it proper to pass a resolution calling for the liberation of the Socialist countries allegedly enslaved by communism and, moreover, of a number of union republics constituting part of the Soviet Union. The authors of the resolution call for the liberation of the Ukraine, Byelorussia, Lithuania, Latvia, Estonia, Armenia, Azerbaijan, Georgia, Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and even a certain Ural area.

"I would not be telling the full truth if I did not say that the adoption of this ill-starred resolution was regarded by the Soviet people as an act of provocation. Personally I agree with this appraisal.

"It would be interesting to see, incidentally, how the authors of this resolution would have reacted if the Parliament of Mexico, for instance, had passed a resolution demanding that Texas, Arizona, and California be liberated from American slavery. Apparently they have never pondered such a question, which is very regrettable. Sometimes comparisons help to understand the essence of a matter."[5]

A concise, critical analysis of these passages is not at all difficult. In raising the points that he does, it is immediately evident that Khrushchev is banking on the unfamiliarity of his American readers with the realities of the Soviet Union. First, the introductory sentences on socialism and capitalism could be easily dispensed with. As mentioned above, a point of argumentative deflection is introduced here with no real bearing on the issue troubling Khrushchev. A complete and thorough politico-economic comparison between the national economy of the United States of America and the empire economy of the U.S.S.R. would lead to a day and night conclusion when it comes to the values of efficacy, prosperity, and happiness. Unfortunately, little work along these realistic lines has been done in this country. It should be noteworthy, nevertheless, for the reader that Khrushchev has to inject the deflector before taking up the resolution.

The second point of critical interest is Khrushchev's own misreading of the resolution or, if he read it correctly, then his dishonesty in the treatment of its contents. The resolution specifically refers to enslavement by Russian Communist aggression, not by the vague and meaningless concept of communism. By this honest specification the resolution is grounded in historical fact, not in philosophical vaguery. Moreover, as concerns the liberation of the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R., nowhere does the resolution contain any specification of Kazakhstan, Turkmenistan, and even a certain ural area." It does specify the Turkestan nation and Idel-Ural which consists of the Tatars, Bashkirs, and other non-Russian peoples between the Volga and the Urals. As shown in the writer's previous article on the resolution, it was the realistic inclusion of the captive non-Russian nations in the Soviet Union that really caused the Khrushchev explosion in July.[6] In his article Khrushchev attempts a literary derogation of this most vital and basic point of the resolution.

About his telling "the full truth," whereby the mythical "Soviet people" regarded the resolution as an "act of provocation," the informed reader couldn't even extract an eighth of a truth. The note of Khrushchev's humble personal agreement with this imagined consensus is enough to suggest his typical approach toward any truth. But what is most significant in these passages is Khrushchev's use of a spurious argument that is characteristically exploited by anti-Communist Russian emigres and their unwary American friends in the hope of maintaining the territorial integrity of the basic Russian Empire. His implied comparison between Texas, Arizona, and California and comparable areas in the U.S.S.R. is, except for geography, a speciosity which has hoodwinked many Americans. They are no more validly comparable than are the economies of the United States and the U.S.S.R.

During Khrushchev's visit here an attempt was made to challenge him on his misleading point.[7] In fact, at the tea arranged by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the following question was posed by Senator DIRKSEN, of Illinois:

"In your article in Foreign Affairs, you mistakenly compare Texas, Arizona, and California with certain non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. Would you be willing to stage, under U.N. auspices and control, free voting conditions to determine whether the natives of Lithuania, Ukraine, and the Caucasian states want to remain in the U.S.S.R. or be independent states and whether the residents of comparable Arizona, Texas, and California want to remain in the United States or be completely independent states? Let's compete in ideas and action?"[8]

Following the tea meeting, Senator DIRKSEN stated to the press that on this and numerous other questions "Khrushchev took a fifth amendment stand." Indeed, in the very first phase of his visit Khrushchev showed quite plainly that he was not interested in any free intellectual exchange of ideas. Those who opposed his visit had the foresight to warn of this at the time the invitation was extended.

At the third session of the U.S.S.R. Supreme Soviet, held on October 31, Khrushchev once again saw fit to tear into the Captive Nations Week resolution. On this point, the official text of his report to this captive audience reads as follows:

"Now times have changed. Even some of the most active exponents of the 'positions of strength' policy see its futility. Only the most belligerent Western politicians cannot make up their mind to discard the old formula. In some places one still hears reverberations of the past. Take, for instance, the much-to-be-regretted decision of the American Congress to hold the so-called 'Captive Nations Week' and to pray for their

---

[1] "The Captive Nations Week Resolution," the Ukrainian Quarterly, September 1959, pp. 206–225.

[2] See "Post Mortems on Operation Mikoyan," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 29, 1959, pp. A5583–A5585.

[3] "The Khrushchev Invitation," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 14, 1959, pp. A8137–A8138.

[4] AP and Washington Sunday Star, "Economist Derides Red Peace Goals," Nov. 15, 1959.

[5] Nikita S. Khrushchev, "On Peaceful Coexistence," Foreign Affairs, vol. 38, No. 1, October 1959, pp. 6–7.

[6] Ibid., p. 220.

[7] See "A Comment on the Khrushchev Visit," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 18, 1959, p. A8328.

[8] See for other questions "Khrushchev Denies That Non-Russian Republics Are Independent," the Ukrainian Bulletin, Oct. 1–15, 1959, p. 6.

liberation. In this case words other than 'rolling back' were used, but the gist remained the same, the same appeal for interference in other peoples' affairs.

"So you will see from the policy of 'rolling back' they have switched to praying to the Lord. What can it lead to? If the Western leaders pray to God to liberate the peoples of the Socialist countries, and we, in turn, pray that He should liberate their peoples from capitalist rule, we shall thus put God in a quandary. What decision should He make, after all?" [9]

Here, too, the cardinal objective sought by Khrushchev in the immediate period ahead is evident again. His quasi-cynical remarks about prayers and God do not conceal his sustained concern about "interference in other people's affairs." Such self-insuring interference on our part is in reality, of course, one directed at the widespread Russian interference in and domination of all the captive non-Russian nations. In brief, Khrushchev singles out again the resolution and in the abiding hope that "now times have changed" holds out for us not to interfere with his colonial interference with the lives of the captive peoples. His victory in this fundamental regard would exceed in value all the military might he has now or will have in the future.

NIKITA WOULD BURY THE RESOLUTION

On the basis of all evidence provided here and in the previous article, there can be no doubt that the passage of the resolution by Congress put an uncomfortable crimp in Moscow's cold war operations. A careful reading of Khrushchev's quoted utterances and statements on the subject shows an anxiety to bury the resolution as quickly as possible. For his liking it would be just the last breath of the past, a document firmly buried under heaps of slogans declaring "peace and friendship." The reality he refuses to face is that there are too many Americans who know that the traditional Russian political slogan of peace and friendship has for centuries been used to seduce neighboring non-Russian nations into captivity. There are others who, perhaps depending more on sound logic than historical fact, are aware that in whatever sphere of human existence, peace and friendship are the consequent conditions of justice and freedom, not their cause. The condition of harmony necessarily implied by peace and friendship is logically predicated on the real prevalence of justice and freedom; and these requisite conditions do not prevail in the Russian Communist Empire. These things are known by countless Americans and, despite Khrushchev's wishes, will continue to be forcefully expressed in this country.

However, there are certain realities we must face if we are to thwart Khrushchev's plans to bury the resolution. The passage of the measure last summer disclosed two indisputable facts: one, the acute sensitivity of Moscow about the weakest and yet most vital nerve in its empire and, two, the complete lack of understanding in many sections of our Nation with regard to the content and significance of the resolution. Khrushchev's denunciations of the resolution last July, again in August, and once again in October clearly demonstrate how deeply it penetrated Moscow's cold war armor. Almost needless to repeat, he fears this resolution more than anything else on the politico-psychological front. The chief reason for this is that the law symbolizes enormous and even decisive cold war possibilities.

A point that cannot be too often repeated is that by this resolution our Government has taken, for the first time, official cognizance of the majority of captive non-Russian nations; namely, those held in bondage within the Soviet Union itself. Without the captive Baltic nations, White Ruthenia, Ukraine, the Caucasian nations, Turkestan and others mentioned in the resolution, Russia with its 100 million population and its own resources, could scarcely be called, as the Moscow propaganda machine now does, the greatest power in the world. It would be no more comparable in power to the United States than a reunited Germany would be. From a cold war viewpoint, the development of this inherent weakness in the synthetic state known as the Soviet Union would seriously deflate all the bluster, bluff, and sham of Moscow's supposed economic prowess, military might, scientific achievements, and cultural attainments. Parasitic growth on the basis of captive resources is not exactly alluring in propaganda or otherwise. Khrushchev apparently has the vision to see this; most of us, unfortunately, do not.

Our lack of vision was amply shown last summer. As a matter of fact, the international stir created by the resolution crystallized the low level of our understanding about the Soviet Union and its ersatz political character. In one instance the writer was impelled to take to critical task a grossly unbalanced editorial in one of our leading newspapers.[10] At the time, many reporters, writers, and analysts inquired to know where Turkestan or White Ruthenia is located. Some wrote as though the minority captive nations in Central Europe were the only nations listed in the resolution. But what can one expect when on the highest levels of our Government the U.S.S.R. is referred to as "the Soviet nation" and the different nations within the Soviet Union are arbitrarily and somewhat insularly called "the Soviet people" or "the Soviets." Aside from the historical and demographic untruths of these usages, the very suggestion of a united, integrated, and monolithic power in the U.S.S.R. is not even intelligent from a cold war viewpoint. Moscow couldn't have something better if it were made to order.

Furthermore, in terms of the resolution and the wealth of evidence underlying it, our many economic, military, scientific, and other comparisons between the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America are drawn on false premises. The writer demonstrated this for the military in an article on "Basic Misconceptions in U.S. Military Thought on the U.S.S.R." [11] The same criticism applies to our unrealistic economic comparisons. It doesn't even make elementary sense in scientific identification and description to speak of a gross national product for the Soviet Union where both objective reality and legal structure clearly underwrite a multinational arrangement. Moreover, the U.S.S.R., in essence an empire within an empire, is not at all qualitatively comparable to the United States which is a nation-state. The resolution suggests all this and far more. The development of these real implications can pose a tremendous challenge to Moscow, testing quite peaceably numerous professions of the Russian propagandists. Khrushchev actually fears such a test and virtually paralyzes some of us with his coexistence or codestruction propaganda, while at the same time his cold war activities continue undiminished in every quarter of the globe. Worked within a pattern of calculating strategy and tactics, these activities include every conceivable instrument—political, diplomatic, economic, psychological, cultural, scientific, and military. One cannot begin to evaluate the breadth and depth of these activities unless his intellectual approach to Moscow's total activity is an integralist and holistic one. A grasp of the total war being flung upon us is impossible also without a working concept of cold war, which this writer defines as a twilight condition of neither real peace nor hot war, where all the basic elements of a hot war—predatory design, aggressive strategy, tactics, and techniques—are present, except for open military combat between states. In short, as long practiced by imperialist Russia, a cold war is the very soul and spirit of a hot war with the massive body of military conflict in secondary reserve.

THE PERMANENT RUSSIAN COLD WAR AND THE RESOLUTION

Moscow has reaped impressive cold war successes this past year. Among the most outstanding is the increasing and undiscriminating acceptance of the Muscovite notion of peaceful coexistence. Bamboozled by Russian propaganda on the supposed exclusive alternatives of coexistence or codestruction, many voices in our Nation have clearly warmed up to this essentially cold war notion. The irony of the current situation is that if we are not to be cornered into a hot war, we must face up to the realities of Russia's permanent cold war. Historically, an unparalleled empire was built over five centuries by established cold war techniques. The Russian Communist Empire bases its forward pressures on the selfsame techniques.[12]

A sound theoretical basis for necessary cold war gaming is provided in the Captive Nations Week resolution. With an indispensable apparatus, such as a Freedom Commission, the possibilities suggested by the resolution could be developed peacably and with decisive intent. The second observance of the week next July should be exceedingly ripe for a sober realization of these needs. We cannot stress too strongly that the captive nations throughout the empire, and particularly in the Soviet Union, constitute our most formidable weapon in the period of mutual deterrence.[13] Prayerful observances during the second anniversary of the resolution should occasion such sober thought and reflection throughout the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, during these days of appeasement, during these days when the importance of trade is assuming an ascendency over the importance of morality, during these days when there are positive friendships and hands across the seas, let me point out to you that Khrushchev, welcomed, praised, and honored in this Nation, was the leader of the greatest tyranny, the perpetrator of the greatest crime of genocide with the conspired and planned and deliberate massacre of millions of Ukrainians.

Now this minor deity is honored by the Western Christian World. And I have no better authority than J. Edgar Hoover who said this week that the Communist Party in the United States has never been stronger, never been better organized, never been more effective, never been more united, never been more dedicated than it is today. And, Mr. J. Edgar Hoover attributes that disastrous condition to the inspiration given to these Communists because of the visit of Khrushchev, the "Murderer of the Ukraine."

---

[9] "N. S. Khrushchev's Report to Supreme Soviet," Embassy of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Nov. 2, 1959, pp. 1–2.

[10] See "Author of Captive Nations Week Resolution a Virginian," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 14, 1959, pp. A8121–A8123.

[11] CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, July 2, 1959, pp. A5760–A5762.

[12] "Author of Captive Nations' Week Resolution Points Way To Defeat Russian Cold War Strategy and Tactics," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 4, 1959, pp. A7753–A7755.

[13] "An Address on the Vulnerabilities of Russian Communism," CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Sept. 15, 1959, pp. A8253–A8255.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MADDEN] who served with me as my chairman on the famous Katyn Massacre Committee when we went to Europe and investigated the massacre of 5,000 Polish officers by Soviet Russia.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD], a member of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs, on the statement he has just completed regarding the terrible, inhuman, barbarous onslaught which the communistic Soviet leadership inflicted upon the free people of Ukrainia. I endorse every statement that the gentleman from Pennsylvania narrated in reviewing the enslavement of the Ukrainian people by Soviet tyranny. I also commend him for mentioning the visit that Khrushchev, the tyrannical leader of Communist Russia, made to this country. He traveled throughout our land, using every opportunity in public meetings, and at banquets, given in his honor by people of this great free country, to spread his communistic propaganda. I often wonder what the people back in Ukrainia, Poland, Hungary, Lithuania, Rumania, and the Balkan States generally think when they observe the great free Government of America entertaining the man that was the leader of this barbarous, inhuman massacre and instigator of genocide in relation to millions upon millions of Ukrainian people throughout the last 25 to 30 years.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] was a member of the Katyn Forest Massacre Committee that held hearings not only in this country but in Europe during the 82d Congress and contributed greatly to the success of that committee. That committee held dozens of hearings, both here and across the water; heard approximately 250 witnesses. Every one of those witnesses, without exception, representing all segments of society—labor, industry, religion, people who had been prisoners of war and in slave labor camps of the Soviet Union—in their testimony they told the story of the inhuman, barbarous tyranny that the Soviets had inflicted not only upon Ukraine, but upon other nations in Central Europe.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was a great asset in the work of that committee. He devoted a long time to carrying out the work of the Katyn Forest Massacre Committee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank him for reserving 60 minutes today in order to remind the Members of Congress and the people of this great, free land of ours, that the Soviet Union has enslaved millions of people through its tyranny and aggression. We also must remember that at no time have the people of these enslaved nations willingly submitted to the rule of the Soviet Union in spite of the propaganda of Khrushchev and other Soviet leaders who would want the people of the world to believe otherwise. They have been guilty of the most inhuman aggression and enslavement of more people than any set of tyrants in the history of the world. I am referring to Khrushchev and the other leaders, both past and present, of the Soviet Union.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I am very grateful to the gentleman from Indiana. I might say I have just returned from a 2½-month tour of the Far East. I went to Alaska and then visited Korea, Formosa, Japan, Laos, Cambodia, South Vietnam, Thailand—all of those great areas of the Pacific. I was there at the time Khrushchev visited here. This Congress adjourned at 6:21 a.m. and at 6:22 a.m. I got out of town because I knew Khrushchev was coming in at 10 a.m. There was much said here to the effect, "Oh, you should not leave town because this guest is coming." I got out of town because of the nature and quality of the guest. Make no mistake about why I left here 1 minute after we adjourned; and many of my colleagues did the same thing.

Mr. Speaker, may I add this? Can you imagine the hue and cry in the press of this Nation, can you imagine the riotous debate on this floor if, when Harry Truman was President, he had brought Khrushchev to this country and then 6 months after Khrushchev had left J. Edgar Hoover had said that the Communist Party in America was at its strongest and most effective and dangerous because of the Khrushchev visit? Can you imagine what the press, editorially and in every other way, would have done to the then President? And now a conspiracy of silence prevails and Mr. Hoover's statement was buried with the advertisements for patent medicines somewhere over on page 11. Imagine that.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WIER. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Pennsylvania and associate myself with him on the very fine presentation he has delivered here this afternoon for and on behalf of a cause, the cause of freedom for the Ukrainian people. I think it was well done, I think it is timely, and I think it should be continued from year to year until their dream is realized. On Monday next I shall make my own statement on the floor in regard to Ukrainian independence.

Mr. FLOOD. I am glad to have this contribution from the gentleman from Minnesota. He has always spoken out on this matter, and he helps today.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, today we solemnly commemorate the 42d anniversary of the declaration of Ukrainian independence, and I join with my colleagues and freedom-loving people everywhere in extending greetings and saluting these heroic people of the Ukraine.

As one of the first nations to fall under the tyranny of the Bolshevik imperialists, the Ukrainians suffered the destruction of their churches, mass deportations and purges, man-made famines, and yet they have steadfastly refused to relinquish their national ideals. They have never given up their courage and determination to promote the cause of democracy, and Ukrainia will be recorded in the world's history books as a symbol of the struggle for independence and freedom. The spirit of these gallant Ukrainians will stand as an inspiration to the peoples of the world in their labors for justice and freedom.

In my district I have known many Ukrainians. They have proved excellent citizens and have contributed much to the cultural vigor of our community. Their devotion to our free way of life has enriched our entire country.

On this anniversary of Ukrainian independence, it is only fitting that we pay tribute to these courageous people and extend to them a word of comfort in their struggle for freedom and cultural survival. Let us all hope and pray that their persistence will be rewarded, and they will again become a free and independent people.

Mr. FLOOD. The gentleman from New York of course understands these problems. He is of Slavic ancestry, I am sure. I know how his heart bleeds for any of the oppressed peoples of the middle European countries, because his ancestors suffered through tragedies similar to those to which we have referred today.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I, too, join in commending the gentleman from Pennsylvania for his excellent statement.

Mr. Speaker, the illusion which Soviet leaders seek to create about the unity and strength of the nations and peoples within the Soviet sphere does not find a ready audience on this side of the Iron Curtain.

As we mark this 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukrainia, there is ample evidence before the world to show that the crown rests uneasily on the head of those who currently rule the Soviet bloc. The captive nations within this bloc show no willingness to embrace the beliefs and practices of the Communists who are in control.

We in America send our best wishes to the people of Ukrainia on this solemn anniversary.

GENERAL LEAVE TO EXTEND

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 days in which to extend their remarks on this subject.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, wars are among the worst of human follies and blunders, for they bring death to millions of innocent and helpless people and cause the destruction of untold wealth that may never be reproduced and recreated. The First World War was the greatest of such wars up to that time. It caused death and injuries, and misery to millions and tens of millions, but ironically that world holocaust, destructive and ruinous as it was also ushered in a new era for those tens of millions who had been suffering under detested and despised alien oppressors for centuries. In this respect that war brought happiness and joy to a large number of oppressed nationalities. Many of them attained their freedom and national independence as the result of that war. The Ukrainians were among these, and they proclaimed the establishment of the Ukrainian Republic on January 22, 1918, exactly 42 years ago.

For almost 300 years the Ukraine had been submerged in the Russian continent, and during all that time autocratic czars had done their worst to suppress and eradicate what we in the West regard as praiseworthy Ukrainian traits: their desire for freedom, their boundless love for their historic homeland, their undying yearning for political independence, and their willingness to sacrifice their all for the attainment of their national goal. And on January 22, 1918, when they proclaimed their independence, they had attained their national goal, and a new day was ushered in for them.

That memorable day is a great, bright landmark in Ukrainian history, and remains as the brightest spot in their modern story. Today it is being celebrated, in due solemnity, as a national holiday. Even though the Republic did not last much more than 2 years, yet that short and happy period has left its unforgettable impression upon all Ukrainians. All of them would like to observe this anniversary, but sad as it is, not all Ukrainians are permitted and privileged to do it. To the 42 million Ukrainians who have suffered, and still suffer, under the regime imposed upon them by Communist tyrants in their homeland that privilege is denied. We in the free world gladly join hands with Ukrainian-Americans on this 42d anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day and echo their genuine sentiment for freedom.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join in this observance in recognition of the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence. It is fitting to remind our people that on January 22, 1918, in the city of Kiev, capital of the Ukraine, a proclamation was issued declaring that the Ukraine was a free and independent Republic. These unfortunate people, 40 million of them, have, of course, been swallowed up against their will by the Soviet Union, and together with other millions of eastern Europeans behind the Iron Curtain, are vassals of a ruthless Communist domination.

These people are still eager for the right of self-determination and self-government. They continue to pray for liberty and the dignity of freedom. Their opposition to Communist rule has continued unabated despite mass deportations and attempts by their Communist masters to destroy their national culture and their passion for independence.

The 42d anniversary of their founding as a free republic is therefore an appropriate occasion for America and the free world to give expression to our sympathy with their aims and objectives to attain their freedom once again. We join heartily in condemnation of the system that has enslaved them and the other unwilling prisoners of communism behind the Iron Curtain.

With the moral support of all freedom-loving nations, it is to be hoped their courage and their aspirations will not diminish and that their desire for liberty will eventually be realized.

Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the gallant Ukrainian people on the occasion of the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine, Friday, January 22, 1960.

The people of Ukraine are to be admired for their bravery, and for their high ideals and love of freedom. They have exhibited a solidarity and a determination to regain their liberty in their constant resistance to Communist aggression. I express my fervent hope that the day is not too far distant that the people of the Ukraine and all others now under the domination of the Soviet dictators will again enjoy the freedom that they so deeply desire.

Mr. DORN of New York. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago many millions of people who had been groaning under the heavy yoke of Russian autocracy cast off that oppressive regime and proclaimed their independence. The Ukrainian people were among the first of these people to do this, and they did it amidst jubilation and happiness unknown in the Ukraine for centuries. Then they established their democratic republic and had hoped to enjoy their hard-earned freedom in their historic homeland. Unfortunately that was not to be. The independence they had proclaimed was taken away from them by Communist aggressors late in 1920, treacherously putting an end to all forms of freedom in the Ukraine.

Today for almost 40 years more than 42 million Ukrainians have been suffering under the barbarous tyranny of Communist totalitarianism. For all the hardships and misery which these courageous people have endured, their undying hope for freedom has been their sole consolation. Today we all devoutly pray, on the observance of their Independence Day, that they soon have their just reward in happiness and peace.

Mr. KOWALSKI. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918—42 years ago tomorrow— the people of the Ukraine declared themselves to be a free and independent Republic.

Their freedom and independence have long since fallen under the Soviet Communist hordes, but in the Ukraine, as in so many enslaved nations, there still burns brightly the spirit of liberty. In millions of hearts still lives the dream of a free life in a free world.

As we mark tomorrow the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence it might be well for us to keep in mind that almost half of the population of what we call the Soviet Union consists of captive peoples, ever restless under the Communist dictatorship. The Ukrainians alone represent more than 42 million slaves of the Soviet dictatorship.

I salute the people of the Ukraine for unswerving devotion to the cause of freedom.

Mrs. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, even as the world witnesses and rejoices today in the birth of new nations, rising to freedom and independence, we cannot and must not forget those peoples who, once free, now live under tyrannous oppression. And on January 22 our thoughts and prayers go in particular to the Ukrainian people, who on this day celebrate the 42d anniversary of their cherished—but lost—independence.

After the fall of czarist Russia, the Ukraine was one of the first to proclaim her independence. On March 17, 1917, was established the Ukrainian Central Council—the Rada—which assumed the leadership of a happy people. For the first time in more than 100 years the Ukrainian people had their own political body. On July 29, 1917, the constitution of the Ukraine was drafted, and on January 22, 1918, the Central Rada proclaimed the Ukrainian National Republic, representing the independent and sovereign power of the Ukrainian people.

But the freedom of the Ukrainian people was to be short lived. After a 4-year desperate struggle with the Russian Bolsheviks, the young Republic was brought down by brute force—and the proud and industrious Ukrainian people were once more subjected to foreign rule. Today, under the name of a "Peoples' Democracy," and after a record of mass deportations, forced famines, and other imposed conditions which have shocked the world, the Ukrainian people are bent beneath a yoke which all free men can justly decry.

Despite oppression and suppression, however, the spirit of freedom lives in their hearts and souls. The yearning for liberty has not and cannot be quenched. In very truth, the passion to be free has been only strengthened by the efforts of the Russians, for over 250 years, to suppress the Ukrainian national culture. The importance of the Ukraine cannot be overestimated. Forty-two million strong today, the Ukrainians compose the largest non-Russian group behind the Iron Curtain and represent one-fifth of the total population of the Soviet Union. Stretching from the Black Sea to the Carpathian Mountains, from the Donets Basin and Don River, the Ukraine comprises one of the most fertile and productive areas of the world: productive not only as the breadbasket of the Soviet Union, but even more essential, in industrial products and natural resources.

Small wonder that a relentless effort has been made to integrate the Ukrainian people into a Soviet culture. Small wonder that an equally relentless attempt has been constant for generations to destroy the political independence and personal freedom of a people who have so much to give. Even greater is the wonder, nevertheless, that despite the attempt, despite the suppression, despite, in fact, the ways of oppression to which the people have been subjected, their boundless love for their homeland, their historic yearning for freedom and liberty has not and will not be eradicated.

So on this day we once more pay tribute to the courage of the Ukrainian people and praise the contribution that they have made by precept and example to freedom-loving people around the world. We look forward to the day, with them, when we can rejoice in a world in which all mankind can indeed be free to enjoy self-government and to live in freedom, think in freedom, speak in freedom, act in freedom, worship in freedom, and enjoy every other privilege to which the heart of man aspires.

It would not be fitting on this day of commemoration to omit mention of the worthy contribution made by Americans of Ukrainian descent to the political heritage and culture of our own country. We have profited much from their love of freedom and their devotion to democratic ideals. The fabric of our country is enriched through their heritage and by their participation.

Today, as we once more bear witness to our mutual belief in liberty and justice, we assure the captive Ukrainian people that they have indeed not been forgotten. We extend to them the hand of our friendship as a manifestation, once more, of "the historic fact that the people of the United States share with them their aspirations for the recovery of their freedom and independence."

Mr. CAHILL. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to join my many colleagues in the House of Representatives in noting the 42d anniversary of the Ukrainian proclamation of independence. Each year it has been a custom of the Congress of the United States to note this important day as a tribute to the courage, faith, and steadfastness of the Ukrainian peoples throughout the world and to encourage their continued fight against the Communist philosophy. We, in the United States, who have enjoyed freedom and yet have been able to recognize the atheistic nature of the Communist philosophy, can sympathize more than any other peoples with the people of the Ukraine and can recognize better than most the tremendous and admirable struggle they have maintained throughout the years against their Communist aggressors.

This commemorative ceremony in the Congress of the United States serves as a useful weapon in bringing to the attention of the world the struggles of the 40 million Ukrainians and will, I hope, continue to be a symbol in their hearts of the worthwhile efforts they have made and will continue to make in their struggle for freedom.

I join with all the Members of this House in honoring those who strive valiantly for a freedom which should be theirs and join in the fervent hope that the day will soon come when the Ukrainians will have true independence.

Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, the proclamation of the Ukrainian Republic 42 years ago marks one of the happiest days for freedom-loving Ukrainians, and through the years has remained a memorable bright spot in the Ukraine's long and glorious but unhappy history.

Though the dawning of that period of freedom and independence did not last long—barely 2 years—it will always stand out as a great landmark in the modern annals of that country.

Since the loss again of their freedom in 1920, we know that the Ukrainians have suffered cruel hardships under Soviet totalitarian communism. But we also know that through all this hardship and oppression their cherished ideals of liberty and independence remain steadfast.

We join with Sons of the Ukraine, who have made their homes in America and have contributed to her greatness, in sending our warm greetings to their friends and relatives in the homeland. We add our hopes and prayers that the longed for better life for these 42 million Ukrainians behind the Iron Curtain will eventually be won and enjoyed in full measure.

Mr. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to join with my colleagues of the House today in calling attention to the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine on Friday January 22. As the largest captive nation that is contained within the Soviet Union itself, the plight of Ukraine and of 42 million Ukrainians should be constantly kept in mind by the American people. It is the sincere hope not only of my colleagues in the House and of the entire Membership of the Congress but indeed of all the American people that the inhabitants of the Ukraine will soon again have that blessed right of self-determination from which they have been denied almost since the establishment of their independence in 1918.

It is certainly fitting at this time to refer to the recent tragic death in Munich, Germany, of one of the great Ukrainian patriot leaders, Stefan Bandera. This man died under circumstances which gave the official appearance of suicide but it is the overwhelming conviction of all people of Ukrainian origin, an opinion in which I concur, that he was murdered by Communist agents. My own convictions in this matter are heightened by my personal knowledge of Mr. Bandera's long and valiant struggle against the Communists for the liberation of his homeland. I sincerely hope that his martyrdom to the cause of Ukraine independence will serve as an inspiration to those who remain behind so that his fight will be continued.

If all of us acknowledge, on this 42d anniversary, the justice of the aspirations of the Ukraine for freedom and self-government, I sincerely trust that it will serve as a reminder to the people of that great country that their cause is not forgotten here in the United States of America, the leader of the free nations in the world.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with Americans of Ukrainian ancestry in observing the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

The young Ukrainian National Republic became one of the first victims of Communist expansion and aggression. It was invaded and crushed in 1920—barely 2 years after it had achieved independence. It has remained enslaved to this very day, in spite of the ironic Soviet claim that Ukraine is "a truly free and sovereign nation," and in spite of the fact that its Communist regime has been represented for a number of years in the United Nations.

The United States has always been sympathetic to the legitimate aspirations of other peoples. We know that the people of Ukraine long for true independence and wish to be rid of their Communist oppressors. This fact is clearly apparent from the long reign of terror imposed upon the people of Ukraine by the Communists who have endeavored to crush the will to resist, and the spirit of freedom, in all of the captive nations.

On this occasion, let us pay tribute to the undaunted spirit of the people of Ukraine, and reaffirm our hope that their wish for freedom and independence may soon be realized.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, for nearly four decades the people of Ukraine have been engulfed by the surging and suffocating riptide of Soviet communism. There in their historic homeland they have been subjected to so much hardship and misery, privation and even starvation, that we hear very little else today about Ukraine and the Ukrainian people. But we should remember that these brave and stout-hearted Ukrainians, however oppressed, and at times downhearted they may be, have not given up their fervent desire for freedom and independence. On this 42d anniversary of their Independence Day the least we in this country can do is to assure them that millions of us here hope and devoutly pray for their deliverance from Communist tyranny.

Mr. WALLHAUSER. Mr. Speaker, today is the anniversary of a most solemn day in the history of the world. It is the 42d anniversary of the declaration of Ukrainian independence.

Although independence under the declaration of January 22, 1918, was short lived, it is most fitting that we join here today in commemorating that anniversary and paying tribute to the courageous and freedom-loving people of the Ukraine.

It is fitting because the spirit of freedom and independence still burns strongly in the hearts and minds of these brave people. It is a fire that cannot be stamped out by their Communist oppressors. As their Communist oppressors know, the desire and love of freedom of the Ukraine people cannot be stilled or stifled, and I say that independence must not be denied them, even though the road to achievement may be long and hard.

As do the people of the Ukraine, we here in the United States of America look forward to the day when the standard of freedom and independence will fly over their land again. In solemn observation of the declaration of January 22, 1918, may we pray together that this day will not be long in coming. Through our prayers may we also reaffirm our deep and enduring friendship for the people of the Ukraine.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago tomorrow, the Ukrainian National Republic declared her independence after centuries of domination and subjugation under the Mongols and the Russian czars. But that independence was short lived. No sooner were these freedom-loving people enjoying the fruits of liberty than the Soviet Communist leaders eradicated any vestige of the newly won freedom. Read the pages of Ukrainian history and you will find that the years following were filled with unparalleled cruelty and mass extinction that took millions of Ukrainian lives. But the indomitable spirit of these freedom-loving people lives on and it is this spirit that we, on the occasion of the 42d independent anniversary of Ukraine, seek to keep burning.

It is for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I rise to pay tribute to the 42 million Ukrainians that comprise the biggest captive non-Russian nation both in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain.

It is not amiss to ask the reason for the widespread concern Americans, and for that matter all freedom-loving people, have over the Ukrainians. In the words of Prof. Lev E. Dobriansky, chairman of the Ukrainian Congress Committee of America, Inc., the answer lies in the fact that for the first time, with the passage by this Congress last July of the Captive Nations Week Resolution, we officially recognized the existence of captive nations in the U.S.S.R. itself. The enormous politicopsychological advantages and the leverage this opens up for us are the very thing Moscow fears most.

In her effort to disillusion the world, Moscow claims that the U.S.S.R. is a union of people having the same sentiments and culture. The terms "Soviet nation," "Soviet people," and "integrated Soviet might" are gross perversions of the truth. The Soviet armed forces consist of about 45 percent captive non-Russians. The startling reality is that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of which Premier Khrushchev is the head is a basic empire of captive nations and different peoples. Our unstinted support and understanding of the captive non-Russian nations in the U.S.S.R. destroys this illusion.

It is with this in mind that I join my distinguished colleagues and the American people, particularly the Ukrainian-Americans, in greeting and honoring freedom-inspiring Ukraine in her continuing and unabated struggle to regain that which is rightfully hers. It is the sincere hope of America and the free world that soon Ukraine will join the family of free nations.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian people proclaimed their independence. Although it was to last for 2 short years, it marked the only time in modern history that these people were given the opportunity to enjoy the blessings of freedom.

Tomorrow on the 42d anniversary of their independence the Ukrainians still are not free. The Communists have used every imaginable tactic to destroy all vestiges of Ukrainian nationalism. Consequently, there will be little opportunity for them to celebrate the happy occasion of their independence day.

Therefore, it is essential that all Americans join with Ukrainian-Americans in speaking for their speechless friends and relatives abroad. Our statements of concern for their welfare will, I am sure, help them bear the burden of Communist tyranny.

In particular, we should reassure the Ukrainian people that we have not forsaken them; that we have never acquiesced to their bondage; and that we will continue to demand that every nation, no matter how small, has the natural right of self-determination as well as the right to live in an atmosphere of freedom and justice.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, just 42 years ago tomorrow, the people of the Ukraine proclaimed and celebrated their independence from Russia. It is a tragic fact that this independence was short lived, for in 1920 the Red army launched a savage attack, taking over the country for the Communists. Since 1920 the Ukraine has been absorbed into the Soviet Union. But the Russians have not been able to assimilate the people, who have given strong and repeated evidence that their historic dream of national identity still lives.

History records that the Ukrainians achieved and held national freedom from the 9th to the 14th centuries, and again for a brief period in the 17th century.

I am personally acquainted with many Americans of Ukrainian descent who came to the United States to seek peace and freedom. Some of them are neighbors near my ranch in southwestern North Dakota. Many Ukrainian-Americans have relatives still living under Communist domination.

The old Russian Empire was referred to as the prison of nations during World War I. A look at modern Russia, under communism, indicates that the old title still fits the situation.

I am proud today to join with hundreds of thousands who now live in this country and have become loyal American citizens, in celebrating the 42d anniversary of the Ukrainian National Republic.

It is to be hoped that the day is not too far off when the Ukraine and other countries now behind the Iron Curtain will once again be free.

Mr. McDOWELL. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago the 22d of January, a Ukrainian National Council sitting in Kiev proclaimed the independence of the Ukraine. Today we observe that proclamation although the nation formed that day in Kiev is no longer free. The Ukraine National Republic was short lived, its existence forged into nonexistence by the might of the hammer and sickle.

But still, we observe Ukrainian Independence Day. Of course, our observance stems from our belief in freedom, our violent distaste for tyranny, and our honest prayer that the millions of oppressed Ukrainians behind the Iron Curtain may regain that freedom which they have been so long denied. But besides demonstrating these facets of our democratic philosophy, this observance performs some extremely necessary functions. Without sounding callous, I would like to mention but a few of these functions.

By this commemoration, we announce to the world that we are not deceived by the fine words and friendly overtures of the U.S.S.R. We assert unequivocally that we are quite aware that the peace for which the Soviet Union expresses her desire, cannot be realized while that power herself remains the "hangman" of the captive nations. Then, too, this observance serves to state firmly that we are not deluded by the Soviet Union's denial of imperialistic designs for we know that living behind the Iron Curtain are millions of Ukrainians who have lost their independence, who were the first to suffer from the Soviet aggression, and who have been and are daily subjected to the tyranny of a government which operates on a single principle—gain power, by any means available.

Through this observance of the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day, we hope to shake all the people of the free West from their apathy; to jolt them from their comfortable living rooms to active support of the world's oppressed peoples. As we observe, we strongly affirm that the liberation of the captive nations depends upon the effectiveness of the support offered by the citizens of the free nations.

We observe this day, then, for many, many reasons but let us not forget that mainly this observation is a demonstration of our identification with the cause of freedom everywhere. May our words here today, and our actions today and every day be proof to the people of the Ukraine that we respect their courage, acclaim their perseverance and pray for their freedom.

Mr. PUCINSKI. Mr. President, I too wish to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLOOD] for his statement on the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence.

The long and turbulent history of the Ukrainian people has had its ups and downs, its ebbs and flows. It is full of glorious deeds and dismal woes. Through it all, however, these brave souls have shown qualities and virtues that elicit admiration and sympathy. Their firm determination to pursue the goals they have set before them, their stubborn tenacity to cling to their national traditions, and their unquenchable yearning for freedom, these fine traits entitle the Ukrainians to a distinct place in the community of free and independent nations. And today, after centuries of struggle for their national goal, and after attaining it for a very brief period of 2 years, if they find themselves unfree in their homeland, that is not through any fault of theirs. Though they number some 42 million, by themselves they could not cope with their more numerous and far more ruthless Communist oppressors. Sad as their unenviable lot has been for the past 40 years under Communist tyranny, on this 42d anniversary of their independence day let us all hope and pray for their freedom.

Mr. DANIELS. Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to pay tribute to the people of Ukraine on this day, January 22, 1960, which marks the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence.

Those brave people and their new born nation were struck down by the Soviet forces almost as soon as they had proclaimed their independence. Ukraine and several other countries which had set up their own independent republics after the revolution were seized by Russian military forces in 1919–20 and forcibly incorporated into the Soviet scheme.

Then began the long uphill struggle to again attain independence which is rightfully theirs, a struggle which was seemingly hopeless during the years, a fight for freedom of the entire Ukrainian people in the subjugated area which will only end when the united independent sovereign Ukrainian State is again reestablished as it was in 1918–19, when the freely expressed will of the Ukrainian people created the democratic and progressive national republic.

Ukrainia was among the first of the nations which Communist Russia, in her mad quest for power shortly after World War I, decided to annex and despite mass deportation, purges, destruction of her churches and industry, she resisted with all her national spirit and moral fiber and will go down in history as an outstanding symbol of courage in the struggle for freedom and independence.

Our hearts go out to those 40 million freedom-loving people who have and will continue, to resist the iron heel of communistic Russia until that glorious day when Ukraine will cease to be a captive nation and will take her place in the sun alongside of other freedom-loving countries of the world.

I also wish to salute the many thousands of Ukrainians in this country who have carried on the fight for freedom of their native land and hope with them that the day is not too far distant when we can all celebrate together their absolute separation from the yoke of communism.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence.

On January 22, 1918, in the aftermath of the World War, the Ukrainian Republic was proclaimed.

The life of the Republic, as everyone well knows, was pitifully brief. A short 2 years later it became, and remains, a captive nation. The Ukrainian people became the first victims of a menace which was to threaten freedom-loving peoples everywhere.

The Ukrainian people are the largest captive non-Russian nation in the Soviet. They have never forgotten their proud history of independence, nor have they forgotten their firm aspirations for freedom.

Although some 40 years have passed since their subjugation, they constitute a persistent source of rebellion which the Soviet cannot, despite gestapo tactics, suppress. The Soviet continues to deport Ukrainians to the Asian interior, and continues to persecute Ukrainian patriots, but somehow the spirit of the Ukrainian people survives. This bloody record is a monument both to the brutality of Soviet oppression and to the intensity of the Ukrainian nation's struggle for freedom.

It is vitally important that we take note of that struggle, and are properly cautioned, in this period of what we are told is a thaw in American-Soviet relations.

On this occasion of the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian independence, we all pay tribute to the persistent courage and fortitude of the Ukrainian people. I join with my friends of Ukrainian descent and with freedom-loving peoples everywhere, in the prayer that the aspirations of the captive Ukrainian people will some day be fulfilled.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Speaker, it is our privilege as free men to honor the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine.

Certain in the knowledge that what we say here will reach the millions of Ukrainians who have been enslaved by Moscow, and encourage them to look forward to the day of their eventual liberation.

The captive nations resolution passed by the Congress last July was heartening, but incomplete.

I believe that we should pass a stronger resolution that will convince the Communists of our unyielding opposition to any recognition, implied or otherwise, of the status quo in the lands presently under Communist domination.

No other people sacrificed so much in defense of their freedom, and that fact has not been lost on Khrushchev and his fellow conspirators. They know that the Ukrainians have never capitulated in spirit and never will.

And so Khrushchev seeks by force and blackmail and guile to have the United States agree to a "settlement" of international problems that will ignore the sovereign rights of the captive peoples of the U.S.S.R.

We shall never be a party to such a betrayal of the captive peoples and of our own conscience.

And when we speak up for the captive peoples, we mean not only those nations that were brutally conquered by Communist force and terror, but the subject peoples within the U.S.S.R. itself.

Forty-two million Ukrainians hunger for freedom, as do the Russian people themselves.

"Uneasy lies the head who wears the crown of Soviet imperialism," knowing that its military power and propaganda and intrigues can never legitimize the tyranny that is the enemy of every decent human aspiration.

On this 42d anniversary of their Independence, we congratulate the Ukrainian people for their unconquerable spirit.

Eventually, aided by the moral support of the free world and by the encouragement of mankind, it will prevail over those who presently hold them in bondage.

Mr. BECKER. Mr. Speaker, it pleases me to have this opportunity to pay tribute again this year to Ukrainia on the 42d anniversary of her independence. God bless her and her good people in her continuing fight for freedom.

Mr. CELLER. I salute the people of the Ukraine on the 42d anniversary of their independence.

We in the United States deeply sympathize with the Ukrainian people and their attempt to lift the Soviet yoke from their necks. Russia holds in thrall captive nations, all yearning to be free, and they should be free. It is only by the pervasiveness of the Russian police state that they remain enslaved. This is one of the tragedies of the age. But the Ukrainian people have the intelligence and the love of freedom which ultimately will triumph, as history has proven again and again.

The free world awaits the day when we can salute the Ukraine as a free and independent sovereign nation.

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago the people of the Ukraine achieved what we of the United States obtained 184 years ago—independence and freedom. Tragically, however, the prize which they had sought for centuries was cruelly stolen from them after 2 years of cherished possession, by the Russian Communists who even today still impose their oppressive domination upon these freedom-loving people.

Nearly 40 million Ukrainians, bearing a proud European ancestry, are being subjugated by a Russian dictatorship the like of which the modern world has not seen. The Kremlin, neither knowing nor caring about the background of these oppressed people is carrying on where the czars left off in an attempt to stamp out all national feelings of these brave people—carrying on with increased terrorism that tyrannical yoke. It has done all in its power to eradicate the national ideals that survived centuries of czarist suppression, and it will find no greater success than its predecessors. The brave Ukrainians who have suffered but withstood the oppression of the Communists longer than any people will continue to keep alive within themselves the spirit of independence.

Sadly they are unable to celebrate or even mention this day in their history because of the Communist denial of free speech on the part of any people dominated by them. It is altogether fitting, therefore, that we Americans who share their sentiments of freedom and independence observe this anniversary by proclaiming our recognition of their plight and by voicing the hope that one day they will again be able to live as free human beings under a government in which they have a full share. While enjoying our own freedoms we cannot be complacent and blind ourselves to the restraint imposed by force upon others who aspire to the same kind of independence. Let our American compatriots of Ukrainian ancestry and their families and friends who are still enslaved know that we are conscious of their predicament and that we extend to them our heartfelt hope that they will again secure the blessings of liberty.

Mr. ANFUSO. Mr. Speaker, freedom-loving people everywhere will pause today to observe the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine, a nation of 42 million people which remains captive and enslaved under communism.

When we adopted the resolution on Captive Nations Week in July 1959, we struck a hard blow against communism which reverberated throughout the world and found a sympathetic chord in the hearts of many people. All of us recall the violent reaction of the Soviet leaders to this resolution and its effectiveness in molding public opinion. If anything, it showed the uneasiness of the Kremlin concerning its subjugation and domination of captive peoples and lands.

The Ukrainian people is one of the earliest victims of Communist imperialism. Despite their long captivity extending over a period of four decades, the people of the Ukraine do not consider themselves as Russians or as a part of the so-called Soviet nation. They will continue to cling to hopes of freedom and independence of the Ukraine, no matter how long or difficult the road may be.

It remains for us in the free world to keep those hopes alive and vibrant, to show them our sympathetic understanding of their plight, to encourage them not to lose faith in God and in humanity.

On this sad anniversary, we in the United States again declare our warm friendship for the Ukrainian people and our solidarity with their aims and aspirations for the early liberation of their tormented people and their ravaged country. We shall always support their cause for a free and independent Ukraine, and we join them in prayer on this day that their goal will soon be realized.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Speaker, as a Nation dedicated to the tenet that man is a creature of God born to live in freedom, we feel a deep sense of sorrow for the people of the Ukraine on this eve of the 42d anniversary of their independence. It is not without hope that we regard their subjugation. Russian reaction to our Captive Nations resolution has imprinted in the open book of world understanding a dramatic picture of totalitarian fear for the principles expressed in that manifesto. The clique of conquerors in the Kremlin may full well feel fear in the face of these ideals, for like men everywhere the Soviet masters are not immune from conceptions of the rights of man. For centuries have the Russians not tried but failed to strip the Ukraine of its national ideals? And can they help but recall that the Goliath of physical power was no match for the David of human principles? It is with this in mind that we paid tribute to the captive peoples with our resolution and that we will tomorrow salute the people of the Ukraine.

Mr. LIBONATI. Mr. Speaker, again we celebrate the anniversary, this the 42d, of Ukrainian national independence. And yet, it would be more realistic to say that it is a symbol that calls to our attention a period of lamentation and mourning for its enshackled and captive people.

In America, where we enjoy all of the God-given freedoms, it is important that we keep alive, by open discussion, the cause of Ukrainian independence. It is their only hope—that we live with them in the memory of their lost freedoms, so that they will keep alive the fires of freedom and continue the struggle to recapture the democratic fundamental principles of liberty.

The flag of azure blue and yellow gold is unfurled all over our land today, by the pioneers of Ukrainian ancestry who contributed so much to the economy and culture of our Nation. It is a reminder of the continuing protest to the American people of the enslavement of the Ukrainian people.

It is becoming a drudge on the honesty of purpose of our foreign policy to accept the servitude of the Ukrainian people without doing something to restore to them their historic claim of freedom as an independent nation in a free world.

We must, in our foreign policy, bring about the dissolution of colonial domination imposed by the Soviet Union over the freedom-loving captured nations of the world. There can be no permanent peace among the nations of the world without freedom.

The United States of America, the youngest of the great nations of the world, enjoying spiritual and economic freedom, must keep other nations free, in order to safeguard its own existence and the great democratic institutions protecting its way of life.

We owe it to the Ukrainian people—they must be free.

Mr. FARBSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, today is the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day, the day of liberation and freedom for which the Ukrainians had worked and struggled for more than 250 years. By the overthrow of Czarist Russia's autocracy they made themselves free and on January 22, 1918, they proclaimed their national independence. For the Ukrainians that event marked the beginning of a new and hopeful era, and they did not realize at the time that the freedom which they had earned was to be taken away from them in a short time. After 2 more years, once more they were swamped by Soviet tyranny.

Unfortunately that has been their unhappy and unenviable lot for almost 40 years. During those four decades they have been suffering under the most oppressive of modern tyrannies. But the brave and stouthearted Ukrainians are carrying on their struggle for freedom, and even under desperate circumstances, they still cling firmly to their unquenchable desire to be free and independent. On this 42d anniversary of their independence day I ardently hope that eventually their desire for freedom will be fulfilled.

Mr. O'HARA of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago the Ukrainian people regained their sovereign right in their historic homeland and proclaimed their independence. The democratic republic that they established was recognized by many sovereign states. The years of 1918–20 were years of great expectations and boundless joy. The Ukrainians were on the road of rebuilding their war-torn country when it was overrun by Russia's Communist troops, and eventually annexed to the Soviet Union's totalitarian empire.

The freedom and independence which the Ukrainians had cherished for more than 250 years thus lasted, after its attainment, for only 2½ years. But the pleasant and happy memories of that short period still linger on with all freedom-loving Ukrainians. On the 42d anniversary of their independence day, I join with my colleagues in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States in tribute and in pledge. The tribute is to a great and brave people, to a land rich and fertile. The pledge is to these people and to this land that always will the righteous cause of a free and independent Ukraine be with us a sacred cause. The day is not far removed, Mr. Speaker, when freedom again will come to the Ukraine, and to the hastening of that day we give our prayers and rededicate our efforts.

In the district that I have the honor to represent are many fine men and women of Ukrainian birth or descent. They are a vital part of the fabric of our district. They have made a tremendous contribution to good and patriotic citizenry in our country in every city and in every State. On an anniversary day that means so much to our fellow Americans of Ukrainian birth or descent, we have an obligation to them, to ourselves, and to the cause of freedom of letting them know that never will we fail them, never will our spirits flag, or our efforts cease until again the Republic of the Ukraine, free and independent, a guardian of liberty and of human dignity, stands proudly among the sovereign nations of the free world.

Mr. ADDONIZIO. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting that all freedom-loving people observe the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine and pay tribute to the resourcefulness and strength of the Ukrainian people. On this memorable occasion we salute the imprisoned millions of the Ukraine and we pray that they will be liberated from the Soviet yoke and regain their rightful position in the family of free nations.

It is appalling that the hardworking and industrious Ukrainians have been so cruelly denied the elemental privileges and amenities of life which should be the birthright of all human beings. It is tragic that, after centuries of suppression by the autocratic czars, the gallant Ukrainians were able to enjoy their national independence for only a few brief years. It was a thrilling event when on January 22, 1918, Ukrainian patriots proclaimed their national independence. Today we mark the anniversary of that declaration of freedom and we mourn that the Ukrainian Republic lasted only 2 brief years. Since 1920 the nation has been under the totalitarian dictatorship of the Kremlin.

It is truly inspiring that the long, dark years of oppression have failed to extinguish the spirit of freedom and independence in these valiant people. Their love of liberty has been strengthened by centuries of struggle and they have maintained their national consciousness even though their beautiful land is now a prison house. The idea of freedom still burns brightly in the minds and hearts of these oppressed people, and they are sustained by faith in their eventual liberation. Let us pledge anew our continued sympathy and support to these captive people and let us hope with them that on future anniversary occasions they will be closer to attaining their noble national goal.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I join my many colleagues in observance of the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine on January 22. One of the reasons for the unfortunate circumstances under which the brave Ukrainians find themselves today is a lack of appreciation throughout the world of the significance of Ukrainian history and its opposition to Russian Soviet rule.

The Ukrainians are a devout Christian people with a long record of opposition to Communist domination. Forty-two years ago, the people of the Ukraine achieved a long desired goal of independence, but a few years later found it wrested from them by treacherous Communist agents.

Despite the phony statements of Russian Dictator Khrushchev, Ukraine is not a free country of free people but is actually part of the Soviet slave empire, where unrelenting underground activity has been carried on against the Soviet domination.

Mr. Speaker, here in the United States, Americans of Ukrainian extraction work hard to remind all of us of the unfortunate conditions in the land of their forefathers and keep alive the hope that the yoke of communism will some day be removed and that the Ukraine nation will permanently take its place among the free nations of the world. It is our fervent hope that their dreams of Ukrainian nationalism be realized.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, during most of modern times the Ukraine has been a land of misery and misfortune. For almost 300 years, from the middle of the 17th century down to our own times, Ukrainians have not known freedom in their historic homeland. Only for a brief period, in 1918 to 1920, did they enjoy freedom. Then they proclaimed their national independence, and established their own free, democratic republic. But that period lasted only for 2 years. Toward the end of 1920 the Ukraine was invaded by the Red army; the Ukrainians were overpowered by their ruthless and inveterate adversaries, the country was overrun and occupied, and its inhabitants subjected to Communist tyranny. The democratic Ukrainian Republic was no more, and unhappy Ukrainians were treacherously robbed of their freedom.

For almost four decades some 42 million Ukrainians have been suffering under the worst of tyrannies. But they have not given up their ideals and still treasure personal and national freedom as fervently as ever. On this 42d anniversary of their independence day let us hope they will soon regain their cherished freedom and peace.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, the First World War was hailed as a war for democracy and freedom, and the last war is often regarded as one of frustration and dismay. That may not be the way many of us would like to think of these two World Wars, but it must be clear to us why the Ukrainians remember those deadly events only in terms of their freedom and of their servitude under Communist tyranny. The First World War freed them from the clutches of the czarist Russian regime. The national freedom for which they had been struggling continuously for more than 250 years was theirs in 1918. For a little more than 2 years they lived in freedom and insofar as possible under those war-torn conditions, they enjoyed it to the full. But late in 1920, it was snatched away from them by the heartless Russian Communists, and they have not known it ever since.

Throughout the course of the interwar decades the Ukrainians endured the almost unbearable yoke of Communist tyrants. Then in the course of the last war they raised their hopes, and often their voices, for freedom, thinking and hoping that they would have it as their reward at the conclusion of that war. Today we know too well of their disappointment and despair, of their frustration and frightful experience. For almost 40 years they have been suffering under inflexible and ruthless Communist tyranny. On the observance of their independence day let us renew our determination to protect freedom everywhere so that the future may once again bring the realization of freedom to the Ukrainian people.

Mr. FRIEDEL. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. Unfortunately, however, more than 40 million Ukrainians are virtual captives of the cruel, inhuman, and atheistic Russians. We, as freedom-loving Americans, are deeply conscious of the terrible plight of the brave and wonderful Ukrainian people and their struggle for liberty and independence, which strikes a responsive chord in our hearts.

I particularly wish to call to the attention of my colleagues in the Congress that these millions of Ukrainians constitute the largest captive nation behind the Iron Curtain. These millions of our fellow human beings, now under the ruthless heel of their Communist taskmasters, cry out in agony against their oppressors. May I say to them that their great sacrifices, their peerless valor, their legitimate aspirations, and their cries for liberty, justice, and freedom do not go unnoticed nor fall upon deaf ears.

We Americans say to you: Do not despair, keep up your fighting spirit against the unrelenting tyranny of Communist totalitarianism, for we join with you in your cherished hopes and fervent prayers that, in the not too distant future, your beautiful land will become a free and independent nation.

Mr. HOSMER. Mr. Speaker, commemorating today the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine not only serves as a reminder to us of the continuous hope for freedom of 42 million Ukrainians in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain but also affords us the opportunity to again urge restoration of freedom to all captive nations.

I join my colleagues in paying tribute to the Ukrainian people throughout the world who are dedicated to the belief that freedom is the right of all nations. It remains for us of the free world to help them sustain their faith in God and humanity, in their own survival, and in their inevitable freedom. Words of encouragement and sympathetic expressions of understanding of their plight will mean a great deal to these people in their dark hours of desperation.

We must remain true to the cause for which these people continue to fight. We also must work diligently in support of freedom everywhere so all freedom-loving people of the captive nations may continue to hope fervently that they may soon enjoy the God-given right of independence with justice which should be the national heritage of all mankind everywhere.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian people regained their freedom by proclaiming their independence and by establishing the Ukrainian Republic. That act, the founding of the democratic Ukrainian Republic, was the culmination, the happy climax, of a long struggle that had its beginning in the mid-17th century when the Ukrainians were brought under the autocratic Russian regime. It is one of the happiest climaxes in the modern history of nations fighting for their freedom, and as such constitutes the brightest page in the history of the Ukrainian people. But the happy period which followed the establishment of the Ukrainian Republic did not last long, for the forces of destruction and death, the aggressive Communist Red army troops, were on the march. Late in 1920 they invaded the Ukraine, overran it, treacherously put an end to freedom there, and brought the Ukrainian people under the oppressive Communist totalitarian regime. And for all these years, for almost four decades, they have been held down by their heartless overlords in their historic homeland.

The peoples subjected to the Soviet Union's totalitarian tyranny have suffered for decades, but it is no exaggeration to say that no people, perhaps at no time, have suffered for so long and have sacrificed so much in material wealth and in terms of human life, as have the Ukrainian people under the unspeakable Communist totalitarian dictatorship. The number of those who died because of the manmade, Stalin-administered starvation campaign, is counted in the millions; and many more millions lost their lives in prison camps and in forced labor camps in some forbidding parts of distant Siberia. Thus the price the Ukrainian people have paid for their survival, for their miserable existence, has been frightfully high.

Still, I am happy to say that these brave people have not ceased fighting their oppressors. They still carry on their struggle, ceaselessly and systematically, with all the means at their disposal, in the hope that eventually their righteous cause, the cause of freedom and independence, will win out. On the observance of the 42d anniversary of their Independence Day my best wishes go to these dauntless and courageous souls.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, the fair and fertile Ukraine has been the land of the unfortunate and unhappy for centuries. In the course of their modern and recent history the Ukrainian people have suffered under many cruel, autocratic, and oppressive regimes, and their present-day Communist oppressors have been most cruel toward them. Having robbed the Ukrainians of their newly regained freedom, these Communists, godless agents of the Kremlin, have succeeded in enslaving the Ukraine's 42 million innocent and helpless inhabitants. For almost 40 years these people have been held down by the brute force of totalitarian dictatorship. But under unheard-of hardships and privations, and under indescribable misery, their spirit of freedom is not broken, and they still have their fervent desire for freedom. I have no doubt that eventually they will have their reward. On this 42d anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day I extend my wholehearted sympathy to, and best wishes for, these stouthearted people.

Mr. FALLON. Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people have waged an uphill fight for their right to freedom and independence. They finally attained their goal 42 years ago by proclaiming, on January 22, 1918, the establishment of the Ukrainian Republic in their historic homeland. Though that budding and promising Republic did not last long and was ruthlessly shattered by Communist forces of destruction 40 years ago, and though since then the Ukrainian people have been subject to the most intolerable of tyrannies in their homeland, still they have not given up hope for their eventual liberation from the clutches of Communist rule. On this 42d anniversary of their independence day I gladly join all Ukrainian Americans and voice the hope that the Ukraine will gain its rightful place among independent and sovereign countries.

Mr. FORAND. Mr. Speaker, on January 22 millions of Ukrainians, both here and abroad, observed the 42d anniversary of the Ukrainian National Republic, a nation which was established in the latter days of World War I. This status was short lived; only a few short years later they were absorbed by the Communist rulers of the Soviet Union.

There is a Soviet fiction that the Ukraine today is a free Republic, with all the attributes of sovereignty including a diplomatic service, and that she remains in the Soviet system as a matter of choice and free will. This is utterly false. More than 40 million people in the Ukraine share the common desire of the captive and satellite peoples of Eastern Europe for freedom and self-determination.

The history of the Ukrainian people, as we know, reflects the centuries-long struggle of man to attain individual freedom. Three hundred years ago, the Ukraine was an independent state, rich in its culture and thriving in its commerce. Today, despite its enslavement, it is the second largest of the Soviet Republics and the richest in agriculture. Through the intervening years, the Ukrainian people have become familiar with the workings of Russian tyranny and oppression, under which they have suffered greatly.

For 300 years the Ukraine has been submerged in the Russian continent. Only once in the course of three centuries has it had the opportunity to attain the goal as a free republic. That was on January 22, 42 years ago, the day on which the Ukrainian Republic came into existence. That memorable and historic day has become a landmark in modern Ukrainian history, and remains as the brightest spot in the struggle of its people for their national independence and freedom. Since then January 22 has been celebrated annually as a national holiday.

Today, I sincerely hope that the remarks uttered on the floor will be of some small comfort to those millions of captive Europeans. I have faith that the Ukraine, and, indeed, all of the captive nations of Europe and Asia, will once again be free. If history has proved anything, it is that no despot, however cruel, can extinguish the yearning for liberty that dwells in the hearts of men.

This yearning for freedom must be kept alive in our hearts as well as theirs. We can never forget that the infringement of personal liberty in any part of this world constitutes a threat to freedom everywhere. On this day, when we reverently celebrate with Ukrainians the 42d anniversary of the founding of the last Republic, we should reconsecrate ourselves to the spirit to which that Republic—and our own—was born.

Mr. BUCKLEY. Mr. Speaker, January 22 is the date that marks the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine. It is a tragic fact, however, that this independence was a short-lived one and that in 1920 the Red Communist army ruthlessly overran and crushed the Ukraine.

Since that date the 42 million Ukrainians have been living in enforced captivity under the heels of their Soviet oppressors. It is indeed sad that in this day and age when the world is moving slowly but steadily toward equal rights for all, that these proud and independent people are still forced to languish under the thumb of their Communist masters. They have been subject to Soviet control longer than any other minority in the Soviet Union. Their people have died by the millions in slave labor camps, in prisons, and in the vast expanses of the Siberian wilderness.

Ever since they assumed control, the Soviet regime has attempted every means possible to crush the spirit of the Ukrainian people. It is a tribute to the spirit of these people that today their love for freedom and liberty shines as brightly as ever.

I am honored to join today in saluting these courageous people and in the spirit of the Captive Nations Week resolution of last July, I join in the fervent prayer that one day soon the liberty-loving Ukrainian people will indeed be properly able to celebrate their national independence day in their own free country.

Mr. DADDARIO. Mr. Speaker, whenever freedom is born anywhere on this earth, it should be the pride of freemen to celebrate it. Freedom, like human life, is a precious thing. When it is first born, it must be nourished and protected against its enemies, the harsh realities of power or climate and disease. Often this protection is not enough and the spark of life is extinguished.

Such a tragedy occurred 42 years ago in the Ukraine. When the Czarist empire was in the throes of revolution as World War I ended, the people of the Ukraine established a Republic, in the right of all men created equal to choose their own form of government. The proclamation of an independent, free, and sovereign state was issued by the Rada on January 22, 1918.

While these formalities were in process of expressing the hopes and aspirations of the Ukrainian people, Soviet Communist forces were already in the process of destroying the efforts of democratic government, as they had betrayed the hopes of the people of Moscow and St. Petersburg. In December 1917, the Russians had broken with the Ukrainian Government and set up a puppet People's Republic. The pattern the world has seen so often since and has noticed repeatedly since the end of World War II was followed in Moscow's support to its henchmen, and the Ukrainian People's Republic in the principle of self-determination.

Then followed months of disorganized warfare. Hunger, typhus, and other diseases swept the Ukraine. Eventually the Communists choked out this young nation and, by 1920, the Communists had subdued the people.

Despite the long years since the Soviet Ukraine was proclaimed, those who cherish liberty have kept alive the memories and liberties that were nurtured for such a short time on Ukrainian soil. Many Americans of Ukrainian descent look to the day when the Ukraine will again be free to control its own destiny. It is fitting that all Americans pause this week to mourn those who have been the victims of oppression and tyranny.

We honor not only the Ukrainian people who are held prisoners in their own homeland, but also those who have sought new lives in new lands, and who actively contribute to the cultural growth of their adopted homes. It is inspiring to witness how these people struggle against the superior might of Communist Russia in a valiant attempt to preserve their national indentity.

The tragedy of that first abortive attempt to establish a sovereign Ukrainian National Republic is past and familiar history, but it shall never be forgotten. Its commemoration persists as the symbol of the indefatigable spirit of all freedom-loving peoples. The Soviet fiction that the Ukraine is today a free republic is a vain and ludicrous attempt to deceive the world.

The American people share the dream that one day the Ukraine will, in fact, be free and independent. Until that day we must encourage, by words and deeds, the ambitions of these valiant people.

Mr. MULTER. Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people have fought valiantly for their unquestioned right to freedom and independence. Their devotion to such a noble and righteous cause is recognized by the whole free world, and perhaps that is one reason why all free peoples, particularly the people of this country, feel so intensely about the sad fate of the Ukrainians in their homeland.

For centuries these sturdy and stouthearted people have struggled, often against forbidding and insurmountable odds, for their freedom. In 1918 they attained their long-cherished national goal: they proclaimed their national independence on January 22, 42 years ago. Then for a brief period of about 2½ years they were free. But the forces of oppression and destruction were lurking around them even then; the bloodthirsty troops of the Red army were on the march. Late in 1920 they invaded the Ukraine, occupied it, and put an end to all forms of freedom there. During almost 40 years of misery and suffering some 42 million Ukrainians have been oppressed and enslaved under Communist totalitarian tyranny.

Today, on the observance of Ukrainian Independence Day, the peoples of the free world, and of course we in this country, rededicate ourselves to the responsibilities that are ours as free people.

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago the centuries-old hopes and aspirations of the Ukrainian people were realized, and their national independence had become an accomplished fact. They had proclaimed the establishment of the Ukrainian Republic on January 22, 1918, and at last, by asserting their inalienable right of self-determination, they had become masters of their fate. Unfortunately that was for a very brief period only, for by the end of 1920 their Republic was no more. They were robbed of their freedom and brought under the heavy heels of Soviet Russia's Communist totalitarianism.

Today, after almost 40 years, some 42 million helpless, innocent, but stouthearted and liberty-loving Ukrainians are suffering under Communist tyranny in their beloved homeland. On the celebration of the 42d anniversary of their Independence Day, I wish to assure them that they have millions of cordial and sympathetic friends in the free world, and, of course, in this country, who hope and pray for their freedom.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, we Americans have always cherished our freedom and have demonstrated on many occasions that we are even prepared, if necessary, to die for that freedom. Because we cherish freedom so much for ourselves we also deeply respect the desire of other peoples to be free, and as a nation we have long since established it as one of our fundamental principles that we are always prepared to support and to defend other countries which are fighting for their freedom.

Today, January 22, commemorates the anniversary of the independence of the Republic of the Ukraine, which was created on January 22, 1918, exactly 42 years ago. We know the long struggle which the Ukrainian people put in to win this freedom and to lift from their backs the yoke of Czarist Russian oppression. Time and again the Ukrainian people fought for their independence; and 42 years ago today they believed they had finally achieved it.

Alas, that freedom proved to be all too short lived. In the space of a little more than 2 years the Ukrainian people were once again subjected to tyranny and despotism at the hands of their new Communist oppressors.

However, Mr. Speaker, the fight for freedom on the part of those who long for it and who have once tasted it never dies out. Just as we in this country must forever remain vigilant and strong in order to preserve the freedom which we have succeeded in winning, so the people of the Ukraine have continued over these long years to keep alive in their hearts and minds the ultimate objective of freedom to which they are so strongly committed.

Today all Americans, I know, join with the 42 million Ukrainians who are still under the domination of Communist tyrants, as well as with thousands of Ukrainian Americans, in not only commemorating this anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day, but in reaffirming our conviction that as Americans we stand beside these people in their fight for lasting independence and again pledge them our support, with the renewed hope that the day will not be far off when this freedom will truly be achieved.

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago, on January 22, 1918, the Ukrainian nation was born and was welcomed by all freedom-loving people as an independent state. Sadly, the hope that this young Republic would enjoy a prosperous future was shattered when, 2 years after celebrating its birth, the Ukrainian National Republic was destroyed and its people were subjugated by Communist Russia.

It is fitting that we in America take time to reaffirm our spiritual affinity for the brave souls who have kept the hope of Ukrainian freedom alive. It is particularly appropriate that we join with our Ukrainian friends in saluting the memory of Stepan Bandera, leader of the Ukrainian Nationalist Organization who was killed by Communist agents in October of last year. A devoted patriot, Stepan Bandera fought both Nazi and Communist tyranny as these successive waves of oppression washed over his beloved homeland. After the war with Nazi Germany ended, he brought leadership and funds to partisan armies which gallantly fought to carve a free Ukraine out of the confusion at war's end. It was Nikita Khrushchev who was assigned by Stalin to suppress the embattled Ukrainians and, in 1949, he finally succeeded. But Stepan Bandera never abandoned his lifelong dream of an independent Ukrainian state. He continued until his death to devote his whole energy and strength to the cause of liberation for his country and her people.

The fate of the Ukrainian Republic, the subsequent enslavement of the Ukrainian people, and the murder of their leaders should serve as a tragic warning to any nation that would look to Soviet Moscow for friendship. Similarly, the unrelenting struggle of 40 million Ukrainians against Russian domination stands as proof, once again, that the spirit of freedom cannot die even in those areas which have been under the Communist head for more than a generation. It is my sincere hope that the flame of freedom which continues to glow in the hearts of the Ukrainian people shall light a new Ukrainian Independence Day in the not too distant future.

Mr. McDONOUGH. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine—independence which was hailed by the Ukrainian people as final deliverance from oppressive and cruel Russian domination.

For 300 years the people of Ukraine have steadfastly struggled against tyrannical enslavement. With a limitless love for their homeland, a burning desire for freedom and political independence, and unswerving faith in the ultimate achievement of their goal regardless of how great the sacrifice to attain it, the Ukrainian people have relentlessly sought to end domination of Ukraine by foreign oppressors and to establish their nation as a free and independent state.

The first opportunity to realize their dream of independence came to the people of Ukraine in 1918 at the close of World War I, and on January 22, 1918, Ukrainian leaders proclaimed their national independence.

This marked the formal and official restoration of the independence of the Ukrainian nation.

Freedom, however, could be held only for a brief span of 2 years by the people of Ukraine, and in 1920 Ukraine was attacked by the Russian Communist forces, overrun by the Red army in a fierce and bloody struggle, and incorporated against the will of the Ukrainian people into the Soviet Union.

But the hard-working, industrious, and courageous people of Ukraine have not accepted Russian domination, and the desire for freedom burns bright in their hearts.

The people of the United States join with the people of Ukraine this day and with those of Ukrainian descent in the United States and throughout the world in prayer on this anniversary of the independence of Ukraine for the ultimate liberation of Ukraine from Soviet enslavement.

Forty-two million Ukrainians are held in bondage in the largest captive non-Russian nation in the U.S.S.R. and behind the Iron Curtain. The plight of these people is a matter of grave concern to the people of the United States who are dedicated to the principle of individual liberty and national freedom, and to the people of all the nations of the free world.

On this 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine, it is our sincere hope that the day of liberation for the Ukrainian people may be close at hand, and that the independence of Ukraine may be reestablished.

Mr. PHILBIN. Mr. Speaker, very frequently throughout the years this House is called upon to observe the anniversary of independence or to celebrate the birthday of the Government of some great people now behind the Iron Curtain.

On Friday, January 22, it will be the 42d anniversary of the independence of Ukraine. It is a great nation of 42 million people destined to be free by the Almighty, earnestly and ardently desiring freedom in its heart, prepared to protect and foster democratic institutions and freedom of the individual, and yet violently dragged behind the Iron Curtain, its millions of people compelled to live under the oppressive heel of a godless, military dictatorship.

Whatever may be said in the high councils of state, or by those who like smaller nations to be merely pawns in a great international game, the plight of Ukraine, like that of many other nations who have had their liberties cruelly suppressed by the Soviet, must be of greatest concern to every believer in the free way of life.

This great nation, born in freedom, consecrated time and time again by the blood of its sons shed to preserve that freedom, could never under any circumstances, acknowledge that denial of freedom to Ukraine or any other nation desiring it, could be morally, ethically, or politically justified.

The power and terror of modern missilry may deter those who might be disposed to make war. But the Marxist conspiracy, so long as it operates under the principles upon which it is established, and the program which it has set out to follow, insures nothing but an indefinite, uneasy, restless peace.

The theory behind this tactic is that if it is continued long enough and persistently enough, universally enough, that, in time, the forces of democracy will weaken from economic inanition or sheer moral and physical collapse and leave the world to communism. This is one of the tragic fallacies of Marxism.

I could never bring myself to believe that the human race or at least that portion of it committed to free institutions could ever fall so low in moral strength and courage as to surrender the great free heritage which has been responsible for a western civilization based on freedom and for history's most fabulous progress.

Is the fiber of the American people being weakened? Is their morale being undermined by propaganda, by promises of an easy life? I do not believe so. I think that as long as this world lasts there will be Americans—and they will constitute a great majority—who will be willing to fight and die, if necessary, to preserve the fountainhead, principles, and shrines of human liberty that exist here in this great country of ours.

But we must be resolute; we must be determined; we must be more tough-minded in our attitude than ever before. If we follow the tempting pathway of appeasement, we will be lost forever and our great Nation will follow the same course as other great nations and majestic powers of world history which allowed strength, plenty, and abundance to dull their morale and weaken their purpose to preserve their government.

A great scholar wrote me recently and I shall never forget what he said. It is worth repeating here. "I am not worried about the courage of the American people," he said. "I feel that our country's chief danger lies in its own careless heart." This great thinker was right; we cannot afford to be careless in our heart about our freedom. Certainly we must have the courage, come what may, to defend it.

Let us, therefore, pledge to the people of Ukraine, and other subject peoples held captive in cruel bondage, our sincere sympathy for their plight and our desire and intention to do everything in our power to open again for them the pathway to freedom and justice.

Mr. MERROW. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 1918, 42 years ago, the Ukrainians established their independence. This day marks a great historic event and although the Ukrainians were able to maintain their national independence for only a short period of time, it is fervently hoped that the day will come when they will regain their freedom. It is fitting that we pause on the 42d anniversary of Ukrainian Independence Day to observe this great event.

We extend our best wishes to the people of Ukrainia and express the hope that the time will come when they will regain their independence.

Happy and rare is the lot of those nations that can enjoy their national independence for a long unbroken period of time, and still happier are those who did not have to struggle against forbidding odds for its attainment. The Ukrainians, one of the largest ethnic groups in eastern Europe, and among the most sturdy and stouthearted fighters for liberty and freedom, have not been fortunate in this respect. Centuries ago they lost their national independence. They regained it in 1918, only to lose it again in 1920.

For the 42 million Ukrainians who have been suffering under Soviet totalitarian dictatorship for 40 years, and who still long for their freedom, the 2-year happy, but short, period of liberty was the most memorable and unforgettable years in their modern history, for then they enjoyed their freedom in their homeland. Today those of their kinsmen who are fortunate enough to live in the free world celebrate their 42d Independence Day. I am glad to join Ukrainian Americans in the commemoration of this historic and memorable anniversary.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Speaker, the history of the people of Ukraine is a long record of a determined struggle for freedom which has won the respect and admiration of liberty loving people in all parts of the world.

After the collapse of the Russian Empire in 1917, these people seized their chance to form a national republic. The Bolsheviks in Ukraine were disarmed, and as a consequence of these two acts the Bolshevik government declared war. They set up a puppet government in Kharkiv which did not in any way represent the Ukrainian people, and proceeded to invade their country under the leadership of a Russian in command of a Russian Army. By force of arms as well as the activity of the fifth column, the people of Ukraine were forced to accept Soviet rule.

The Ukraine is still known as the granary of Europe and it contributes more to the Soviet empire than any other country behind the Iron Curtain. Its agricultural production is one of the highest in the world, even though handicapped by inefficient Soviet methods, and it is one of Europe's richest and most highly developed industrial countries. Its coal and metals production amounts to more than 80 percent of the entire Russian output. In addition, it has the best railway system in the U.S.S.R., important oil wells, hydroelectric plants, and is heavily industrialized. The people of Ukraine are thrifty, hard working and highly individualistic, and they have kept up a long and determined resistance to the forced collectivism of the Red regime.

Ukraine has a population of over 40 million people, and is the largest non-Russian country dominated by the Soviets. Its value and importance as a production center cannot be overemphasized, and the spirit of its people in their continuing fight for liberty cannot be too much praised and admired. It stands as one of our most important and natural allies in the eventual destruction of Soviet imperialism. Its place as a sovereign and equal partner in the mutual construction of free Europe must be assured if the foundation of permanent peace among freedom loving nations is to be impregnable.

The indomitable will of the Ukrainian people to achieve national freedom still survives in undiminished strength, despite the toll of the millions of lives taken by the Russians in purges, mass murders, and manmade famines. Its rich traditions and culture, centuries old, are still alive and continuing to grow, regardless of the attempted destruction of its religion, science, and learning by its Soviet rulers.

Let us do all we can to aid these valiant people in their efforts to throw off the scourge of the Russian regime and its attempts to force them into communism. The strength and power of their unbending determination and passion to become a sovereign, free, and independent nation, deserves all the help and encouragement we can give them.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, today many hundreds of millions of people are suffering under Communist totalitarian dictatorship. In the Soviet Union alone there are more than 200 million who are forced to endure the almost unbearable yoke of the Kremlin tyranny. And among these unfortunate millions the Ukrainians have borne the brunt of Russian communism. These brave and patriotic Ukrainians have known freedom for only a very short time during the last 300-odd years of their history. That was during the years 1918–20.

Before the end of the First World War the czarist autocracy collapsed in Russia, and this startling event afforded the opportunity for the Ukrainians to regain their freedom. They seized upon the occasion and proclaimed their national independence on January 22, 1918. Unfortunately for the Ukrainians, and for their friends everywhere, that independence lasted for only a short time.

In 1920 the country was attacked by the Red Army, was overrun, and the independent Ukraine passed into the pages of history books. Soon the country was incorporated into the Soviet Union, and to this date it remains chained to that union.

There in their homeland 42 million sturdy and stouthearted Ukrainians lead a miserable life. Like prisoners held behind the veritable Iron Curtain, they are deprived of all forms of freedom, and cannot even celebrate their independence day.

We of the free world, and in this great Republic, in celebrating the 42d anniversary of that memorable event, hope and pray for their deliverance from Communist totalitarian tyranny.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, 42 years ago this week the Ukrainian people gained their freedom by proclaiming their independence for the first time after centuries of oppression and foreign domination. This freedom, unfortunately, did not last and does not exist today. We commemorate this anniversary with sadness and sympathy for the plight of those millions of Ukrainian people who today are the victims of Communist expansion and aggression.

It is difficult for us in the United States to realize what this means and to conceive the sufferings the Ukrainian people have endured since their country was so brutally overrun in 1920 by the Red army.

This anniversary serves as a reminder of the fateful enslavement of 40 million Ukrainians, who have kept alive a spirit of freedom and have sustained faith in eventual liberation. The desire for freedom of these and other peoples suppressed by communism cannot be ignored and I have faith that the day will come when they will once again become free and independent. We must try to encourage them to continue their efforts and hopes toward that day. They deserve our encouragement, and it is my hope that the expressions of sympathy on the part of Members of the U.S. Congress this week will serve to strengthen their courage and kindle their hopes.

Mr. PIRNIE. Mr. Speaker, on January 22, 42 years ago, the people of the Ukraine established the free and independent Ukrainian National Republic. Since that time there has been little opportunity for rejoicing over the fact of national determination for the despotic rule of the Kremlin has destroyed all semblance of independence.

However, this oppressive yoke of Soviet tyranny has not destroyed the will to be free nor suppressed the ancient yearnings for independence of the Ukrainian people. Bloody massacres, yearly purges, and deportations to Siberia lend mute testimony to the manner in which the Soviets have attempted to stamp out this ferment of freedom.

All people who prize liberty are aware of the sacrifices which make it possible and keep it intact. The Ukrainians, however, in their heartland or wherever in the world they may reside, have lost none of this awareness. The more hopeless their cause has been, the more fiercely determined they have become to restore freedom to their homeland. Their love of liberty for all men has led them to fight for this Nation and for other nations who have sought freedom. Their fight has been continuous and unrelenting. In East Germany, in the slave-labor camps of Siberia and central Asia, Ukrainians joined other non-Russian patriots in attempting to rid themselves of the Communist yoke. Most recently Ukrainian men of the Red army sided with the valiant Hungarians in Budapest to write one of freedom's most glorious chapters.

This proud land, an independent and free state from the 9th to the 14th century and again from the middle of the 17th century to late in the 18th century, has writhed under the oppressor for more than 300 years. Its extensive natural resources have made the Ukraine coveted by its neighbors, and its people have been forced to exploit the fertility of their land to feed their masters. The story of the Ukraine is the first chapter in the long history of Soviet enslavement of free nations.

Although the requirements of a realistic foreign policy prevent the United States from dispatching military forces to drive the Red oppressors from the Ukraine, we can continue to do much to remind these people that their plight is not forgotten. In so doing we can hope, pray, and plan for the day when the Ukrainian people will be free. We salute a people whose representatives have contributed greatly to American life.

Mr. HOLLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Ukrainian people have always fought for their right to be a free and independent nation. Through the many and long struggles which began more than 300 years ago, they have succeeded in keeping alive their spiritual resiliency, their unquenchable desire for freedom. Without ceaseless and sustained work, without the cheerful willingness of the Ukrainian people to sacrifice their all, they could not have attained their national independence in 1918. Though they lost their well deserved and hard earned independence 2 years later, and though since then, for almost 40 years, they have been suffering under the most cruel tyranny in existence today, yet the lesson which they have learned in the school of adversity is not forgotten. Today they are struggling just as fearlessly and confidently as did their forebears generations ago for their freedom and independence. On this 42d anniversary of the Ukrainian Independence Day I wish them all a lightening of their heavy yoke.

May we who are free dedicate ourselves to make the very most of our opportunities, living in harmony with our neighbors and setting for ourselves the highest standards of excellence we can achieve.

NATIONAL DEFENSE EDUCATION ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LINDSAY] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. LINDSAY. Mr. Speaker, since the National Defense Education Act went into effect a year ago last September, a serious debate on the propriety of the loyalty provisions has been raging among a large segment of our people, particularly in the academic world. The controversy, to my mind, is not so much with respect to the oath of allegiance as the disclaimer requirement in the law, otherwise known as the negative affidavit requirement. Under this requirement every student applying for a student loan must sign a statement, "that he does not believe in any organization that believes in or teaches the illegal overthrow of the Government." Protests against this affidavit have been raised singly or collectively through the Association of American Colleges, the Association of American Universities, the American Association of Land Grant Colleges and State Universities, the American Association of University Professors, and the Association for Higher Education of the National Education Association. They urge the outright repeal of the disclaimer requirement.

The Congress should take serious note that six colleges refused to go into the student loan program because of the requirement. They were: Princeton, Bryn Mawr, Haverford, Swarthmore, Mills, and the University of Richmond. Thirteen others withdrew because of it—Harvard, Yale, Amherst, Radcliffe, Antioch, Bennington, Goucher, Oberlin, St. John's, Wilmington (Ohio), Grinnell, Reed, and Sarah Lawrence.

Ten months ago I introduced an amendment to the act designed to eliminate section 1001(f)(1), the repugnant provision of the law. I spoke on the floor in support of this bill. Others have done the same. Unfortunately, these bills gained no progress in the other body. The dire effects of this provision remaining on our statute books prompted President Eisenhower, on the eve of his recent departure abroad, to speak out categorically in favor of the repeal of the disclaimer requirement. In his recent budget message the President called unwarranted this provision. He added that it is, "justifiably resented by a large part of our educational community which feels it is being singled out for this requirement."

In a recent article reprinted from the December 20, 1959, issue of the New York Times magazine, Dr. Alfred Whitney Griswold, president of Yale University, points out that the disclaimer requirement cannot be relied upon either as a safeguard against disloyalty or as a means of inculcating loyalty. I agree with Dr. Griswold when he says that—

> The affidavit cannot create loyalty. Loyalty cannot be coerced or compelled. If men are born loyal, the only kind of loyalty that survives infancy in any thinking person is the kind that survives curiosity and withstands criticisms and even doubt. Such loyalty may and usually does have an instinctive base; but if the opportunity to satisfy curiosity and answer criticism is limited, or qualified, or made conditional upon the acceptance of restraints, the instinctive base of loyalty is undermined. The only loyalty upon which true reliance can be placed is the kind evoked by the inherent virtue of the cause or institution or individual toward which the loyalty is felt. In creating this kind of loyalty, oaths of any sort are of little value compared to the devotion of a man who has been free to examine and evaluate the evidence and, on the strength of that experience, in Cromwell's words, "knows what he fights for and loves what he knows."

It is hard enough for professors and students to see why they should be treated differently from any other individuals, groups, professions, or occupations that receive Federal subsidies or loans. It is harder still for them "to appreciate the justice of this when they reflect on the role they are being asked to perform and the manner in which they are being asked to perform it." In this regard, Dr. Griswold says—and I quote him:

In one and the same breath they are told that they are the Nation's first line of defense—and the Nation's poorest security risk. They are called upon to put forth their best effort in the name of national security; yet they alone are obliged to submit to certain qualifications concerning their loyalty.

History teaches us that under the scourge of political and religious test oaths such as this disclaimer requirement our Protestant ancestors emigrated from England to settle in America; that our Catholic ancestors lost their lands and lives; that Puritan dissenters and Quakers went to jail.

Although these things are easily forgotten, colleges and universities, where history is studied and the past ever present, remember them.

Dr. Griswold sums up the position of the colleges and universities as follows:

Underlying this concern with test oaths, in fact underlying the whole position of the colleges and universities in this controversy, is their concern for freedom. For centuries, in Europe as well as in England and America, they have struggled for the right to pursue learning for its own sake without interference by church or state. They have done so not because society owed them this right as a mark of respect or a special privilege, but because they have regarded it as a functional necessity identical with freedom of the press and similar to freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and freedom of assembly.

Mr. Speaker, the disclaimer requirement is a shackle that binds minds. I wholeheartedly concur in what Dr. Griswold says in this regard, which might well be a warning to all freedom-loving people:

A nation that cannot trust its intellectuals cannot trust itself. A people that is afraid to expose its political and social institutions to the curiosity and criticism of the rising generation is not free; by whatever method it whispers this fear of itself, it shouts its insecurity to the world.

I submit that if security repudiates academic freedom it must take care lest our most valuable resources be subverted. Security which makes this kind of a demand endangers what it attempts to secure.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to add at the end of my remarks an editorial that appeared in the January 20 edition of the New York Herald Tribune.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE LOYALTY OATH THAT WE DON'T NEED

The academic community should especially welcome one item in the President's budget message. This was his mention that he is recommending repeal of the affidavit requirement of the National Defense Education Act's student loan program, under which each applicant for a federally aided loan must sign a statement that he does not believe in * * * any organization that believes in or teaches the illegal overthrow of the Government.

As we have repeatedly argued, this singling out of needy college students as a suspect group whose loyalty must be specially challenged is an affront both to students and colleges. It also sets a dangerous precedent for Federal interference with the educational process. As the President noted, it is "unwarranted and justifiably resented by a large part of our educational community."

Freedom of the academic world from coercive governmental inquiry into private beliefs is a fundamental matter of principle, to which Congress should give its prompt attention.

Mr. HECHLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LINDSAY. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. HECHLER. I desire to commend the gentleman from New York for throwing additional light on this complex issue. While I have taken no position on this issue, I wish to say that the gentleman from New York is one of the most courageous and conscientious Members of this body.

Mr. LINDSAY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

INDEPENDENCE OF THE UKRAINE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow is commemorated the 42d anniversary of the independence of the Ukraine. Unfortunately, we cannot observe this day with a feeling of joy but must, instead, with a sadness which befits the plight of the brave Ukrainian people who, with the exception of a brief moment of self-determination in 1918, have remained captives in their own land suffering under the rule and persecutions of their Communist masters.

The Ukraine presents to the world a unique and startling paradox: unique, because it is a captive nation within the U.S.S.R. although described by its Communist rulers as a so-called independent Soviet Socialist Republic and thus, by legal implication, voluntarily bound to a union; startling, because it demonstrates the absurdity of the Communist position which alleges their interest in liberation and in the self-determination of peoples.

History proves that the Ukraine is, by reasons of ethnic, language, and culture, a nation. Throughout the 300 years during which Europe witnessed the growth of nationalism, which is contemporarily resurgent, the Ukrainians under the tyranny of the tsars, foreign rulers, and the Communists, have been and are, forcibly prevented in their many and continued attempts from exercising a national will to achieve the rightful status of a nation. It is a tragedy when it is so glaringly evident that, although all the proper elements of nationality are so deeply ingrained in a people yet, because of alien forces, they are prevented from any manifestation which would give them the freedom which is their right.

The Ukraine is considered the cradle of Christianity in Russia. Kiev, its capital, is called by Russians the "Mother of Cities" and, more important, the holiest of Russian Orthodox shrines are located within its limits. It is difficult to believe, when faced with such irrefutable facts, that a people so culturally and religiously homogeneous would, of their own free will, join a political union of states, even though contiguous, whose peoples differ so markedly. Nor, above all, would people with such strong religious traditions, ally themselves with a so-called popular union whose government by propaganda and coercion is anti-religion and who maintains this as a basic premise of its political philosophy. We must, therefore, include the heroic Ukraine among the captive nations.

To the people of the Ukraine and to their compatriots in the free world who, with them, continue in faith to keep alive the spirit of liberty, let us pledge our support to see that some day the independence of these people shall be a reality.

When we are able to welcome the Ukraine into the world as a free and independent nation, then and only then, shall this day of commemoration have a joyful significance.

SPECIAL ORDER GRANTED

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALPERN] be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

JORDANIAN CONTROL OF ENTRANCE TO JERUSALEM

Mr. HALPERN. Mr. Speaker, earlier this month my wife and I were privileged to make a stimulating personal visit to Israel. We were deeply impressed and thrilled to find that this ancient land, whose shores are washed by the Mediterranean Sea, is alive with a youthful, pioneering spirit reminiscent of our own beginnings.

The historic monuments and sights of Israel are awe-inspiring, but far more stirring than geographical and man-made vistas are the spirit and sense of dedication of the people who live in the Holy Land. Disciplined energies and wills are turning desertlands into hospitable and productive acres. Determination and zeal, inspiration and faith, are rebuilding a nation—a stalwart testament to freedom.

I want to report to the Congress today on a highly significant development that occurred during my stay in this democratic bastion of the Middle East.

It arose from my desire to visit the Old City of Jerusalem which lies behind the borders of Jordan. Not fully aware of the depth of the barriers which I later discovered to be existent, I mentioned it to the U.S. Ambassador, the Honorable Ogden R. Reid, who quite obviously has done a great deal in a short time to understand Israel, its people, and its aims and goals. He assured me of the cooperation of the Embassy to achieve this.

Arrangements were initiated and then I was informed that I would have to answer some queries as to my religious faith. It soon became apparent that Americans of the Jewish faith were included among those not permitted by the Jordanian ban to cross over into the Old City.

I was deeply shocked to learn that such a test, embarrassing as it was to our legation personnel, had been brashly established by the Jordanian authorities as a prerequisite for entry into that traditional shrine of such deep religious significance to the entire world.

The next day while lunching at the magnificant Hias center in the city of Beersheba, I was informed by phone from the American Embassy in Tel Aviv that my request to visit the Old City had been denied. The officials of the Embassy assured me that they had exerted every possible effort—and I am sure that they did—but it was to no avail.

To say that I was outraged is to put it mildly. I was indignant and expressed the determination to demonstrate the ridiculousness of this demeaning barrier to free entry.

I was affronted that such a practice should be followed by a nation with whom America has amicable relations, a nation whose very existence we had helped to preserve in the stormy summer of 1958, and into which we were pouring millions of dollars in grant aid.

My passport did stipulate certain Communist countries into which I was not authorized to travel, but it enumerated no other similarly interdicted nations nor travel prohibitions based on personal religious belief.

The issue was more than just personal; it was far larger than an individual grievance; it was a moral case, a matter of justice, a question of upholding the cherished value of the dignity of man. Here I found myself, an American—regardless of my role as a U.S. Congressman—treated as a second-class person by a so-called friendly nation.

And if this be the case with a U.S. citizen, what of the situation, for instance, with the Jews of Israel who may wish to visit the holy places of their ancient tradition. I subsequently studied the Jordan-Israel General Armistice Agreement and was further revolted at finding that the intent of article VIII thereof provides for "a free movement of traffic on vital roads, including the Bethlehem and Latrun-Jerusalem roads; resumption of the normal functioning of the cultural and humanitarian institutions on Mount Scopus and free access thereto; free access to the holy places and cultural institutions and use of the cemetery on the Mount of Olives."

This agreement, so clearly set out in the armistice, is being malevolently violated. Jews from all nations are denied permission to cross the border. Beyond that the great cultural and humanitarian institutions on Mount Scopus—the Hebrew University and the Hadassah Hospital—are left isolated, uninhabited, standing majestically yet tragically as reminders of the armistice violations. The library at the university contains half a million valuable books of learning which are rotting, unused on the shelves.

I was infuriated to encounter this blatant disregard for decency and obligation, this insult and affront to the American people, and expressed my intention to speak out about my personal experience as an example upon my return to Congress. I requested our Embassy personnel, through its proper channels, to convey these strong feelings on the subject.

The following day, upon returning to Tel Aviv from a tour to the Sea of Galilee and Nazareth, I received word that the Jordanian authorities had reversed their decision and had approved my visit.

Impressions of that short trip made on Sunday, January 3, were vivid. We toured venerable and sacred religious sites in Old Jerusalem and Bethlehem, places precious to Christians and Jews. We witnessed the desecration that has been visited upon the ancient Jewish cemetery on the Mount of Olives. We were sickened to learn that tombstones had been ripped out by Arabs and fashioned into construction materials, and that debris and waste had been callously dumped on the burial ground.

There is no need to go into other memorable impressions of our visit to the Old City. What, I believe, is most significant, is that the trip was made. When word arrived that my request had been approved, I had the choice of foregoing the visit because of the original attitude of the Government of Jordan, or, of determining to go, not only to establish a precedent and uphold the moral principle on which I appealed, but also to demolish a barrier and to carry through the extensive efforts by our Embassy people who had acted with great credit throughout the entire incident.

I believe my trip served to demonstrate the ridiculousness of this degrading barrier. I understand that I am probably the first of my faith, knowingly to the Jordanian officials, to cross into the Old City from Israel since the end of the Arab-Israel war. Jordan apparently relented as a consequence of my strong expression of indignation and protest.

My purpose in thus describing this occurrence to the Members of the House is to indicate the feasibility of a policy of speaking up strongly to the Arab States on other matters. It seems to me that my personal experience has tremendous significance in this respect. True, it may be only one incident but it points up what can be accomplished if we stand up for principle and are not afraid to speak out, if we insist on justice and morality. It reflects what can be accomplished if our spokesmen convey a feeling of firmness, reflecting a determination to see the Middle Eastern nations rid of the divisive issues which have cast a pall over the region for the past 11 years, rather than acquiescence in the continuation of festering sores. This represents to me a reasonable, sensible policy.

Our present policy of attempting to strengthen individual Middle East nations and to buttress them against communism without, at the same time, encouraging and working for the elimination of areas of friction among them, seems to offer thin hope for any really positive results. Certainly, an area cleansed of myopic fears of each state about the intentions of its neighbors would be in a far stronger position to constructively utilize foreign assistance, develop in regional strength and resist communism.

Firmness and fairness on our part in encouraging agreement on the Suez, refugees, and use of water resources, can well pay extensive dividends to world peace and security in the future. My experience may properly offer an example of what might be accomplished.

EXTENSION OF THE LIBRARY SERVICES ACT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ELLIOTT] may extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I speak today about my bill, H.R. 9812, which seeks to extend the Library Services Act 5 years. This proposal is simple. It merely changes one word in the initial bill. The initial bill, passed in 1956, authorized the appropriation of $7.5 million a year "for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1957, and for each of the 4 succeeding fiscal years." This bill inserts the word "nine" in place of the word "four," so that the bill reads "and for each of the nine succeeding fiscal years," and makes other technical changes pertaining to our new States, Hawaii and Alaska.

Mr. Speaker, my reasons for introducing this legislation now are many and important. First, let us look at the history of the initial bill and the reasons for its introduction and adoption.

The Library Services Act was adopted by the Congress after it had been pointed out:

First. That some 26 million Americans living in rural areas had no access to a public library.

Second. That some 50 million other Americans had inadequate library service.

Now this is what the Library Service Act did. It authorized an annual $7.5 million appropriation for 5 years for grants to the States for the extension and improvement of rural public library service.

The dollar amount was believed to be sufficient, when matched by State and local funds, to make a big enough start toward facility improvement and to arouse enough local interest that after 5 years the Federal Government could step out of the picture.

But what happened? In no year yet have we appropriated the full amount authorized. This is the record:

In fiscal 1957, the first year of the program, we appropriated only $2,050,000.

In 1958, we recognized how successful the first year was with limited funds and increased the appropriation to $5 million, still $2,500,000 less than the authorization.

In the next 2 years we did better, appropriating $6 million each year.

But, over the 4-year life of the bill we have appropriated only $19,050,000, less than two-thirds of the amount the initial bill authorized.

Let us see what we have done with this money to see if it has been worth spending. The facts and figures leave no doubt about the improvement of rural libraries. The efforts of State and local areas has been overwhelming and the results have been most gratifying.

In fiscal 1957, the first year of the program's operation, 35 States and Hawaii set up plans and raised State and local funds in order to participate in the program. Today 52 States and territories are participating.

According to a recent Office of Education estimate, State funds appropriated for the improvement and extension of public library service to rural areas have increased more than 54 percent since 1956, and local funds have increased 45 percent.

Now let us look a little closer to see what has happened to help those 26 million persons without libraries and those 50 million with inadequate facilities. Let us see what is going on in the 319 rural counties where no libraries existed.

Here are the Office of Education estimates. Some 30 million of those 76 million persons have new or improved library services. A giant step indeed. But do not forget that much of this service is still not adequate.

More than 1 million persons in rural areas now have library service for the first time. Some 63 counties formerly without any public libraries now are receiving service. The act has meant traveling bookmobiles, increased book supplies, money for salaries for increased staff, money for scholarships and workshops to train additional staff, county and regional library projects, and extensive loan and reference programs.

New bookmobiles have totaled more than 200 bringing books and information to rural people in remote areas. Some 5 million books have been added to cultural resources of rural communities. The hunger for books and information by our people in rural areas has been emphatically demonstrated by the tremendous increases in library usage as a result of these improved services.

Mr. Speaker, the following are excerpts from some State reports reflecting the results achieved during the first 3 years of the act:

From Idaho:

The attitude toward public library development is wholesome and encouraging. Federal aid is a tremendous stimulant.

From South Carolina:

We see a State becoming clearly aware of what good public library service consists, how much it costs, and its importance to the economic as well as the cultural welfare of the community.

From Hawaii:

We feel particularly fortunate to have the help of Federal-aid funds, because they became available at the same time as the new emphasis on science.

From Oklahoma:

Interest in libraries and library services is increasing each year. Through the funds available under the Library Services Act, we have been able to show the people in Oklahoma what good library service is.

Here is what the law has helped to do in some States:

Utah created a new State library agency and appropriated funds for its support. Arizona voted its first funds to begin a State library. Minnesota and Oregon achieved their first State grant-in-aid program, bringing the total number of States with grants for public libraries to 22.

How better to sum up the meaning of libraries and books than to quote from a 17th-century philosopher:

That weary listlessness which renders life unsupportable to the voluptuous and the indolent is unknown to those who can employ themselves by reading.

I would like to be more specific and tell you what this law has accomplished in my own State of Alabama. Between March 1, 1957, and June 30, 1959—only a little more than 2 years—we were able to accomplish the following: More than 84,000 people are receiving library service who previously had no access to public libraries. More than 462,000 are receiving improved or extended service. With the funds from this act we have been able to purchase 8 new bookmobiles, to hire 48 new staff personnel, to set up 7 new regional libraries and give a large grant to assist the 8th, to spend almost $280,000 for books and cataloging services. We have also been able to establish in-service training programs and workshops to train library personnel.

In terms of stimulating local effort, the act has again been extremely successful in Alabama. The State appropriation has climbed from $116,750 in 1956–57 to $179,695 in 1959–60, an increase of more than 53 percent. One local area formerly without service has purchased a new bookmobile on its own. All over the State new library buildings are being planned and old ones remodeled.

There seems little doubt that the act thus far has accomplished a great deal. But do all these facts and figures indicate that the act needs to be extended? Such informed organizations as the American Library Association and the U.S. Office of Education feel that they do. Miss Germaine Krettek, director of the Washington office of the American Library Association, in appearing before a House subcommittee in April of last year stressed that the goals of the program were not going to be reached within the 5-year period, and later told a Senate subcommittee in June that:

I think it is becoming quite clear, although excellent progress has been made, that the goals are not going to be reached within a 5-year period. * * * You might be interested to know that the American Library Association is on record in favor of extension at this time.

The Office of Education estimates that by the end of fiscal 1961, when the act is due to expire, the job will be only half done. We will have cut the number of people without any service or with only inadequate service from approximately 80 million to approximately 40 million, but this still means that 40 million of our citizens are denied adequate free access to books. It means that hundreds of our schools will be handicapped by the lack of a public library in the area. It means that millions of adults will continue to be deprived of the enjoyment and the information they could obtain from books.

I also wish to point out that it is vital that we pass this extension bill during this session, and do not wait until the law is about to expire. Much valuable planning and preparation time will be lost if the States and local areas are kept up in the air as to whether the bill will be extended beyond June 1961. In order to preserve the continuous forward movement and the continual planning for the future, I feel it is necessary that we vote to extend this bill before we reach the zero hour.

We have spent a lot of time in Congress during the last few years discussing how we can best ensure maximum educational experience for all our citizens—education for this increasingly complex technical age, education to enable them to consider national and world problems and become intelligent citizens and voters. It seems to me indisputable that this act gives us a great deal of education for our dollars. When we have spent the taxpayers' money to establish 161 U.S. information libraries in foreign countries, complete with bookmobiles and traveling bookshelves, on the philosophy that our books will help these people to establish and maintain free and democratic governments, should we not also be concerned with 40 million of our own citizens who have a similar need?

John G. Lorenz, director of the Library Services Branch of the Office of Education and himself a professional librarian, said in the summer of 1958:

The most satisfying experience to me was having it proved that there is this tremendous hunger for books and information. The demand for books in rural areas is much greater than we can meet.

I strongly urge the Congress to extend the Library Services Act for an additional 5 years, so that we can meet this need of our rural citizens.

Clarence Day, Jr., writing the story of the Yale University Press, made this apt observation of the significance of books:

The world of books is the most remarkable creation of man. Nothing else that he builds ever lasts. Monuments fall, nations perish, civilizations grow old and die out.

After an era of darkness new races build others but in the world of books are volumes that live on still as young and fresh as the day they were written, still telling men's hearts of the hearts of men centuries dead.

CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALFORD. Mr. Speaker, during the 1st session of the 86th Congress I had the privilege and opportunity of calling to the attention of the Congress that the present Supreme Court had completely usurped the power of the people and their Congress in the unprecedented decision which violated the 10th amendment wherein the public school systems of the States are reserved exclusively to the States. Neither the Supreme Court nor any other agency of the Federal Government has any authority under the Constitution to tell the States or the people who reside in them how they shall run their schools. This same Court has arrogantly ignored the ninth amendment which reads as follows:

> The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

Also, in the session of Congress which adjourned in September, I spoke out against the further destruction of the Constitution when the Court decided in favor of an officer who searched the home of a helpless Negro family in Maryland without a search warrant. This was in absolute violation of the fourth amendment. This was the first such decision since the Constitutional Convention in 1787.

We, as Members of Congress, should operate in defense of the Constitution of the United States. It is fairly evident that the Nation lacks leaders it used to have who would respond on matters of principle. Instead, matters of expediency govern the political fabric of the Nation. The immediate issue is the assumption of authority by the Supreme Court in matters not granted them by the Constitution, and the bluffing, with Presidential help, of an illegal enforcement of illegal measures on the presumption that it is a lawful order of the Court. The split among our people is created by the injection of emotional and sociological issues into a strictly legal matter where the former have no place. The main object of the Communist is to stir up strife among the races, break down States rights, the greatest barrier to the final takeover and the establishment of a Communist-Socialist world government. In other words, it is the move of an outside enemy to soften the Nation for its planned wreckage.

Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, permit me to include a statement given by me before the subcommittee of the House Judiciary Committee on April 15, 1959, as follows:

STATEMENT OF DALE ALFORD, MEMBER OF CONGRESS, BEFORE SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE HOUSE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE, APRIL 15, 1959

I respectfully wish to submit to this committee the opinion of an American citizen, which, I sincerely believe, represents the opinion of the majority of the people of this country—and we, as Members of Congress, are concerned, or should be concerned, with the opinion of the majority of the people of this country and no other country. This should be above political expediency. Any so-called civil rights measure enacted by this Congress over the laws of the respective States is an absolute violation of States rights. The law of the land is the Constitution of the United States, which derives its authority from the several States.

Proposed civil rights measures violate the ninth amendment, which I quote, as follows:

"The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

These measures would violate the 10th amendment which states that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States respectively, are reserved to the States or to the people."

Any so-called civil rights measures can be likened to a sword with two edges, for where in one instance one edge serves a specific purpose, the opposite edge can be turned against its present wielder.

In our beloved country the people are sovereign. And, make no mistake about it, the people of this country—the majority, if you please—will win this fight and this crusade to preserve their individual liberties as guaranteed them under the Constitution. The opinions of members of the Supreme Court do not make the law of the land; the Constitution is the law of the land. Members of Congress are representatives of the people and it is my duty to uphold and maintain the opinion of the majority of the people of my State.

The Constitution is not plastic, it cannot be molded or twisted to suit the political designs of a few. The Supreme Court's decision is not "the law of the land," even though in a case the Court may soundly define the meaning of particular words of the Constitution. It is the Constitution which remains "the supreme law of the land" (art. VI), while the Court's decisions and orders in the case control only the parties to that case. The Court has no power to make general rules binding upon the people and governments of the States, nor to amend the Constitution.

The Supreme Court's decisions and orders are in conflict with the Constitution, and do not even exist in the eyes of the Constitution; they are null and void, and they must be treated accordingly by all who are loyal to the Constitution, to the Republic (which depends for existence on a stable Constitution), and to the people's inalienable rights. The same is true regarding anti-Constitution acts, orders and pronouncements of other officials, notably Federal judges on lower courts and the President and his subordinates, as well as acts of Congress.

The great moral issue today, therefore, is not segregation versus integration in the schools; it is, instead, the issue of the sovereign people and their Constitution versus defaulting public trustees as oathbreaking usurpers. In other words, shall the people and their State governments defend their constitutional rights, or bow down before an anti-Constitution elite enforcing rule by man? Shall we have limited government and rule by law under the Constitution, or usurpers supreme with unlimited power? Shall the Republic endure, or shall we allow its destruction by the weapon customarily used to this end—usurpation? (See Washington's Farewell Address.)

In the famous Dred Scott case in 1856, the Supreme Court declared that sympathy for the slaves could not justify the Court's saying the Constitution means something different from what it was originally intended to mean by the framers and adopters. Likewise, today, the prohibition against the Federal Government's having power to control education, schools (so as to be able to decree and enforce integration) under the Constitution, as amended—as defined initially by the Supreme Court in this respect—must be upheld. All morality requires this; the moral leaders (such as clergy) and idealists in general, above all others, must support this conclusion. Otherwise they are guilty of debasing the morality and ideals they profess to uphold through subscribing in effect to the antimoral precept that the end justifies the means, which spells intellectual and moral bankruptcy. If any change be needed, as the people see it, they can make it—by amendment.

As to Federal usurpation of power concerning the schools of a State, its government (particularly legislature, with controlling power) must therefore take a firm stand (correcting past errors accordingly) to proclaim that anti-Constitution decisions and orders, judicial and executive, are null and void and will be treated accordingly. We must stop evasive actions and programs designed to get around such null and void decisions and orders, because these are unnecessary and confusing due to implying that these decisions and orders have constitutional validity, which is not true. We must make sure that any proposed remedial amendment of the Constitution expressly asserts that it is merely confirming the States' possession of (not giving anew) power already theirs under the Constitution as amended and as initially defined by the Supreme Court. We must proclaim, and pass binding laws accordingly, that the State and all subordinate governments and all citizens must and will respect the Constitution of the United States and of the State—all officials being sworn to support these Constitutions only and not Federal usurpers (President or Judges or Congress). We must require by law that all officials, from the Governor down, act accordingly in every respect to oppose any Federal troops used by the Federal usurpers as contemplated by the framers and adopters. (See The Federalist, Nos. 28 by Hamilton and 46 by Madison, for instance.) We must oppose any Federal usurpers. (Troops and marshals, too, are sworn to support the Constitution only.) All in defense of these Constitutions, the people's inalienable rights, States rights, posterity's just heritage, the cause of liberty.

Also, I include a quotation from a book, "The Hope of the World," by that great American patriot, Dan Smoot:

We derive no rights or power from the Government. It is vice versa. Government derives its just powers from us the governed. We want it clearly understood, moreover, that the grant of power which we make to Government is very limited. Even though we must delegate to Government enough power to protect all of us from one another, and from possible foreign enemies, we have certain rights which we are not willing to surrender or modify for any purpose whatever. We call these rights unalienable because God, our Creator, endowed us with them; we consider them sacred. Each one of us as an individual, whether rich or poor, weak or strong, has certain rights that God has given us and that no power on earth can take away, neither Government, nor an organized group, nor an overwhelming majority of the people themselves. Among these sacred rights are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

That is the meaning of the American Declaration of Independence.

After winning the independence they had declared, and after writing a Constitution to make the necessary grant of limited power to a Central Government, the Founding Fathers worried about that matter of their sacred and unalienable rights. In the first section of their Constitution, where they granted power to the new Government, they started off by saying, "The powers herein granted." They meant that the Government should have no powers except those specifically listed in the Constitution. But was that sufficiently clear and emphatic? Perhaps not. The Founding Fathers decided to make certainty doubly certain. They wrote a Bill of Rights (the first 10 amendments to their Constitution), not asking the Government for any rights, but specifically listing certain God-given rights and telling Government that it must not, could not, tamper with them.

Congress shall make no law abridging these specific, sacred rights of ours.

That is the meaning of the American Constitution and the Bill of Rights.

"All men are created equal," as recorded in the Declaration of Independence, is not materialism. It is a Christian concept of equality and this concept is spiritual. The Christian concept of equality does not imply material standardization or conformity or the physical leveling of all mankind.

That, instead, is the Communist concept.

To quote further from Dan Smoot:

The major threat to America today is atheistic total socialism-communism. It is a denial of God for the worship of government or the state. It is the worship of all-powerful government as the manmade god which will solve all our problems. To the atheist Socialist-Communist no treatment of an individual is abuse if it is done for the cause. Murder, double-dealing, and lying are all justified if the Socialist-Communist cause is exalted. The individual is nothing; the state is everything.

The so-called cold war between the U.S.S.R. and the United States of America is not just a rivalry between two nations. It is a conflict between two opposing ideologies, of two irreconcilable faiths. The present Socialist-Communist cause is more than ideology. It is a conspiracy that can neither be appeased nor contained, because it must conquer to survive. All Communist talk about peaceful coexistence and social and material equality is a lie designed to confuse and disarm and conquer. The international conspiracy knows that peaceful coexistence and physical equality are not possible. The Communists will use any method of approach to divide us and to conquer and bury us. This great battle for freedom in which we are engaged is a battle for the hearts and minds and souls of men. We can win, but only if the flame of faith burns in our hearts and minds greater than in the beastly breasts of our enemies. Evolution, not revolution, will preserve good will and understanding between us. Constitutional government and not punitive legislation is the answer.

In America today we do not need new so-called civil rights legislation; we need a new breath of patriotism.

HOUSE UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE APPROPRIATION

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROOSEVELT. Mr. Speaker, yesterday a few legislative items came before this body at a time when there were comparatively few Members on the floor. Among these was House Resolution 413, authorizing an appropriation, not to exceed $327,000, for the House Committee on Un-American Activities.

Frankly, since this is a controversial committee and its manner of operation and its actions have created controversy, and I might say confusion, I cannot understand why it was felt necessary to push through the appropriation on a day when legislation was not anticipated. Under these circumstances, any effort to speak in opposition to the appropriation would have meant very little in the final outcome.

If a rollcall had been taken on this matter, I would have voted against the appropriation, because I sincerely believe that the taxpayers' money is not being put to full and fruitful use. The committee's work has not resulted in substantive legislative programs or proposals in the field of internal security, the purpose for which the committee presumably was created.

At a future date in this session, I shall document the fact that the work of the committee has been in hit-and-run endeavors which have made headlines but have not resulted in concrete accomplishments. The abortive foray into California is one of the latest examples. I shall also show, as I attempted to do last session, that other agencies of Government are more effective in handling matters involving our internal security, without fanfare.

SPECIAL ORDERS GRANTED

By unanimous consent, permission to address the House, following the legislative program and any special orders heretofore entered, was granted to:

Mr. MEADER, for 60 minutes, on Monday, next.

Mr. KARTH (at the request of Mr. MADDEN), for 1 hour, on Wednesday next.

Mr. POWELL (at the request of Mr. MADDEN), for 30 minutes each on Tuesday and Wednesday of next week.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

By unanimous consent, permission to extend remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to revise and extend remarks, was granted to:

Mr. LEVERING and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. MARTIN.

Mr. DULASKI and to include extraneous matter.

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER and to include extraneous matter.

(At the request of Mr. CUNNINGHAM, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. VAN ZANDT.

Mr. WIDNALL.

(At the request of Mr. MADDEN, and to include extraneous matter, the following:)

Mr. KING of California.

Mr. RODINO.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 57 minutes p.m.), under its previous order, the House adjourned until Monday, January 25, 1960, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1719. A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a report covering the rural electric and rural telephone programs of the Rural Electrification Administration for the fiscal year 1959; to the Committee on Agriculture.

1720. A letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to amend the act of August 1, 1956, entitled 'An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State'"; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

1721. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to validate certain payments of additional pay for sea duty made to members and former members of the U.S. Coast Guard"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1722. A letter from the clerk, U.S. Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the court's opinion in the case of B Amusement Company, et al. v. The United States (Congressional No. 1–54), pursuant to sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28, United States Code, and House Resolution 475, 83d Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1723. A letter from the clerk, U.S. Court of Claims, transmitting certified copies of the court's opinion in the case of Edward Gordon, Morton Gordon, John J. Dahill, Esteban Melendez, Jean Garcia, Marie Flynn, Carmen Rodriguez, and 62 Lenox Ave., Incorporated v. The United States (Congressional No. 9–55), pursuant to sections 1492 and 2509 of title 28, United States Code, and House Resolution 273, 84th Congress; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

1724. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation entitled "A bill to simplify the admeasurement of small vessels, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

Mr. JONES of Missouri: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 407. Resolution providing for printing additional copies of the hearings entitled "Report on Russia by Vice Adm. Hyman G. Rickover, U.S. Navy"; with amendment (Rept. No. 1212). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Missouri: Committee on House Administration. House Resolution 408. Resolution providing for printing additional copies of the hearings entitled "Report on the International Geophysical Year (February 1959)"; with amendment (Rept. No. 1213). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Missouri: Committee on House Administration. House Concurrent Resolution 449. Concurrent resolution to print as a House document the publication "Facts on Communism—Volume 1, The Communist Ideology" and to provide for the printing of additional copies; with amendment (Rept. No. 1214). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES of Missouri: Committee on House Administration. House Concurrent Resolution 457. Concurrent resolution to authorize printing as a House document a publication relating to the nomination and election of President and Vice President, including the manner of selecting delegates to national political conventions; without amendment (Rept. No. 1215). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. ZABLOCKI: Committee on Foreign Affairs. S. 2130. An act to authorize a payment to the Government of Japan; without amendment (Rept. No. 1216). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MILLS: Committee on Ways and Means. H.R. 9660. A bill to amend section 6659(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the procedure for assessing certain additions to tax; without amendment (Rept. No. 1217). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, public bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BARING:

H.R. 9801. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to increase to 40 cents per hour the minimum wage applicable to blind workers and to provide for periodic increases beginning January 1, 1961; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H.R. 9802. A bill to prohibit the Secretary of Commerce from approving plans, specifications, and estimates for a specified portion of a route on the Interstate System in Nevada, and to prohibit further obligation or expenditure of Federal funds in connection with such route; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. BENNETT of Florida:

H.R. 9803. A bill relating to the employment of retired commissioned officers by contractors of the Department of Defense and the Armed Forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. BURDICK:

H.R. 9804. A bill to include the holders of star route and certain other contracts for the carrying of mail under the provisions of the Civil Service Retirement Act; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts:

H.R. 9805. A bill to amend section 312 of the Immigration and Nationality Act so as to exempt from the requirements relating to understanding the English language the parents of those members of the Armed Forces of the United States who lost or lose their lives in the armed services of the United States during World War I, World War II, or during any subsequent war or period of armed hostilities in which the United States may be engaged; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9806. A bill to amend section 312 of the Immigration and Nationality Act so as to exempt certain additional persons from the requirements relating to understanding the English language; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9807. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide that an individual rated permanently and totally disabled by the Veterans' Administration shall be conclusively deemed to be under a disability for social security purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CELLER:

H.R. 9808. A bill to prohibit agencies of the United States from imposing contractual provisions boycotting vessels trading with Israel; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. COLLIER:

H.R. 9809. A bill to amend the Federal Firearms Act to make it unlawful to transport in interstate or foreign commerce any firearm which is intended to be used in a crime of violence; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9810. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide funds for educational purposes by providing increased incentives for private giving through the allowance of a tax credit for charitable contributions to institutions of higher learning; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. ELLIOTT:

H.R. 9811. A bill to authorize the establishment of a national showcase of the arts and sciences in the District of Columbia to encourage young American artists and scientists; to authorize the holding of an International Olympiad of the Arts and Sciences on a biennial basis in the District of Columbia and thus to enhance the prospects of a durable peace, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

H.R. 9812. A bill to amend the Library Services Act in order to extend for 5 years the authorization for appropriations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mr. FARBSTEIN:

H.R. 9813. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide benefits under the Federal old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program for needy individuals who are 70 years of age or over and are not otherwise entitled to benefits under such title; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9814. A bill to amend title I of the Housing Act of 1949 to require that any rental or cooperative housing constructed in the redevelopment of an urban renewal area shall be designed for middle income groups; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

H.R. 9815. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to provide benefits under the Federal old-age, survivors, and disability insurance program for needy individuals over retirement age who are not otherwise entitled to benefits under such title; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FOLEY:

H.R. 9816. A bill to establish a Federal Recreation Service in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Education and Labor.

By Mrs. GREEN of Oregon:

H.R. 9817. A bill to amend section 204(d) of the Postal Rate Revision and Federal Employees Salary Act of 1948 to provide special rates of postage for the transmission in the mails of certain official school records of students; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. HERLONG:

H.R. 9818. A bill to provide for the conveyance of certain real property of the United States to the State of Florida; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. INOUYE:

H.R. 9819. A bill relating to the income-tax treatment of cost-of-living allowances received by certain caretakers and clerks employed by the National Guard outside the continental United States, or in Hawaii; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KEOGH:

H.R. 9820. A bill to extend for an additional 3 years the period during which certain tanning extracts, including certain extracts, decoctions, and preparations which (irrespective of their chief use) are suitable for use for tanning, may be imported free of duty; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. VAN PELT:

H.R. 9821. A bill to extend for an additional 3 years the period during which certain tanning extracts, including certain extracts, decoctions, and preparations which (irrespective of their chief use) are suitable for use for tanning, may be imported free of duty; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KING of California:

H.R. 9822. A bill to amend title II of the Social Security Act to permit reduced benefits thereunder (when based upon the attainment of retirement age) to be paid to men at age 62, to permit full benefits thereunder (when based upon attainment of retirement age) to be paid to women at age 62 and reduced benefits to be paid to women at age 60, to eliminate the limitation with respect to the amount which individuals may earn while receiving benefits under such title, and to eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained age 50 in order to be eligible for disability benefits under such title; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

H.R. 9823. A bill to provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are 45 years of age or over; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KOWALSKI:

H.R. 9824. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide for the payment of pensions to veterans of World War I; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. MEYER:

H.R. 9825. A bill to assist in the promotion of economic stabilization by requiring the disclosure of finance charges in connection with extensions of credit; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CLEM MILLER:

H.R. 9826. A bill to amend section 204(d) of the Postal Rate Revision and Federal Employees Salary Act of 1948 to provide special rates of postage for the transmission in the mails of certain official school records of students; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

H.R. 9827. A bill authorizing the improvement of Noyo River and Harbor, Calif., in the interest of navigation, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. MONAGAN:

H.R. 9828. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

H.R. 9829. A bill to provide for equalizing the conditions of competition between domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MOULDER:

H.R. 9830. A bill to require an act of Congress for public land withdrawals in excess of 5,000 acres in the aggregate for any project or facility of any department or agency of the Government; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

By Mr. O'NEILL:

H.R. 9831. A bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act to increase the amount of wages entitled to priority to $1,800 and to provide that pension and welfare benefits earned by an employee shall have the same priority as direct wages; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. OSTERTAG:

H.R. 9832. A bill to provide for adjusting conditions of competition between certain domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. PELLY:

H.R. 9833. A bill to amend title V of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, in order to remove certain limitations on the construction differential subsidy under such title; to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. ROBERTS:

H.R. 9834. A bill to provide increased retired pay for certain members of the uniformed services retired before June 1, 1958; to the Committee on Armed Services.

By Mr. RUTHERFORD:

H.R. 9835. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to permit certain farmers to make an election with respect to the taxable year in which income from the price support program for upland cotton will be included in their gross income; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHIPLEY:

H.R. 9836. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to provide pensions, and wartime rates of disability or death compensation, in the case of veterans of Mexican border service in 1916 or 1917; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

By Mr. SMITH of Mississippi:

H.R. 9837. A bill to further modify the lower Mississippi River flood control and improvement project, originally adopted May 15, 1928; to the Committee on Public Works.

By Mr. STAGGERS:

H.R. 9838. A bill to amend the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, so as to strengthen and improve the national transportation system, insure the protection of the public interest, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey:

H.R. 9839. A bill to provide additional punishment for corporate officers violating the antitrust laws, and to provide that such officers may be barred for not more than 1 year from serving in such corporate capacity; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TRIMBLE:

H.R. 9840. A bill to promote greater equity in the administration of the pay systems of employees in the Veterans' Administration under prevailing rate schedules by providing for certain adjustments in the compensation of such employees; to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

By Mr. VAN ZANDT:

H.R. 9841. A bill to provide for adjusting conditions of competition between certain domestic industries and foreign industries with respect to the level of wages and the working conditions in the production of articles imported into the United States; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. GALLAGHER:

H.J. Res. 566. Joint resolution authorizing the President to issue a proclamation designating January 22 of each year as Ukrainian Independence Day; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SISK:

H.J. Res. 567. Joint resolution to effect immediately the transfer of the Development Operations Division of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration; to the Committee on Science and Astronautics.

By Mr. ABBITT:

H.J. Res. 568. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. ADDONIZIO:

H.J. Res. 569. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. CANFIELD:

H.J. Res. 570. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. CAHILL:

H.J. Res. 571. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. DANIELS:

H.J. Res. 572. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent Woodrow Wilson Memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. DOWNING:

H.J. Res. 573. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

H.J. Res. 574. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. GLENN:

H.J. Res. 575. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. HARRISON:

H.J. Res. 576. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. OSMERS:

H.J. Res. 577. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. RODINO:

H.J. Res. 578. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. SMITH of Mississippi:

H.J. Res. 579. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey:

H.J. Res. 580. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. WALLHAUSER:

H.J. Res. 581. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. WIDNALL:

H.J. Res. 582. Joint resolution authorizing the creation of a commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson; to the Committee on House Administration.

By Mr. MOORE:

H. Con. Res. 464. Concurrent resolution that it is the sense of Congress that the United States should not grant further tariff reductions in the forthcoming tariff negotiations, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. O'HARA of Illinois:

H. Con. Res. 465. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MORGAN:

H. Con. Res. 466. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CARNAHAN:

H. Con. Res. 467. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HAYS:

H. Con. Res. 468. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SELDEN:

H. Con. Res. 469. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PILCHER:

H. Con. Res. 470. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FOUNTAIN:

H. Con. Res. 471. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FASCELL:

H. Con. Res. 472. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. COFFIN:

H. Con. Res. 473. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FARBSTEIN:

H. Con. Res. 474. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SAUND:

H. Con. Res. 475. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BECKWORTH:

H. Con. Res. 476. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. McDOWELL:

H. Con. Res. 477. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MURPHY:

H. Con. Res. 478. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MEYER:

H. Con. Res. 479. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CHIPERFIELD:

H. Con. Res. 480. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mrs. BOLTON:

H. Con. Res. 481. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FULTON:

H. Con. Res. 482. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mrs. CHURCH:

H. Con. Res. 483. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ADAIR:

H. Con. Res. 484. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BENTLEY:

H. Con. Res. 485. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS of Massachusetts:

H. Con. Res. 486. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. WAINWRIGHT:

H. Con. Res. 487. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ROOSEVELT:

H. Con. Res. 488. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. DADDARIO:

H. Con. Res. 489. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MADDEN:

H. Con. Res. 490. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. JUDD:

H. Con. Res. 491. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. FLOOD:

H. Con. Res. 492. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. THOMPSON of New Jersey:

H. Con. Res. 493. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LIBONATI:

H. Con. Res. 494. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. GALLAGHER:

H. Con. Res. 495. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MACK of Illinois:

H. Con. Res. 496. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. MERROW:

H. Con. Res. 497. Concurrent resolution expressing the indignation of Congress at the recent desecrations of houses of worship and other sacred sites; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. LINDSAY:

H. Con. Res. 498. Concurrent resolution expressing the concern and disapproval of Congress at the recent desecration of places of worship; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BROWN of Georgia:

H. Res. 428. Resolution that there be printed for the use of the Joint Committee on Defense Production, U.S. Congress, upon requisition of the chairman thereof, not to exceed 1,000 additional copies of the report entitled "Ninth Annual Report of the Activities of the Joint Committee on Defense Production"; to the Committee on House Administration.

MEMORIALS

Under clause 4 of rule XXII, and referred as follows:

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the territory of American Samoa memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to enact organic legislation establishing a civil government for the territory of American Samoa, which was referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. GIAIMO:

H.R. 9842. A bill for the relief of Benedetto Mariani and Annunziata Mariani; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HERLONG:

H.R. 9843. A bill for the relief of Jonathan Barnes and his sister, Caroline Barnes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LIBONATI:

H.R. 9844. A bill for the relief of John Gelbert (alias Max Theodore Gelbert); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LINDSAY:

H.R. 9845. A bill for the relief of Istvan Zsoldos; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MOORE:

H.R. 9846. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Edna Satterfield; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9847. A bill for the relief of Dwylia McCreight and John T. McCreight, Jr.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PELLY:

H.R. 9848. A bill for the relief of Reoko Kawaguchi Moore; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9849. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Tui Hing Tow Woo; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PHILBIN:

H.R. 9850. A bill for the relief of Allen Pope, his heirs or personal representatives; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PUCINSKI:

H.R. 9851. A bill for the relief of Helena Farbotko; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. RUTHERFORD:

H.R. 9852. A bill for the relief of Gabriel Ayub; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHELLEY:

H.R. 9853. A bill for the relief of Bienvenido Victorio Sison; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. SHIPLEY:

H.R. 9854. A bill for the relief of Raymond Thomason, Jr.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEED:

H.R. 9855. A bill for the relief of Chien-Min Wu; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TOLLEFSON:

H.R. 9856. A bill for the relief of Sp4c Adriano P. Principe; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ZABLOCKI:

H.R. 9857. A bill for the relief of Sister Myriam (Marta Krzyzowska); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9858. A bill for the relief of Rosemary B. Patmour; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

H.R. 9859. A bill for the relief of Hong Do Sun; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

317. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Charles Burns, Martinsville, Ind., and others, relative to requesting favorable consideration of H.R. 1354, a bill designed to restore standard time to the Nation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

318. Also, petition of Thomas F. Coleman, Rexville, N.Y., and others, relative to requesting favorable consideration of H.R. 1354, a bill designed to restore standard time to the Nation; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

319. Also, petition of the chairman, executive committee, Socialist Party, Social Democratic Federation of Wisconsin, Milwaukee, Wis., relative to public ownership of the railroads; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

The Year in Which We Choose

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. GEORGE P. MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. GEORGE P. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to be a guest at a banquet of the American Federation of Government Employees at the Willard Hotel last Saturday evening, January 16, celebrating the 77th anniversary of the Federal civil service system.

The Honorable LYNDON JOHNSON, majority leader of the Senate, was the principal speaker. He delivered a forthright address in which he expressed appreciation for the intelligent, efficient and loyal work of the Government's career employees.

Senator JOHNSON demonstrated an intimate knowledge of our merit system and an appreciation of its good points as well as its shortcomings.

Federal employees and all concerned with preserving and increasing the efficiency of the civil service merit system will be interested in the majority leader's speech which follows:

THE YEAR IN WHICH WE CHOOSE

(Address by Senator LYNDON B. JOHNSON, American Federation of Government Employees, 77th anniversary of civil service, Washington, D.C., January 16, 1960)

It is always pleasant after a busy week to spend Saturday night with good friends. Then you can say the things you have been wanting to say.

I am happy to have this opportunity to visit with you tonight. I am especially happy because this is an appropriate occasion to take stock and to review some of the fundamentals of our Government in the light of the problems of 1960.

We are here to commemorate the anniversary of civil service. For 77 years—nearly half the life of our Republic—it has been the expressed will of our people that their Government should not be operated in the service of partisans. This is the bedrock on which the basic integrity of the National Government has stood and must continue to stand.

And this is the bedrock on which we, as a nation, need to plant our feet firmly in this year of 1960.

TIME FOR PARTISANSHIP

We live in a land in which we have tried to place things in proper categories. We recognize that there is a place for partisanship and a place in which partisanship is not appropriate.

Our political system is based upon partisan divisions—because our people must have a choice in determining the basic policies of our Government. But partisanship running rampant through the operation of our Government would soon lead to the collapse of the Nation itself.

There was a time when our country could afford the spoils system of parceling out Government jobs. Those were simpler times—an age in which the actual operation of Government was largely a matter of routine.

The victors of partisan strife looked upon the Government and its jobs as the proper reward of success. And they also thought of the Government as an institution which could be used to perpetuate the power of the victors.

TIME FOR CONTINUITY

The Pendleton Act put an end to that era. It dedicated our country to the proposition that our governmental machinery should be in the hands of public servants who held their jobs because they had demonstrated merit and capacity.

The act also brought into our Government the concept of continuity—that the inauguration of a new administration did not mean the complete dismissal of all of those who possessed the necessary knowledge to keep the day-to-day wheels running smoothly.

No one pretends that civil service has worked perfectly. It has its faults—as does any system devised by the mind of man.

But over the decades, it has built up a core of hard working, able, competent people without whom this Nation could not stand in the 20th century.

A HIGH STANDARD

It is fashionable in many quarters to deride the civil servant who works for our Government. It is a popular form of public amusement to consider the civil servant a parasite who is living off the hard-won money of the taxpayer and drawing down lush salaries, for little or no work.

I have been connected with the Federal Government in either the legislative or the executive branch for 30 years. In such a vast and complicated establishment, I have, of course, found loafers and incompetents.

But I have found far more dedicated people; hard-working people; far more selfless people. And I think that the standard of performance required by the civil service is fully as great as that required in any field of human endeavor.

It seems to me that those in the Government who are the legitimate subject of partisan activity owe certain obligations to those who are in the civil service.

UPON THE MERITS

A civil servant has relinquished some of the protections which are enjoyed by those who are engaged in private endeavor. The civil servant has tenure; but he does not have—and cannot have—the right to use collective economic force to set the terms and conditions of his employment. For this reason, those who do have the right and authority to set those terms and conditions have an obligation to lean over backward to be fair. Wages, hours, and working conditions cannot be settled at the table of collective bargaining. They can only be settled on the basis of considering legitimate requests upon their merits.

This I believe Congress will do. I think that regardless of the outcome, you will be given a fair shake of the dice.

But I am not here tonight to talk to you about the problems of civil service. There are more appropriate times and places in which, through your able leadership, you can discuss your specific affairs with the Members of Congress who are expert in this field. I do want to talk to you tonight about problems that affect you all as Americans.

YEAR OF DECISION

This year is a year of election in America. There are choices to make and decisions to take.

But what we choose, we do not choose for ourselves alone. With us, on the way that we go—whatever that way may be—will go the hope and faith of free men everywhere and the prospects of generations still unborn.

The responsibility that rests upon America in this young year is awesome. There should be more of us getting down on our knees right now and fewer of us standing on our right to hold the floor.

The office we are to fill in 1960 is the Presidency of the United States. The man we will elect is not going to be god of the universe or a ruler of the world—but he is going to lead our country for 4 years.

The decision we are going to make will be determined along partisan lines. It is right and proper that we should do so.

But it will not be right and not be proper if we permit ourselves to be so divided by partisanship that 1960 will come to an end with our Nation weaker than it was when the year began.

LEGITIMATE ISSUES

There are many legitimate issues to be submitted to—and discussed fully before—the American people. We are entitled to a frank and searching debate upon our national goals.

We must choose between an America that looks with confidence to an ever-expanding future or an America that shrinks into a bygone past.

We must choose between an America that is preeminent or an America that is second best.

We must choose between an America that can lead the world boldly into the age of space or an America that is content to tag along behind another power.

We must choose between an America that has the initiative in world affairs or an America that merely reacts to the moves of others on the international chessboard.

We must choose between an America that seeks ever higher standards for its people or an America that believes the best that can be done is to hold that which we already have.

CHOICES WE DO NOT HAVE

In the months that lie ahead it is essential that such issues be fully debated. But it is equally essential that we realize that there are certain choices which we do not have to make.

We do not have to choose between treason and patriotism.

We do not have to choose between bad character and good character.

We do not have to choose between men of ill will and men of good will.

The differences between us are honorable differences of men who disagree over the course that should be followed. They are not the differences between men, some of whom seek to advance and others to subvert our country.

There is ample room for partisanship in discussing the issues of our day. There is no room for partisanship based upon bigotry—bigotry of race, religion, or section. Against this, we must all be united.

TEST OF MATURITY

And we must also realize that the problems of maintaining our strength and our prosperity will not wait upon the November elections. We cannot ignore the gathering storm while we wait for the verdict from the polls. We are in this year to face with our first real test of the Nation's political maturity in the modern world.

The world—both friend and foe—is watching America this year, looking on it not as spectators, but as judges of the processes by which we set the course to which the hopes of so many others are tied.

If ever there was a need for us to show ourselves responsible in the conduct and in the spirit of our democracy, that time is now, as the world is watching us.

We need more than a great mass of statements. We need more than gimmicks that make headlines. We need more than contrived eloquence.

We need the type of responsibility which can resolve our disagreements without tearing the Nation apart in the course of that resolution.

To this end, the civil service is a hard core of the strength of America. It is the continuous demonstration that our Nation can operate effectively even while we are going through the processes that settle our differences.

This is an anniversary of great significance. And I think that we can draw from it tonight a lesson that our Government is a continuing government which will survive the storm and strife and prove forever that reasonable men can govern themselves.

Woodrow Wilson Memorial

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR.
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join the other Members of the New Jersey delegation in introducing a bill which looks toward the establishment of a Woodrow Wilson Memorial in Washington.

Citizens of New Jersey have a special interest in, and regard for, the man Woodrow Wilson. We consider him New Jersey's adopted son, and the years which he spent in our State, and the great contributions he made during that time, will never be forgotten.

Nor can the Nation forget Woodrow Wilson who, as our 28th President, gave his life, in effect, for the pursuit of world peace. The principles for which he stood, and which in large part he originated, still guide us, today, in our own very similar efforts to achieve a lasting peace, with justice.

I therefore feel it is most fitting that we reflect our gratitude in a permanent memorial to President Wilson. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, to which this bill will be referred, I intend to push for immediate committee support and approval.

Flood Control

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT W. LEVERING
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. LEVERING. Mr. Speaker, 1 year ago today the district which it is my honor to serve in Congress, the 17th of Ohio, was hit by one of the biggest, if not the biggest, floods in its history. I made a hurried flight from Washington to render whatever aid I could to the thousands of men, women, and children literally driven from their homes into the bitter cold by waters on a rampage from the swollen streams. Other parts of Ohio and adjoining States also experienced untold human suffering and material damage from this catastrophe. The American Red Cross reported that a total of $2,424,485.95 in disaster relief alone was spent in the area during the January–February period. Of course, this was only a drop in the bucket compared to the grand total representing lost furniture, fixtures, machinery and equipment, grain, livestock, water systems, roads, dikes, and, in some instances entire homes.

This was indeed a sad story but the greatest tragedy of all lies in the fact that it could have been averted by sensible flood prevention measures.

We are all aware, of course, Mr. Speaker, that flood control is expensive but we also know that floods are infinitely more costly.

I have been charged, on occasion, by those who oppose progress as a spender because of my efforts on behalf of programs for the preservation of the things we hold dear in this Nation. I want to make it clear, Mr. Speaker, that although I am by nature tight with the dollar I have no hesitancy in fighting for programs that insure the future of our people, even if it means I will be labeled a spender for doing so. Of course, no one should tolerate waste or extravagance in any program, even a good one. It seems to me that the real question is how and for what we spend our money that really counts. If the balance sheet of our Government indicates that what we appropriate for builds up the asset side of the ledger in the way of greater security for our people in the form of manageable rivers and streams and in other things we are trying to do, then I think we are on sound ground. It is when our liabilities are allowed to exceed our assets on the books that we find ourselves in trouble.

This is why, Mr. Speaker, I have been working tirelessly since taking office a year ago to procure for my district flood control assistance from our Government wherever needed. I am delighted to report that we have had the utmost supports of the U.S. Corps of Army Engineers and the Department of Defense at all times.

Upon our request, the engineers promptly rebuilt the dike at Mount Vernon, Ohio, which had given way to the raging waters of the Kokosing River a year ago. Swift action here prevented on February 10, 1959, a repetition of what happened only a few days earlier on January 21. The corps also responded to the call for help on Dry Creek. Then, too, Federal assistance in the way of funds was extended to Mount Vernon, Newark, and other areas to relieve the costs of rebuilding public facilities on the long road back.

BLACK FORK CHANNEL IMPROVEMENT PROJECT

I am glad to report that at long last the Congress last session approved funds for the completion of the Black Fork channel improvement project below Charles Mill Dam in Richland and Ashland Counties. This achievement in my mind is a real tribute to the hundreds of people who assisted me in many ways with evidence of need as we appeared before the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Speaker, I, and the good people I represent in the 17th Ohio District, are indeed grateful to the House Committee on Public Works which last year approved my request for flood control studies by the Army Engineers on the Licking River system in Licking County, Ohio; on the Clear Fork and Rocky Fork Creek, in Richland County, Ohio; on the extended study of the Kokosing River Basin, Knox County, Ohio; and on Killbuck Creek, in Holmes County, Ohio.

I trust that I will have the continued assistance of all those back home who have heretofore held up my hands in my efforts for flood-control projects and that I can depend on the same sympathetic understanding and support which I have received from my colleagues in the Congress.

Address by Hon. Frank Carlson, of Kansas, to National Convention, Association of Wheat Growers

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MILTON R. YOUNG
OF NORTH DAKOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. President, one of the most knowledgeable Members of the U.S. Senate in the field of agriculture and agricultural problems, and one of the best friends of the farmers, is the distinguished junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON]. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the text of an excellent address which he delivered on December 10, 1959, before the National Convention of the Association of Wheat Growers, at Wichita, Kans.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHEAT PROBLEM IN PERSPECTIVE

(By Senator FRANK CARLSON, National Convention of the National Association of Wheat Growers, Wichita, Kans., December 10, 1959)

It is indeed a pleasure to meet with the National Association of Wheat Growers at their 10th annual convention.

I want to tell you, personally, some of the things I told your officers and the Members of the Senate last February when I introduced Senate bill 1484, authorizing your comprehensive wheat stabilization proposals.

At that time I told your officers that, in my judgment, the wheat stabilization program, which they had developed and which was authorized in Senate bill 1484, was by far the most comprehensive and the most equitable proposal for wheat that had been developed in recent years. It was indeed an honor and a pleasure to introduce and support your wheat stabilization program in the 1st session of the 86th Congress.

I also told the Members of the Senate, at that time, that wheat producers for the past 5 years have recommended giving up the present outmoded program for wheat. I told my fellow Senators that there would be no wheat crisis today if we had had the vision and the wisdom to adopt a domestic parity program for wheat several years ago.

Last year's recordbreaking wheat crop was grown on an acreage 30 percent smaller than in 1949. Wheat yields have moved up from about 14 bushels per harvested acre in the pre-World War II period to 27 bushels in 1958, and 21 bushels in 1959. This is a record achieved by few groups in America. The wheat producers of America are entitled to high honors for this outstanding performance.

The wheat producers of America also are entitled to high honors for the vigorous market development programs which they have under way.

I have been following very closely the work of the Great Plains Wheat Market Development Association under the direction of my longtime friend, Clifford Hope, and I am indeed proud of the progress that has been made in the short time it has been operating.

Surely no one can say that the wheat growers of America are sitting on their hands waiting for the Government to solve their economic and marketing problems.

I am not one of those who considers the current wheat situation our No. 1 farm problem. I rejoice in the great productive capacity of our wheat producers. I consider it a national asset that we can produce more wheat than is needed for domestic food and for export.

All that is really required at this time is a wheat stabilization plan similar to the provisions of Senate bill 1484 which recognizes the high productive capacity of wheat growers in relation to market outlets available and deals with it in a way which is fair and equitable to wheat producers, to domestic consumers, to feed-grain and livestock producers, and to producers in other exporting countries.

THE BROADER SETTING OF THE WHEAT PROBLEM

I could spend all my allotted time relating our experiences in trying to get fair and equitable wheat legislation passed in the 1st session of the 86th Congress. However, I want to take this opportunity to discuss with you some of the more general problems of agriculture which vitally affect wheat producers. And I want to make a few observations a little later regarding the statesmanship I believe is required on the part of wheat producers and all farm leaders if economic disaster on the farm is to be avoided.

OVERRAPID TECHNICAL ADVANCE

The first broad problem which I want to mention is the overrapid technical advance now going on in agriculture. Farm technological advances are cost reducing and are largely irreversible. They have made possible our great strides in increased efficiency on the farm. Throughout the last 2 decades output per hour of farm labor has increased at a rate equal to two to three times that of the nonfarm worker.

Largely because of great technical advances in agriculture, food costs have been dropped rapidly in relation to nonfarm workers' earnings. A weekly market basket of food for a family of three, which cost 25 percent of the workers' average weekly earnings in 1958, would have cost 35 percent of their weekly earnings 10 years earlier and 41 percent of their earnings 20 years earlier.

And here is a related item that all too often is overlooked by nonfarm people—although Government costs of farm price support programs are higher than they should be, they equal only 5 percent of the money spent for food at retail. If farm program costs had been added to the cost of food in recent years, workers would have spent only 1 percent more of their weekly earnings for food.

The cost of the weekly market basket of food, plus the current record high farm program costs, take a smaller percentage of the average worker's weekly earnings today than would have been required for the food alone 5 or 10 years ago. These are important facts which must be brought to the attention of nonfarm people over and over again.

But the hard, brutal economic facts for farmers of overrapid technical advance may be summed up in this way:

Where unrestrained competition prevails the rate of increase in farm production is dependent primarily on the year-to-year increase in the use of nonfarm inputs and on the adoption of associated new technologies. These in turn depend on the backlog of cost-reducing nonfarm inputs and technologies available for more general adoption, and the educational, advertising, promotional, and credit programs devoted to obtaining their adoption.

Competent agricultural economists tell me that the backlog of cost-reducing technologies, which also are production increasing, are so great at the present time that in the absence of policies for balancing supplies with market outlets available the production of all major farm commodities will continue to expand faster than market outlets for a number of years.

In the absence of Government programs of orderly production and marketing, prices will fall faster that costs can be reduced on both the large and the smaller farms. This too-rapid rate of expanding farm production, in the absence of a realistic general farm program, may well continue, I am told, even though the number of farm-operator families in agriculture drops by one-half or more. There is no assurance that the corrective forces for overrapid technical advance will come into play until much of the agricultural industry has suffered severe financial reverses.

In this connection I call your attention to the often-overlooked importance of the Government farm program in maintaining farm income in recent years. Each year for the past 7 years, $1.5 to $2.5 billion of farm products have been removed from commercial markets by Government loan, storage, and surplus removal operations.

If the supplies diverted to Government storage and disposal, plus the potential supplies held in check by acreage allotments and the soil bank, had been channeled through commercial markets, prices would have been sharply lower than they were. A recent press report indicates that Iowa State University economists conclude that net farm income would have been one-third less for the years 1952–58 in the absence of Government support programs. Another estimate indicates that farm income would have been $4 billion or more lower in most of these years in the absence of existing farm programs.

UNEMPLOYMENT IN AGRICULTURE

Another general problem which I want to talk with you about briefly is the disproportionate burden of unemployment and underemployment which agriculture is forced to carry.

W. E. Hendrix, of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, has been conducting studies of the low-income farm problem for a number of years. His studies indicate that although the number of low-income farm people has declined in the last decade, on a relative basis, incomes for those remaining in agriculture are lower than 10 years ago.

He finds that monopoly elements in the market structure for manufactured products and for nonfarm labor prevent many, who would like to work at the prevailing wage levels, from obtaining jobs. Only in brief periods of rapid economic growth can all those seeking nonfarm employment find jobs. Since agriculture is a highly competitive industry in a larger world where less than fully competitive markets are widespread, agriculture becomes the escape valve for the bulk of the Nation's underemployment.

In the face of this market structure it is a mistake to put it mildly, to believe that a solution to the current farm problem of overrapid technical advance can be found by withdrawing production controls and lowering price supports in the expectation that sufficient farm people will shift to nonfarm jobs to equalize farm and nonfarm incomes.

CONFLICTS IN BELIEFS AND VALUES

Another general problem facing farmers and farm leaders today is the conflicts in beliefs and value judgments which have come to the fore as farm leaders attempt to formulate realistic policies for an overly dynamic agriculture in our largely industrialized society.

The cultural beliefs and values which we hold today in the rural communities have been transmitted to us from earlier less-industrialized societies. The technological revolution sweeping rural America is uprooting these older personal beliefs and values just as ruthlessly as it is uprooting long-established production and marketing practices.

However, personal value judgments and beliefs play a greater role in slowing social and economic change in the rural community than in the urban community, for in the urban community the key decisions are usually taken by a few officers and the corporations. In the rural communities each farm family has an equal voice.

Technical advance poses a dilemma for the conscience of farm people by placing in opposition their desire for equity or economic justice which may involve collective action to achieve orderly production and marketing, and their love of proprietary freedom.

Not all of our premachine age values and judgments must be junked. But our older creeds must be subjected to careful and searching inquiries. To what kind of a life do we aspire in the rural communities in this machine age? To what extent are our older creeds applicable in modern life?

The sharpest value conflicts generated by our highly productive farms and limited markets is a clash between the deep-seated desire for economic justice, and the equally deep-seated desire for proprietary freedom. All of us would prefer more—rather than less—individual freedom in our farming operations. All of us would prefer to do away with price support and production controls if farm prices and farm income would not fall to disastrously low levels.

I am confident that if we will reexamine our premachine cultural and value judgments in the light of the economic facts of the machine age, we can arrive at wider visions as to their essential meanings and we can eliminate many of the conflicts which now prevent community cooperation on a realistic farm program.

THE WHEAT VERSUS THE FEED-GRAIN PROBLEM

With this very brief explanation of some of the more general and deep-seated problems faced by all farmers, I want to turn once again to your primary interest, wheat.

As I said earlier, I do not look upon the wheat problem as the number one farm problem. Wheat has been made a political football—the whipping boy for those who do not know the nature of the farm problem. I recognize, however, that the present wheat program is not adapted to present day conditions. Increases in Government surplus stocks are still continuing and Government costs are far higher than they should be.

I am in favor of moving as rapidly as we can to replace this outmoded program with a comprehensive wheat stabilization plan. But I want to call your attention to the feed-grain problem which makes the wheat problem seem insignificant by comparison.

On September 30, 1959, the Commodity Credit Corporation had 1,200,116,000 bushels of wheat under loan and in inventory. This is a large quantity of wheat. But the Commodity Credit Corporation at that time also had under loan and in inventory 1,921,763,000 bushels of feed grains.

I ask, why have Government stocks of wheat been singled out as the number one farm problem when feed-grain stocks are 50 percent greater than the wheat stocks? I simply cannot understand why wheat has been made the whipping boy when the feed-grain surplus situation, as of today, is far more serious.

A possible explanation might be that improvement is expected in the feed-grain situation in the year ahead. Actually, however, the technical staff in the Department of Agriculture estimates that the carryover stocks of wheat at the end of this season will be increased by 2 to 3 million tons as a result of the 1959 crop being larger than available market outlets, while the carryover stocks of feed grains will be increased by 12 to 13 million tons as a result of the 1959 record feed-grain crops.

Unless there is a change in feed-grain legislation in the next session of Congress there is no doubt in my mind that the 1960 crop of feed grains will again add substantially to Government surplus stocks. As compared with the feed-grain situation, wheat simply is not the problem it is made out to be.

I personally believe that we should pass legislation in the next session of Congress which will deal realistically with both feed grains and wheat. And I believe wheat producers will have to join with the feed-grain producers in the development of a comprehensive program covering both wheat and feed grains if impending economic disaster for both groups is to be avoided.

However, I see little merit in engaging in acrimonious debate in an attempt to modernize the wheat program while ignoring the more serious feed-grain problem.

A MEANS OF IMPROVING FUTURE FARM PROGRAMS

I would like to turn now to a matter which has been on my mind a good deal lately.

In recent months I often have been appalled by the great divergence of opinion among farm leaders regarding the accomplishments of past programs, the nature of the current economic problems facing farmers and the probable economic effects of alternative Government programs. This need not continue. We have a fine, competent technical staff in the Department of Agriculture. We now have the largest staffs on record in the land-grant colleges.

There is no good reason why a larger part of this talent should not be devoted to providing the basic facts needed for a better understanding of farm programs and their accomplishments. In my opinion, if we could more nearly agree on the relevant economic facts we could rather quickly agree on desirable changes in farm price-support legislation.

It has been suggested that perhaps in future general legislation substantial administrative discretion and flexibility should be permitted for meeting the changing problems in a complex industry. The administrative discretion might be subject to periodic review, however, by providing for an annual accounting of the administrator to the farm groups and to Congress. This annual accounting might take the form of a report to farm and trade organizations covering:

1. The price and income goals for the year just closed.

2. The extent to which the goals were achieved and the contribution of the Government programs to the achievements recorded.

3. The cost to the Government of the operating programs.

4. The proposed price and income goals for the year ahead.

5. Proposed changes (within limits of existing legislation) in the operating programs to more fully achieve the goals.

The Federal Extension Service, for the past 34 years, has been holding highly useful annual economic outlook conferences which are attended by agricultural economists from the land-grant colleges and from the allied industries.

Perhaps what we need, to achieve a better understanding and a better administration of farm programs, is a rather formal annual review of farm program accomplishments at a set of meetings comparable with the national economic outlook meetings.

I am told that the British have a formal annual review of their price-support programs each February. This review is preceded by several weeks of meetings and consultations between the technical staffs of the various Government agencies dealing with food and agriculture and the national farm organizations. These meetings and consultations at the technical staff level result in general agreement as to the relevant facts regarding the price-support programs.

This British procedure seems to me to be wholly desirable and a practice which we could well emulate. The occasion of a formal annual review might also be an appropriate time for the Department of Agriculture to receive suggestions from the farm organizations and the trade groups for improvements in the program in the year ahead. The Secretary of Agriculture, of course, would be free to accept or reject such suggestions.

As I see it, however, an annual review procedure along these lines would go a long way toward providing an agreed set of facts, thus eliminating much of the needless controversy which exists today.

It would force the Secretary of Agriculture and his staff to make a realistic appraisal of both his administrative activities and his recommendations for changes.

Finally, I believe it would provide Congress with the necessary facts to more fully evaluate proposals for changes in farm programs.

In closing let me remind you that it was Senator Capper who secured the passage of the Capper-Volstead Cooperative Marketing Act in the early 1920's as a first attack on the problem of orderly marketing of farm products. The first national legislation, having as its objective the stabilization of farm prices, was passed in 1929 with the active support of President Hoover. President Hoover's first Chairman of the Federal Farm Board's Alexander Legge, the former president of the International Harvester Co., conducted a wide-ranging educational program on the need for production controls for the basic commodities, which was an important factor in the later success of the agricultural adjustment programs of the 1930's.

And I am now looking forward hopefully to the not-far-distant future when we can again reach a wide agreement on the facts relating to agriculture. When we do reach such an agreement on the facts, we can again build an effective program which will prevent further sharp declines in farm income, reverse the current buildup in Government surplus stocks, and reduce Government farm program costs.

Retirement of Hon. Gordon Canfield

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH W. MARTIN, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, there are many satisfactions and pleasures to be derived from service in this great body. There are times, however, when we are deeply saddened. Some of these occasions arise when a friend departs from this earthly life. There are other sad occasions when a Member with whom we have been closely associated announces his voluntary retirement.

One of these moments of deep regret occurred recently when I was informed that my good friend, the Honorable GORDON CANFIELD, of New Jersey, announced that he would retire at the conclusion of his present term, after a distinguished service of 20 years as a Member of the House.

GORDON CANFIELD entered the House well equipped by experience for the outstanding services he has performed. He had been secretary for 17 years previously to the Honorable George Seger, of New Jersey, whom he succeeded in Congress. It was with keen satisfaction that I watched his progress. There has never been a more diligent, more conscientious Member of this body. He was completely dedicated and devoted to the service of his district, the State of New Jersey, and the Nation. He worked so arduously and with such disregard of his own welfare that his health suffered. He could stay on and take it easier, but it is not in his character to accept a lighter burden. His sense of responsibility is so deeply rooted within him, he would feel obliged to give his job all the energy he possesses, and this might further endanger his health.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations, he has rendered outstanding service to the Nation and to the House. To me, personally, he has been a very close associate and a most loyal friend. His departure from our ranks will be a great loss to the country, to his constituents, and to the House. We will all miss him and none more than I.

That his retirement is genuinely regretted by all is evident from the following editorial published this week by the American Post, the only Jewish news weekly in northern New Jersey:

A GOOD MAN RETIRES

The decision of Congressman GORDON CANFIELD to retire from his official duties was greeted by all his friends with a deep feeling of regret. We can truly understand the sincere motives which prompted him to take the step. Nobody, but one in similar circumstances, can fully realize the strain which comes to a man in public life who is imbued with the noblest sense of civic responsibility, who takes to heart all the problems, either of the myriad of individuals who come to him for help, advice, and guidance, as well as the weighty domestic issues of the Nation, and its relationship vis-a-vis the whole world. There is a valid reason why GORDON CANFIELD is loved by all citizens, regardless of race, color, or creed, or even political persuasion. Because he was prompted not by political or partisan prejudices, but because he represented the true statesman and public servant. Every candidate for office makes a promise to serve the people. But GORDON did not have to make such promises. He showed by deed that he was a genuine humanitarian, and that he could serve his party best by being good to all. He exemplified in creed and deed the highest conception of all faiths, expressed in the Biblical doctrine: "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

We salute GORDON CANFIELD for his unselfish service to his people, and trust ever to cherish his warm friendship. We feel confident that his retirement does not mean complete isolation from the affairs of mankind. While he has earned his Sabbath after 37 years of devoted labors, we feel that his benign influence will still be felt in service to his fellow man, unhampered by the tedium of official duties. We extend our blessings to him and his beloved family for years of contentment, happiness, and good health.

A Memorial to the Memory of Woodrow Wilson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM B. WIDNALL
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. WIDNALL. Mr. Speaker, today I have joined with many other Representatives in introducing a bill authorizing the creation of a Commission to consider and formulate plans for the construction in the District of Columbia of an appropriate permanent memorial to the memory of Woodrow Wilson.

True recognition of the great abilities and service of President Woodrow Wilson is clearly shown by the sponsorship of the resolution which completely crosses party lines.

Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS, JR., who has introduced this resolution on the Senate side with many cosponsors, has received a number of suggestions for a fitting memorial.

It is my own hope that when a Commission is created and plans formulated, that a living memorial, such as suggested by the Reverend Francis Sayre, son-in-law of Woodrow Wilson, would be the truest recognition of the great contribution made by President Woodrow Wilson.

President Eisenhower has also indicated that his own belief would be for a Woodrow Wilson House, rather than a statue and that he would favor the fund to be raised by private subscription. Knowing of the great interest in this proposal throughout the United States it would certainly appear that the accumulation of necessary funds for such a project would be no serious problem.

It is my hope that prompt congressional action can be obtained on this resolution.

Let's Take America Off the Hook on the Farm Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THADDEUS J. DULSKI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. DULSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is the expressed intent of our agricultural program to limit or provide methods for the limitation of the total quantity of certain products and certain commodities. A better definition of featherbedding cannot be found elsewhere than in the legislative findings on the various crops now benefiting from this Government dole system.

It is the expressed intent of the law to encourage producers to underplant their allotments for more than a year, to allow the land to remain idle throughout the contract period—not less than 3 years—and not to harvest any crop from the acreage and not to graze any acreage. The U.S. Government agrees to make annual payments to the producers for fulfilling these "nots." Agriculture is the only business wherein idleness is not only encouraged, but is compensated for legally.

We city people are paying the price for this boondoggling featherbedding because our consumer prices are pegged to an artificial standard that has no rhyme or reason. To follow this subsidy to its logical conclusion, why should not city people be allowed to put their backyard lawns into the soil conservation program and receive annual payments for performing certain "nots"? And why should not cities receive soil bank payments for the acreage devoted to parks and playgrounds?

The farmers of our Nation, because of this subsidy program, are in the public opinion doghouse, and sweeping the dirt under the rug or whitewashing the absolute failure of the program will not get them out of it. The public patience is exhausted and they will not tolerate a continuation of the present program indefinitely until it collapses of its own weight, and takes our country with it. Individual rights are being violated when one segment of our economy freeloads on another.

The farm subsidy system is the dole system, no matter by what fancy or justification it is promoted. It is nothing more than taking money from one group of taxpayers to purchase things it does not want or need, to cause these same taxpayers to pay more for food and agricultural commodities. The next thing farmers will want is the Government to drill each of them an oil well behind each barn to provide them with cradle to grave economy security.

The economic monstrosity of the agricultural support programs have now become sacred, solid, and perpetual. The programs have been in effect for 20 years with the result of staggering surpluses, and backbreaking costs to the taxpayers. Let us take America off the hook on the farm program.

Legislation To Remove Inequities in the Social Security Program

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CECIL R. KING
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. KING of California. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing two bills today which I would like to discuss briefly. They will remove inequities in the social security program and, I believe, improve it. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I am, quite naturally, extremely interested in any legislation designed to modernize this great program. Identical legislation is being introduced in the Senate today by Senator VANCE HARTKE, a member of the Senate Finance Committee.

This legislation will—

First. Remove the present $1,200 limitation on earned income with respect to individuals receiving benefits.

Second. Provide earlier retirement at reduced benefits for men at age 62 and for women at age 60.

Third. Eliminate the requirement that an individual must have attained age 50 in order to be eligible for disability benefits.

Fourth. Provide a special tax credit against social security taxes to employers who employ individuals who are more than 45 years of age.

Mr. Speaker, this legislation will remove inequities in the social security program which experience has shown us are unwise and unfair.

EARNINGS LIMITATION

Present law forbids a person receiving social security benefits from earning more than $1,200 a year. He may receive unlimited amounts of money from dividends and annuities and still receive a social security check each month. The absurdity of this is, I believe, apparent. We are rewarding the rich and penalizing those who really need the protection offered by the social security program.

This legislation calls for the complete removal of the income limitation. Since this will involve an annual cost of almost $3 billion, it will be necessary to have this matter thoroughly considered by the proper committees of the Senate and House. I believe a comprehensive study will indicate the feasibility of doing this immediately. If for fiscal reasons it cannot be done immediately, a temporary adjustment should be made raising the present ceiling to a more realistic and reasonable figure.

EARLIER RETIREMENT

Present retirement age under the social security program is 65, except that a woman may retire at age 62 with reduced benefits. I would like to see these requirements lowered to age 60 for women and age 62 for men, if they so desire. This would be optional and at reduced benefits.

DISABILITY BENEFITS

Present law requires that a person be 50 years of age, and totally and permanently disabled, before he can qualify for disability benefits. If an individual is fully paid up and becomes totally and permanently disabled, I feel that he should be able to receive disability benefits at any age. I can think of no reason why a person at age 50 is more entitled to receive disability benefits than a person at a lower age.

HIRE THE ELDERLY

We are all aware, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, of the difficulty which individuals over the age of 45 are experiencing in finding employment. While I say hire the elderly, we cannot, of course, say that an individual as young as 45 is old. But they are old in terms of finding employment. Something must be done to encourage the employment of these individuals. One thought which has come to my mind as a possible inducement is a special tax credit equal to one-half percent of the wage with respect to which the social security tax is imposed on employees over the age of 45. This credit will be given to the employer hiring or employing an individual over the age of 45. I believe this would encourage the hiring of the elderly. It is at least worthy of consideration.

I earnestly hope that the House Ways and Means Committee will schedule hearings on these amendments to the social security program at an early date. This is not a matter which we should continue to neglect.

The Late Peter D. Henderson

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, January 21, 1960

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, when word reached Capitol Hill last Monday of the sudden death at West Palm Beach, Fla., on January 16, of Peter D. Henderson, first director of the gymnasium for Members of the House of Representatives, a pall of gloom settled over many offices in the Senate and House whose personnel had come to know and esteem the genial Scotch-American who fought as a doughboy in the American Army in the First World War.

Pete, as he was affectionately called by scores of Members of the House and Senate whom he met and served personally during his 15 years as director of the House gymnasium, was equally well known by employees in all departments of the House of Representatives. His friendly disposition was not reserved for officialdom but was known to be one of his outstanding characteristics by employees at every level.

At this point I wish to call attention to the obituary notice that appeared in the January 19 issue of the Washington Evening Star which I wish to include at the conclusion of this tribute of love and respect for one of the finest men ever employed on Capitol Hill.

After his retirement Pete made return visits annually to Washington in the spring and summer, returning to his Florida home to spend the winter months. On these annual visits he always made it a point to call at my office and those of many other Members where he knew he was certain of a royal "welcome home."

The last time I saw Pete was in October 1959 when he came to my office to discuss an article he was writing, incorporating many of his experiences during his 15 years of employment as gym director. At that time he repeated his appreciation of my statement upon entering naval service in 1941 when I alluded to the fact that I owed my fine physical condition to the benefits derived from daily activities under his direction at the House gym. During the 18 years following the statement he never forgot its utterance as he told me that along with similar complimentary remarks by several other Members such commendations were a source of recollection of his days on the Hill which gave him great pleasure in his retirement years.

In tendering this tribute of respect and esteem for my good friend, Pete Henderson, I would be remiss in appraising his many fine qualities were I to neglect to mention the great love and devotion he shared with his beloved wife, Ellen Cavanaugh Henderson, who survives him. Pete and Ellen were in the fullest sense true partners and inseparable companions traveling at home and abroad on various occasions. Together they were examples of a typical American couple capable of radiating sunshine and spreading cheer as they traversed life's highway. When the Angel of Death invaded their home the genuine sorrow expressed and the beautiful tributes tendered to the memory of the deceased husband were indicative of the indelible impression his life made on those who were privileged to know and love him.

It is my sincere wish in expressing deepest sympathy to Ellen Henderson that Almighty God will give her added strength to bear the great sorrow that has befallen her in the death of her beloved husband. It is hoped that the exemplary life of Pete Henderson when reflected upon by his loved ones will prove a source of consolation in the knowledge that he was highly respected and greatly esteemed by his fellow man.

Finally, it is my fervent prayer that God will have mercy on the soul of my departed friend and grant him eternal rest.

Mr. Speaker, the editorial from the Washington Evening Star, referred to above, follows:

PETER HENDERSON DIES—DIRECTED HOUSE GYM

Peter D. Henderson, first director of the gymnasium for the House of Representatives, died Saturday in West Palm Beach, Fla., after a heart attack and an emergency operation.

Mr. Henderson was gym director for the House when the new office building opened in 1933. He served 15 years there before his retirement.

He helped win additional space from House planners to add a half-court gym floor to the original steam bath layout. The space is used for handball, volley ball, and individual exercise. His reputation was made when he invented the congressional game of "paddle ball," the easy way to play handball on Capitol Hill.

DEFENDED PRACTICE

Generally considered an easy-tempered man, Mr. Henderson saw red when articles suggested Members of Congress were living the life of Romans when they tried to take care of their health in the gym.

A magazine once printed a picture of a Congressman in a steam bath and captioned it "Asleep in the Deep."

"These aren't Roman baths," Mr. Henderson exploded, "They're places where a Member can relax right and keep himself fit."

Among the politicians who took physical fitness seriously and joined in the workouts were Vice President Henry A. Wallace and Representative RICHARD M. NIXON.

LEARNED AUTO TRADE

Born in Scotland, Mr. Henderson took to the sea as a youth. His goal was America. He learned the automobile trade, and worked in Paterson, N.J.; Buffalo, Detroit, Cleveland, Chicago, and Santa Fe, N. Mex.

When World War I broke out he joined the American Army and fought as a sergeant. He was attending officers' training school when the armistice came.

After his retirement, Mr. Henderson and his wife spent winters in Florida and summers in Washington.

He leaves his wife, the former Ellen M. Cavanaugh, of Washington.

Funeral arrangements, which are being handled by the James T. Ryan Funeral Home, are incomplete.

Burial will be in Arlington Cemetery.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JANUARY 22, 1960

The Chaplain, Rev. Frederick Brown Harris, D.D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God of all the earth, in the baffling problems which knock for solution upon our hearts and minds, make us more and more aware that the field is the whole world. Enlarge the area of our sensitive sympathy until we hear and feel the heartbeats of human need and the kinship of brotherhood around the wide earth.

Make room in our hearts for the teeming multitudes with their terrible needs and their pleas for help—men and women in faraway places, and of all races; little children whom hunger is despoiling of joy and wonder, but who are sharers of our common humanity. In all our plenty and ease, take away our callousness, and stretch out the horizons of our vision.

We ask it in the name of Him we own as Lord of all, whose heart was ever moved with compassion. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

On request of Mr. MANSFIELD, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday, January 21, 1960, was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Maurer, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the following concurrent resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 449. Concurrent resolution to print as a House document the publication "Facts on Communism—Volume 1, The Communist Ideology" and to provide for the printing of additional copies; and

H. Con. Res. 457. Concurrent resolution to authorize printing as a House document a publication relating to the nomination and election of President and Vice President, including the manner of selecting delegates to national political conventions.

HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTIONS REFERRED

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 449) to print as a House document the publication "Facts on Communism—Volume 1, The Communist Ideology" and to provide for the printing of additional copies, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the publication entitled "Facts on Communism—Volume 1, The Communist Ideology" prepared by the Committee on Un-American Activities, House of Representatives, Eighty-sixth Congress, first session, be printed as a House document; and that there be printed thirty thousand additional copies of said document of which six thousand shall be for the use of said committee and twenty-four thousand copies to be prorated to the Members of the House of Representatives.

The concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 457) to authorize printing as a House document a publication relating to the nomination and election of President and Vice President, including the manner of selecting delegates to national political conventions, was referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed as a House document the publication entitled "Nomination and Election of the President and Vice President of the United States, Including the Manner of Selecting Delegates to Political National Conventions"; and that there be printed an additional fifty thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives, said copies to be prorated to the Members and Resident Commissioner.

FUNERAL SERVICES FOR MR. AND MRS. THOMAS C. CAPEHART

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. President, funeral services for Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Capehart, son and daughter-in-law of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART], will be held on Monday morning at 10:30 o'clock, at the First Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Ind.

DEATH OF SON AND DAUGHTER-IN-LAW OF SENATOR CAPEHART

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I regret that I was not on the floor yesterday when my colleagues expressed their sympathy because of the unfortunate death of the son and daughter-in-law of our beloved colleague, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. CAPEHART]. I knew this young man, and I had a great feeling for him. I wish to join my colleagues in their expressions of yesterday.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE DURING MORNING HOUR

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, under the rule, there will be the usual morning hour for the introduction of bills and the transaction of routine business. I ask unanimous consent that statements in connection therewith be limited to 3 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, in that respect, I should like to ask the Chair to require observance of the 3-minute limitation today, and not allow any extensions of time beyond that limitation, during the morning hour. I would have to object to any such extensions, because several of our colleagues have engagements which they must meet.

Therefore, in the interest of expediting the legislative work of the Senate, I hope it will soon be possible for the Senate to resume consideration of the unfinished business.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following letters, which were referred as indicated:

REPORT ON REVIEW OF FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE ACTIVITIES OF SMALL BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

A letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the review of financial assistance activities of the Small Business Administration, December 1958 (with an accompanying report); to the Committee on Government Operations.

SIMPLIFICATION OF ADMEASUREMENT OF SMALL VESSELS

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to simplify the admeasurement of small vessels, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

VALIDATION OF CERTAIN PAYMENTS TO MEMBERS AND FORMER MEMBERS OF U.S. COAST GUARD

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to validate certain payments of additional pay for sea duty made to members and former members of the U.S. Coast Guard (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RESOLUTION OF THE ASSOCIATION OF THE BAR OF THE CITY OF NEW YORK

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, favoring the enactment of legislation to create six additional judgeships in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the report on the need for six additional judges for the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, dated December 31, 1959, prepared by the Committee on Courts of Superior Jurisdiction of the Association of the Bar of the City of New York, has concluded that there is a threatened breakdown in the administration of justice in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York because of an insufficient number of judges to handle the increasing volume of business of that court; and

Whereas the bar is deeply concerned over the serious situation disclosed by the report and believes it is imperative that this problem be met through the prompt creation of additional judgeships for that court before a breakdown occurs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Association of the Bar of the City of New York urges the Congress of the United States to enact, at the earliest practicable date, legislation to create six additional judgeships in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York; and it is further

Resolved, That this association should join with other bar groups to take all steps possible to that end.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, without amendment:

S. Res. 208. Resolution authorizing the employment by the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service of an additional clerk (Rept. No. 1036); and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration; and

S. Res. 209. Resolution authorizing an investigation of the postal service (Rept. No. 1037); and, under the rule, referred to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

REPORT ENTITLED "REHABILITATION OF THE DISABLED IN 37 COUNTRIES OF THE WORLD" (S. REPT. NO. 1038)

Mr. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Government Operations, pursuant to Senate Resolution 347, 85th Congress, and Senate Resolution 42, 86th Congress, I submit a report made by the Subcommittee on Reorganization and International Organizations.

The report is entitled "Rehabilitation of the Disabled in 37 Countries of the World."

The report is the eighth in a series under our International Health Study. Its publication was authorized at a meeting of the Committee on Government Operations on January 18, 1960.

The report represents a summary compiled by the staff in cooperation with executive agencies and private authorities. It describes the status of programs for the handicapped in the United States and in three dozen other lands. The report enumerates both official and private programs on the domestic scene and in the field of international technical assistance. It contains a summary of my personal observations, based on the many facts which have been compiled in the course of our review.

Authority for preparation of the report is based on the resolutions earlier referred to, as well as on the standing jurisdiction of the committee.

Rule XXV of the Standing Rules of the Senate provides that the Committee on Government Operations shall, among other duties, consider matters relating to—

(D) studying intergovernmental relationships between * * * the United States and international organizations of which the United States is a member.

One such relationship concerns respective programs of technical assistance which may help train rehabilitation experts and/or launch pilot projects. Among international organizations rendering such limited assistance are the United Nations and the World Health Organization.

In addition, there have been some comparatively few, related activities by the United Nations Childrens' Fund, the International Labor Organization, and the United Nations Education, Scientific, and Cultural Organization—of all of which the United States is a member.

Of course, the most expert single source in all the world for information and work of this nature is our competent Office of Vocational Rehabilitation of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It is OVR, together with certain expert private authorities, which cooperated invaluably with our staff in preparing this report.

The report, it should be noted, is for the purpose of providing a factual framework for any future conclusions which the subcommittee may wish to present.

Publication of this report is not intended to present policy commitments by the subcommittee or by the full committee at the present time. Rather it is designed to inform the Senate and our people as to the nature and extent of present programs, some of which as specified may involve directly or indirectly the use of U.S. tax dollars and/or the voluntary contributions of private American citizens.

I ask that the report be printed, with illustrations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Minnesota.

REPORT ENTITLED "ANNUAL REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS" (S. REPT. NO. 1039)

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on Government Operations, pursuant to Senate Resolution 43, 86th Congress, 1st session, I submit a report entitled "Annual Report of the Committee on Government Operations," made by the Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, and ask that the report be printed.

During the past year, the subcommittee investigations and hearings concerned the operations of various governmental agencies, which included the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, the Department of State, the Department of Justice, the Post Office Department, the Federal Trade Commission, the General Services Administration, the District of Columbia Office of Civil Defense, and the International Cooperation Administration.

Executive hearings were held concerning the administration of U.S. foreign aid programs in Bolivia. In 1953 the United States began sending heavy quantities of emergency shipments, much of which was food, to that country. Since that date, we have given Bolivia approximately $137 million in various forms of aid. Much information concerning waste and inefficiency was developed.

These hearings disclosed that, as a result of loose administration, an inadequate U.S. mission staff, difficulties in recruitment of personnel, and a dearth of administrative ability among Bolivian officials, heavy losses, in the neighborhood of several million dollars, were sustained in connection with the U.S. aid programs in Bolivia.

These involved losses of nearly $2 million alone in foods and fibers, and an undetermined amount of losses in machinery, fertilizer, and gasoline, in heavily congested ports and in transit to Bolivia; losses of over $1 million worth of machinery and equipment which could not be accounted for; losses in the disposal of excess equipment and equipment unsuitable for local use; and losses of commodities improperly maintained or warehoused.

In addition, expenditures of millions of dollars and millions of local currency were countenanced by U.S. officials in connection with the financing of various joint projects—some abandoned, discontinued, or diverted to other uses—which were not subjected to adequate and objective preliminary technical evaluation or were not reviewed in terms of changing economic conditions while in development.

ICA's failure to provide a mission controller when needed, to institute records of accountability promptly, to provide a ports, transportation, and warehousing technician, to institute timely end-use audits, and to take prompt action as recommended by internal audit reports were some of the reasons for the inefficient operation of the program. The present director of the mission in Bolivia is attempting to correct the many irregularities that existed.

Hearings were held concerning the state of readiness of the Civil Defense organization in the District of Columbia. It was ascertained that hundreds of thousands of copies of various official publications had been in civil defense headquarters for many years without being distributed. They had no survival plan. They had no evacuation routes posted. A survey by the Federal civil defense organization showed that the warning system was only 30 percent effective in densely populated areas. It was ascertained that many experts in various fields, such as radiation, who were employed by the Federal Government were not being utilized on a temporary basis by the District of Columbia in matters of civil defense.

Public hearings were held in connection with Senate bill 550, which was introduced by Senator KARL E. MUNDT, cosponsored by me. It was disclosed that there are many types of fraudulent schemes in operation throughout the United States, one of the largest of which is loans to small businessmen who are in need of funds. These businessmen pay an advance fee to these firms, after numerous misrepresentations, and, thereafter, ascertain that they will not secure the loan. This type of fraud has resulted in the operators becoming enriched of $25 to $50 million annually.

Other schemes highlighted include vanity publishers, who prey upon elderly and handicapped people; hair growers, who falsely claim that hair can be restored to baldheaded men; skip tracing, a deceptive means used in the location of delinquent debtors; common ailments, such as cancer, rheumatism, and arthritis, and the misrepresentations that permanent cures are available; scare tactics, utilized by many salesmen in the sale of their products; work-at-home schemes, where many housewives are defrauded; easy-to-win contests, where each winner receives credit on the purchase of items which are exorbitantly priced; and vending machines, which are sold to individuals based on fraudulent representations.

The bill was not reported to the floor of the Senate, because, under presently existing penal legislation, the U.S. Post Office Department has hundreds of investigations pending in many of the categories mentioned above, and have been successful in obtaining many convictions.

The subcommittee was able to save $2,015,981 when, as a result of our inquiry, the Navy's aviation supply office at Philadelphia canceled existing contracts of a highly technical nature involving spare parts requirements.

Inquiry concerning transportation of household effects by the Department of State for its personnel being sent overseas has resulted in that agency putting into effect a new system. It is anticipated that the resultant savings will be approximately $200,000 a year.

Throughout the year, the subcommittee was responsible for corrective action being taken in a number of Federal agencies, such as the General Services Administration and the Philadelphia Quartermaster Depot, which are detailed in this report.

Because of my required attendance at the hearings of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field, Senator HENRY M. JACKSON was acting chairman for most of these hearings.

On January 30, 1957, the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field was created by the Senate, pursuant to Senate Resolution 74. It was continued pursuant to Senate Resolution 221, dated January 29, 1958, and Senate Resolution 44, dated February 2, 1959. During the past 3 years, a large portion of the staff of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations has been on loan to this select committee. Although the professional staff of the subcommittee consists of 11 men, 6 of them have been assigned and utilized by the aforementioned select committee during the 3 years of its existence. In addition, one clerk from this subcommittee was loaned to the select committee and two clerks worked jointly for both committees.

The appropriation for this subcommittee during the past year was $220,000. Of this amount, $27,000 was expended for purposes of the Select Committee on Improper Activities in the Labor or Management Field and $79,000 is unexpended and will be returned to the Treasury of the United States. The attainments of the subcommittee, as revealed in this annual report, therefore, cost $114,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be received and printed, as requested by the Senator from Arkansas.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

As in executive session,

The following favorable reports of nominations were submitted:

By Mr. JOHNSTON of South Carolina, from the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service:

John M. McKibbin, of Pennsylvania, to be Deputy Postmaster General;

Bert B. Barnes, of Iowa, to be an Assistant Postmaster General, vice John M. McKibbin; and George M. Moore, of Kentucky, to be an Assistant Postmaster General.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CARLSON:

S. 2883. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide the same treatment for prepaid dues income received by a nonprofit motor club as is provided for prepaid subscription income; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CLARK:

S. 2884. A bill for the relief of Dr. William Medway; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CLARK (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. DOUGLAS):

S. 2885. A bill to establish an Office of Coal Research within the Department of the Interior and to provide for and encourage research to determine improved means of producing and utilizing coal; to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

(See the remarks of Mr. CLARK when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. HARTKE:

S. 2886. A bill for the relief of Nikolija Lazic; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BYRD of Virginia:

S. 2887. A bill for the relief of Charles Bradford LaRue; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PASTORE:

S. 2888. A bill for the relief of Mesrop Samoian; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BIBLE:

S. 2889. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901, to eliminate the requirement that certain District of Columbia corporations be required to have a majority of their trustees citizens of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. FULBRIGHT (by request):

S. 2890. A bill to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

(See the remarks of Mr. FULBRIGHT when he introduced the above bill, which appear under a separate heading.)

By Mr. WILEY:

S.J. Res. 153. Joint resolution to establish an Interdepartmental Committee on Utilization of Surplus Farm Commodities; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See the remarks of Mr. WILEY when he introduced the above joint resolution, which appear under a separate heading.)

OFFICE OF COAL RESEARCH

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, on behalf of myself, the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. MCGEE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. CARROLL], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH], and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS], I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to establish an Office of Coal Research within the Department of Interior, to promote new and improved means of producing and using coal.

We passed a good coal research bill last year, but the President ignored the urgent needs of the coal industry, and vetoed the bill on the stated ground that the research commission called for in the bill should have been under the direction of the Secretary of Interior, and should not be an independent agency.

Accordingly, my bill would establish a new Office of Coal Research in the Interior Department. Substance, not form, is the important thing. We must create without further delay the finest research and development program modern science will permit, to aid the employees and employers in the great, but ailing, coal industry. I am convinced that my bill has the best chance of gaining widespread approval of all necessary parties.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be held at the desk until the close of business next Monday, for the purpose of soliciting additional sponsors

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The bill (S. 2885) to establish an Office of Coal Research within the Department of the Interior, and to provide for and encourage research to determine improved means of producing and utilizing coal, introduced by Mr. CLARK (for himself, Mr. MURRAY, Mr. MCGEE, Mr. CARROLL, Mr. RANDOLPH, and Mr. DOUGLAS), was received, read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

CERTAIN OBLIGATIONS OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE GENEVA CONVENTIONS FOR PROTECTION OF WAR VICTIMS

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, by request, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a bill to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes.

The proposed legislation has been requested by the Acting Secretary of State in a letter to the Vice President of January 14, 1960, and I am introducing the bill in order that there may be a specific bill to which Members of the Senate and the public may direct their attention and comments. This bill is identical to one which the Senate passed in 1957, but which failed to receive attention in the House of Representatives.

I reserve my right to support or oppose this bill, as well as any suggested amendments to it, when the matter is considered by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD, together with the letter from the Acting Secretary of State to the Vice President with regard to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the bill and letter will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 2890) to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes, introduced by Mr. FULBRIGHT, by request, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 706 of chapter 33, title 18, United States Code, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"§ 706. Protective emblems under the Geneva Conventions

"(a) Whoever wears or displays the sign of the Red Cross or any insignia in colorable imitation thereof for the fraudulent purpose of inducing the belief that he is a member of or an agent for the American National Red Cross; or

"Whoever, whether a corporation, association or person, other than a person authorized by the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, including the American National Red Cross and its duly authorized employees and agents, the medical units and establishments of the armed forces of the United States and their duly authorized personnel, chaplains attached to the armed forces of the United States, the Red Cross Societies of neutral countries and the international Red Cross organizations and their duly authorized personnel, uses the emblem of the Greek red cross on a white ground, or any sign or insignia in colorable imitation thereof or the words 'Red Cross' or 'Geneva Cross' or any combination of these words—shall be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

"This subsection shall not make unlawful the use of such emblem, sign or insignia (1) to mark civilian hospitals, convoys of vehicles, hospital trains, ships and aircraft carrying wounded, infirm or sick civilians, or medical personnel and equipment, when permitted under regulations and orders which the President is hereby authorized to issue in accordance with Articles 18, 21, and 22 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949; (2) to mark ambulances and the location of first-aid stations when permitted under regulations and orders which the President is hereby authorized to issue in accordance with Article 44 of the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field of August 12, 1949; or (3) on armlets to identify the personnel of civilian hospitals where permitted under regulations and orders which the President is hereby authorized to issue in accordance with Article 20 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949.

"This subsection shall not make unlawful such use of any such emblem, sign, insignia or words for the same purpose and for the same class of goods as was lawful on the date of enactment of this title: Provided, That such use shall not extend to the placing of the Red Cross emblem, sign or insignia upon aircraft, vessels, vehicles, buildings or other structures, or upon the ground, except as otherwise permitted by this subsection or by the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949.

"(b) Whoever, whether a corporation, association, or person, other than a person authorized by the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, uses the emblem of the red crescent on a white ground or a red lion and sun on a white ground, or any sign or insignia in colorable imitation thereof—shall be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both.

"This subsection shall not be deemed to prohibit a corporation, association or person that actually used such emblem, sign or insignia prior to February 2, 1956, from continuing such use for the same purpose and for the same class of goods: Provided, That such use shall not extend to the placing of the emblems described in this subsection upon aircraft, vessels, vehicles, buildings or other structures, or upon the ground, except as otherwise permitted by this subsection or by the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949.

"(c) Whoever, whether a corporation, association or person, following a proclamation by the President in time of war or national emergency that application of this subsection is necessary, shall use in such location and size as to be recognizable from the air, whether by visual or photographic means, the letters 'PW' or 'PG' for any purpose except marking the location of a prisoner of war camp, or the letters 'IC' for any purpose except marking the location of an internment camp, or any other marking, sign, emblem or insignia agreed upon by the United States and any other country and proclaimed by the President for marking the location of such camps—shall, unless such use or placing conforms to such regulations as may have been issued under authority of the President, be fined not more than $250 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both."

The letter presented by Mr. FULBRIGHT is as follows:

JANUARY 14, 1960.

The Honorable RICHARD M. NIXON,
President of the Senate.

DEAR MR. VICE PRESIDENT: The United States, on August 2, 1955, following favorable Senate consideration, ratified the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949. These conventions came into force for the United States on February 2, 1956.

In its report (Ex. Rept. No. 9, U.S. Senate, 84th Cong., 1st sess., June 22, 1955) the Senate Foreign Relations Committee reviewed the background and testimony regarding the prohibitions respecting use of the Red Cross emblem contemplated under articles 53 and 54 of the Convention for the Amelioration of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, and concluded as follows:

"Because of the facts which have been set forth above, the committee, after extended consultation with the executive departments concerned, the American National Red Cross, and representatives of the pre-1905 users, considers that a reservation should be adopted which would relieve the United States of any obligation to disturb continued enjoyment of any use of the emblem which was lawful under domestic law in the United States at the time of ratifying the convention. Such a use would be one lawfully begun prior to January 5, 1905, and permitted to continue under the act of January 5, 1905, the act of June 23, 1910, and subsequent Federal legislation, subject, of course, to extinction by abandonment at any time.

"Moreover, the protection of the national interest—and especially the interest of wounded and sick—requires that such a reservation be qualified so as to express the acceptance by the United States of an obligation to enact legislation prohibiting any use of the emblem on aircraft, vessels, vehicles, buildings, or other structures, or upon the ground, except as authorized under the terms of the conventions.

"Accordingly, the committee, in reporting the convention to the Senate, recommends that the resolution giving its advice and consent to ratification, include the following reservation:

"'The United States, in ratifying the Geneva Convention for the Amelioration of the Condition of the Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, does so with the reservation that irrespective of any provision or provisions in said convention to the contrary, nothing contained therein shall make unlawful or obligate the United States of America to make unlawful, any use or right of use within the United States of America and its territories and possessions of the Red Cross emblem, sign, insignia, or words as was lawful by reason of domestic law and a use begun prior to January 5, 1905, provided such use by pre-1905 users does not extend to the placing of the Red Cross emblem, sign, or insignia upon aircraft, vessels, vehicles, buildings or other structures, or upon the ground.'"

This reservation was unanimously approved by the Senate, and the United States ratified the convention subject to this reservation.

In the same report, the Foreign Relations Committee took note of certain other provisions relating to emblems or markings that give rise to a need for legislative implementation. Specifically, the committee observed that—

"Under article 38 of the Convention on Wounded and Sick in Armed Forces in the Field, certain countries are permitted to use, in place of the red cross, the red crescent or the red lion and sun on a white ground. While article 53 also forbids commercial use of these distinctive signs, without effect on rights acquired through prior use, no legislation restricts the use of such emblems in the United States. For this reason it will be necessary to make appropriate changes in title 18, section 706, of the United States Code.

"Similarly, as already noted, the 1949 conventions for the first time authorize the use of the Red Cross emblem by the International Red Cross and its personnel (art. 44, Wounded and Sick Convention), civilian hospitals and personnel engaged in their administration, and convoys of vehicles, hospital trains, and aircraft carrying wounded and sick civilians (arts. 18–22, Civilians Convention). Further amendment of title 18, section 706, of the United States Code would seem necessary to anticipate these uses."

In addition to protecting usage of the Red Cross and other emblems as mentioned above, the proposed legislation would protect the marking of prisoner-of-war camps and internment camps in time of war or national emergency. Subsection (c) of the bill would prohibit the use in such times of the letters "PW," "PG," "IC," or any other marking, sign, emblem, or insignia agreed upon by the United States and any other country in such location and size as to be recognizable from the air, whether by visual or photographic means, for any purpose except marking the location of a prisoner-of-war camp or internment camp. The restrictions on such use in time of war or national emergency would implement article 23 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Treatment of Prisoners of War of August 12, 1949, and article 83 of the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War of August 12, 1949. Such protection of prisoners is considered a desirable safeguard of these victims of war. It is also believed that enactment by the Congress of this provision could stimulate other countries into enacting similar legislation, thus enhancing the internationally beneficial protections contained in these articles of the Geneva conventions.

Accordingly, there is submitted for your consideration and favorable action a draft bill to give effect to certain obligations of the United States under the Geneva Conventions for the Protection of War Victims of August 12, 1949, by regulating the use of the Red Cross and other emblems, and for other purposes. The scope and effect of this draft bill is clearly stated in the foregoing passages from the Report of the Foreign Relations Committee and in the preceding paragraph hereof.

The draft bill herewith submitted is identical to S. 1779, which passed the Senate on August 5, 1957, 85th Congress, 1st session. S. 1779 was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives on August 6, 1957, but that committee took no action upon it. In its report to accompany S. 1779 (Rept. No. 772, U.S. Senate, 85th Cong., 1st sess., July 30, 1957), the Senate Foreign Relations Committee declared:

"Enactment of the present bill is necessary to enable the United States to honor important commitments which were undertaken by our Government when the Geneva Conventions of 1949 were ratified."

In implementing the obligations just referred to, it may be noted that the draft bill uses the phrase "colorable imitation" in preference to "colored in imitation" in section 706, title 18, United States Code, "Colorable imitation" appears to be the term which has come commonly to be used in trademark law in connection with similarity of marks and appears, for example, in connection with infringement of trademarks at sections 1114(1) and 1127 (definition) of title 15, United States Code. It is intended, in achieving consistency in terminology, to make clear the original legislative meaning, which in the present context would include any imitation so resembling a protected emblem as to be likely to cause confusion, mistake, or deception.

The Department has been advised by the Bureau of the Budget that there is no objection to the resubmission of this proposal to the Congress for its consideration.

Sincerely yours,

LIVINGSTON T. MERCHANT,
Acting Secretary.

INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON SURPLUS FARM COMMODITIES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution for establishing an Interdepartmental Committee on Utilization of Surplus Farm Commodities.

The committee would be comprised of the Secretaries of State, Agriculture, Commerce, Health, Education, and Welfare, or their designees, the Director of the International Cooperation Administration, and representatives of any other agencies of the executive branch, or other qualified persons the President may designate.

The purpose would be to carry out more effective utilization of the surplus farm commodities at home and abroad.

Today the Nation has on hand $9.5 billion worth of surpluses. Unfortunately, the existence of these surpluses serves to depress farm income and thus indirectly adversely affects the whole economy.

Too, the cost of storing such surpluses costs the American taxpayer over $1 million a day.

Paradoxically, we find that there are still people in this country existing on substandard nutritional levels. Around the globe, too, it is estimated that about one-half of the 2.7 billion people in the world are undernourished, and almost one-third live on inadequate diets.

The creation of a more effective program for utilizing these valuable resources—making them an asset instead of a liability—offers rich rewards of economic, political, strategic, as well as humanitarian values.

We recognize, of course, that our mountainous stockpiles of surplus are not likely to disappear with a wave of a magic wand.

However, the establishment of the Committee, I believe, would help to ascertain that each of the departments of the Government would be utilizing surpluses as fully as possible, domestically, as well as in support of our economic programs abroad.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be printed at this point in the RECORD following my remarks. In addition, I request that the joint resolution lie on the table for a period of 1 week to allow Senators who may so desire to join in co-sponsoring this proposal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the joint resolution will be printed in the RECORD and will lie on the desk, as requested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 153) to establish an Interdepartmental Committee on Utilization of Surplus Farm Commodities, introduced by Mr. WILEY, was received, read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the Federal Government, in the operation of price support and other agricultural programs, has accumulated stocks of surplus agricultural commodities having a value of approximately $9.5 billion; and

Whereas the cost to the American taxpayer of storing these stocks of surplus agricultural commodities amounts to more than $1 million per day; and

Whereas the existence of such surpluses serves to depress farm income and thus to affect directly or indirectly the economy of the Nation; and

Whereas there are still people in the United States existing on substandard nutritional levels; and

Whereas about one-half of the 2.7 billion people in the world are estimated to be undernourished; and

Whereas the utilization of surplus foods at home and abroad to a moderate degree have been utilized to promote economic stability in American agriculture, expand international trade in agricultural commodities, encourage the economic development of friendly countries, promote the collective strengths of the free world; and

Whereas the creation of better programs for utilization of such resources offers rich rewards of economic, political, strategic—as well as humanitarian—values; and

Whereas such uses would bring about a more rapid reduction of our stocks of such commodities, and at the same time derive the greatest possible benefits therefrom: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established in the executive branch of the Government an agency to be known as the Interdepartmental Committee on Utilization of Surplus Farm Commodities (hereafter referred to as the Committee) which shall consist of the following (or their designees):

(1) The Secretary of State;

(2) The Secretary of Agriculture;

(3) The Secretary of Commerce;

(4) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare;

(5) The Director of the International Cooperation Administration; and

(6) Representatives from any other agencies in the executive branch, or other qualified persons, as the President shall deem advisable.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the Committee to make a continuing study for the purpose of ascertaining new ways and means of utilizing surplus farm commodities to fulfill humanitarian needs, to aid peoples subsisting on inadequate diets at home and abroad, and to implement and support our foreign economic policies, and for the purpose of coordinating the activities of the various departments and agencies of the Government engaged in carrying out programs involving the utilization of surplus agricultural commodities.

SEC. 3. The Committee shall terminate at the expiration of three (3) years after the date of approval of this joint resolution; or at such earlier date as the President, because of the disappearance of surpluses, may determine that the need for such a Committee no longer exists.

PROPOSED LEGISLATION FOR EDUCATION OF MIGRATORY WORKERS AND THEIR CHILDREN—ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS OF BILLS

Under authority of the order of the Senate of January 20, 1960, the names of Senators MORSE, RANDOLPH, NEUBERGER, and YARBOROUGH were added as additional cosponsors of the following bills, introduced by Mr. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, on January 20, 1960:

S. 2864. A bill to provide certain payments to assist in providing improved educational opportunities for children of migrant agricultural employees; and

S. 2865. A bill to provide grants for adult education for migrant agricultural employees.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS TRADE ACT OF 1960—ADDITIONAL COSPONSOR OF BILL

Mr. KEATING. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced Senate bill 2882, entitled "The Fair Labor Standards Trade Act of 1960." I asked that the bill lie on the table for cosponsorship.

The distinguished and able junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. PASTORE] has indicated to me that he desires to become a cosponsor, and I ask that his name be added to the list of cosponsors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. KEATING. I want to express my appreciation to the Senator for this very gratifying indication of his support of the measure.

NOTICE OF PUBLIC HEARINGS ON EXAMINATION OF U.S. FOREIGN POLICY

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a press release announcing that the Committee on Foreign Relations will hold its first public hearing in connection with its examination of U.S. foreign policy which was authorized by the Senate late in the 2d session of the 85th Congress be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the press release was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senator J. W. FULBRIGHT, chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, announced today that on January 28 at 10:30 a.m. in room 4221, New Senate Office Building, the committee will hold its first public hearing in connection with its examination of U.S. foreign policy which was authorized by the Senate late in the 2d session of the 85th Congress.

The principal witnesses will be Mr. E. Finley Carter, president of the Stanford Research Institute, and Mr. Wallace Brode, science adviser to the Department of State.

The hearing to be held next Thursday will deal with a study entitled "Possible Nonmilitary Scientific Developments and Their Potential Impact on Foreign Policy Problems of the United States." This study is one in a series of 15 studies which were prepared at the request of the Committee on Foreign Relations. It explores prospective scientific developments of the next decade and their potential impact on foreign policy problems of the United States. It also explores the possibility of making more positive use of science and technology to help meet foreign policy problems.

In connection with its study of U.S. foreign policy, the Committee on Foreign Relations concluded 12 research contracts calling for 14 studies. One other study, that completed by the Council on Foreign Relations of New York on the "Basic Aims of U.S. Foreign Policy," was done without charge to the committee. The completed studies in the U.S. foreign policy area generally, in the order of their issuance, are as follows:

1. "Worldwide and Domestic Economic Problems and Their Impact on the Foreign Policy of the United States," by the Corporation for Economic and Industrial Research, Inc., Arlington, Va. Published as committee print August 1959.

2. "Possible Nonmilitary Scientific Developments and Their Potential Impact on Foreign Policy Problems of the United States," by the Stanford Research Institute, Menlo Park, Calif. Published as committee print September 1959.

3. "U.S. Foreign Policy in Western Europe," by the Foreign Policy Research Institute of the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia, Pa. Published as committee print October 15, 1959.

4. "U.S. Foreign Policy in Africa," by the Program of African Studies of Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill. Published as committee print October 23, 1959.

5. "U.S. Foreign Policy in Asia," by Conlon Associates, Ltd., San Francisco, Calif. Published as committee print November 1, 1959.

6. "Operational Aspects of U.S. Foreign Policy," by the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs of Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y. Published as committee print November 11, 1959.

7. "Basic Aims of U.S. Foreign Policy," by the Council on Foreign Relations, New York, N.Y. Published as committee print November 25, 1959.

8. "Developments in Military Technology and Their Impact on U.S. Strategy and Foreign Policy," by the Washington Center of Foreign Policy Research, the Johns Hopkins University, Washington, D.C. Published as committee print December 6, 1959.

9. "Formulation and Administration of U.S. Foreign Policy," by the Brookings Institution, Washington, D.C. Published as committee print January 13, 1960.

10. "Principal Ideological Conflicts, Variations Thereon, Their Manifestations, and Their Present and Potential Impact on the Foreign Policy of the United States," by the Center for International Affairs, Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass. Published as committee print January 17, 1960.

Studies not yet published are:

"Foreign Policy Implications for the United States of Economic and Social Conditions in Lesser Developed and Uncommitted Countries," by the Center for International Studies, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge, Mass.

"U.S. Foreign Policy in the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe," by the Russian Institute, Columbia University, New York, N.Y.

"U.S. Foreign Policy in the Near East," by the Institute of Mediterranean Affairs, Inc., New York, N.Y.

Senator FULBRIGHT said: "Despite the fact that the areas to be covered in these studies have been specified with care and the committee has emphasized many, many times that the studies are in no way binding upon committee members, from time to time individuals who have read these reports have thought they represent the views of the members of the committee.

"I take this occasion to emphasize that the studies which are received will supply the committee with background material for consideration in preparing a final report to the Senate. The committee is, of course, free to accept or to reject the findings and recommendations of the organizations and institutions submitting studies. It is the function of the committee to evaluate the studies which are submitted. The purpose of holding public hearings on these studies is to receive testimony from all interested parties prior to the preparation of a final report. In that way it will be possible for the committee to test the soundness of the findings and recommendations in these studies before reaching its own conclusions and submitting its final report to the Senate.

"In addition, I wish to emphasize that the committee is approaching this assignment in a nonpartisan manner, endeavoring to avoid transitory issues and to concentrate on the fundamental forces at work within and without the United States which must be understood if our foreign policy is to serve the Nation."

The Committee on Foreign Relations also expects to hold hearings on February 11 on a study entitled "Worldwide and Domestic Economic Problems and Their Impact on the Foreign Policy of the United States," prepared by the Corporation for Economic and Industrial Research, Inc. All interested parties wishing to present testimony in connection with the committee's hearings on its studies of U.S. foreign policy should contact the chief clerk of the committee without delay.

ADDRESSES, EDITORIALS, ARTICLES, ETC., PRINTED IN THE RECORD

On request, and by unanimous consent, addresses, editorials, articles, etc., were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. BIBLE:

Statement by him giving notice of a preview by the National Park Service of the Old Stone House at 3051 M Street, in Georgetown.

By Mr. SYMINGTON:

Address delivered by Representative WRIGHT PATMAN, of Texas, at special convocation at East Texas Baptist College, Marshall, Tex., October 6, 1959.

By Mr. BENNETT:

Address entitled "A Crusade for Decency," delivered by Secretary of Agriculture Ezra Taft Benson in Salt Lake City, Utah, on October 11, 1959.

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on my own behalf, and under the 3-minute limitation, I now seek recognition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. President, on occasion I have addressed the Senate regarding what I consider to be the deplorable conditions which exist on the Indian reservations in Montana and elsewhere in the West. I have felt, and I continue to feel, that a great deal of this situation is due to the inflexible policies and attitude of the Bureau of Indian Affairs. My opinion has not been altered, and I continue to feel that there is a very serious need for alteration of our Federal Indian policy.

One of the finest things that has been done in the field of journalism, insofar as the Indians are concerned, is a series of 12 articles that have been published in the Denver Post. They were written by Robert W. Fenwick. He has done an extremely fine job, and the articles show a tremendous insight into this problem.

I wish to call to my colleagues' attention two paragraphs from a letter I received from Mr. Fenwick; they give an example of his grasp of the situation:

First, there is a vivid need for a uniform policy in the handling of Indian welfare and general assistance. Second, but not less important by any measure, I'm convinced that we should halt the sale of allotted lands at least long enough to appraise the long-range effects of such sales.

I'd also recommend that we stop talking about termination of Federal trusteeship, and concentrate on the problems which we hope will be resolved simply by ignoring them.

I am especially interested in these articles because they are devoted largely to the Indians of Montana. In our State, we have seven different reservations, each with its many and different problems. I commend this series of articles to my colleagues here in the Senate; and I wish to say to my good friends the Senators from Colorado (Mr. CARROLL and Mr. ALLOTT), that in Robert W. Fenwick they have an extremely talented journalist serving the Denver area.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this series of 12 articles published in the Denver Post between January 3 and January 15, be printed at the conclusion of my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 3, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—"PLACE OF SORROWS" REVEALS A STORY OF MISERY FOR INDIANS

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

"In Billings, Mont., there is a hill. In Sioux it is called 'Place of Many Sorrows.' There a child dies every week. A wife dies too young. A man—he is old and sad at 30, and the sick are too many."

Thus did the letter and the story begin. That was 5 weeks and 3,500 miles ago.

Laboriously printed in ink on the back side of a Government form, the letter was eloquent in its very simplicity, a classic of sincerity enhanced by its scrambled grammar and misspelled words.

The author was obviously an Indian. Of the Place of Many Sorrows, he continued:

"The dead songs are singed there till a tall man runs from his shack, from all his family and he drinks to not hear. Now he sits, drunk so much he cannot walk and too sad to not sing them same hard songs.

"He cannot get away. There is no place to go. These men, these people, all are Indians who have sold there land."

He was writing about America's dispossessed, the confused and ill-advised Indians who sold their birthright when they sold their land, often for a pittance. Deprived of their only means of making a living, deprived even of a place to live, they have moved to the cities. There they have found shelter, of sorts, in festering shacktown slums.

"Now the Indians sit on the White Man neck and the White Man is sadden because of this," the letter went on. "We are both sad for only grief has come to us both because of sale.

"Soon, if this goes on, all Indians must come to town. What town want one more Place of Many Sorrows? Who will fight this thing? What man is so brave?

"If all Indians come to town it costs town plenty of money each year. It costs for schools and the relief money and for more public hospitals. I think maybe for more police and bigger jails, too, and teachers.

"Now something must be done. Who will do it?"

That anonymous letterwriter's prayer became my assignment 5 weeks ago. I traveled Wyoming, Nebraska, South Dakota, and Montana. I covered reservations, the poverty-ridden "pup towns" on the reservations and the sordid, gaudy, blood-and-wine-soaked skid rows of border towns.

I interviewed scores of Indians and their tribal leaders, Government officials, priests and ministers at missions, hospitals and community centers for Indians; talked to Congressmen, ranchers, businessmen, law-enforcement officers, social workers, and ordinary citizens exposed to Indian influences.

I was shocked by what I heard and saw: Unbelievable drunken orgies paid for with relief moneys; poverty, disease, filth, and overcrowding; uninhibited lovemaking in public; young Indian girls in prostitution; widespread illegitimacy subsidized by welfare funds; degeneracy, lawlessness, murder.

I found not one, but three "Places of Many Sorrows," poverty pits where a tall man watches helplessly as his last hope flickers and turns to ashes of lifelong despair.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 3, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—VAST LANDS DISSIPATED, SIOUX INDIANS EXIST IN SQUALOR

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Land is a precious thing. It gains in value with each and every birth in this 20th century population explosion.

You think of this and ponder its meaning as you drive eastward along U.S. Highway 20 through the northwestern rim of Nebraska's panhandle.

Here the land billows and swells in ocean-like expanse as far as the eye can see. Your car whisks you through comfortable little towns and communities built upon and prospering from the vast, unending wheatfields and grass-rich rangelands.

Along the way you see spacious, well-kept homes, bright and smiling under fresh coats of paint. There are small but efficient markets, shops, the machinery-jumbled lots of farm implement dealers, sturdy little banks dealing in the commerce of the area.

Just north of this highway, in South Dakota, lie the sprawling Rosebud and Pine Ridge Reservations of the populous Sioux. The reservations contribute generously to the business life of many communities along U.S. 20. But strangely, most of business comes from non-Indians—whites who have purchased Indian lands within the reservation and have consolidated them into highly productive ranches.

Once the Sioux Nation owned all this land. During the first half of the 19th century the Sioux occupied a tremendous acreage including all of what became Iowa, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and parts of Montana and Wyoming.

Sioux occupancy and use of the land was contested, however, by the Cheyenne, Arapaho, Crow, Assiniboine, Gros-Ventre, Mandan, and Arrickaras Tribes. Indian wars ensued.

NATION DIVIDED

In 1851 the United States negotiated a treaty and the Sioux Tribe was granted the territory ranging from the Black Hills of South Dakota eastward over an area extending from the Platte to the Missouri Rivers.

By successive Executive orders this great empire was whittled down through the years and eventually, by order of March 2, 1889, the great Sioux Nation was divided into separate reservations—the Rosebud, Pine Ridge, Standing Rock, Cheyenne River, Lower Brule, and Crow Creek.

The story of the Sioux is typical of what happened to many other reservations of the West. Additional lands were ceded to the Government in 1901. In all, 382,000 acres were cut from the Rosebud Reservation.

LANDS ALLOTTED

Then in 1889, allotments of land were made to individual Indians. Heads of families were allotted 320 acres each of agricultural land, orphans and adults over 18, each received 160 acres, and each child 80 acres.

If the land was grazing land, twice as much was allotted. In all, 8,602 allotments were made covering 1,869,463 acres of Rosebud Reservation land.

Government records show that as of June 30, 1959, the Rosebud Sioux had only 575,486 acres of allotted land remaining. The rest, 1,293,977 acres, had been patented, sold, exchanged, donated, or otherwise disposed of.

Of unallotted land or land owned by the tribe, there were 374,648 acres this year. The Government owns an additional 39,245 acres. The total reservation stands at 989,279 acres, quite a comedown from the original bulk of the mighty Sioux Nation.

MONEY SQUANDERED

What becomes of Indians who sell their allotted land?

Many have taken the money and gone to other parts of the country to work at the white man's jobs.

Others, however, have dropped their sale money in one wild spree and settled down as squatters wherever they could. That's the scene on the north side of Highway 20—up into South Dakota.

There, in contrast to the evidences of productivity on lands formerly owned by the Sioux, the Indian lives in abject poverty.

There is little difference in the land. Indeed, much of the land to the north is better for grazing because it is just outside the sand hill country characteristic of northwestern Nebraska.

SQUALID HUTS

But the scene is different—and repetitious. The former landlords exist in squalid huts strewn around and about with an amazing miscellany of junk that may include everything from tin cans, rusted automobile parts, and castoff clothing to pieces of rotting lumber and old fence wire.

Out in back stands the universal privy, teetering in the wind, door banging and seldom used if there are no strangers around.

Over this dismal terrain there usually ranges a pack of a half dozen or more hungry dogs, scavengers, which must at least be credited with maintaining a modest degree of sanitation about the premises.

Two or more families may occupy one of these tar-paper shacks. Here is an atmosphere redolent with foul odors, the family or families sleep, cook, eat, treat their many illnesses, and multiply in numbers.

Some members of the family may work when there is seasonal employment. Not infrequently the sole support for all occupants of the hut is the unmarried mother of numerous illegitimate children who receives a bounty from the Government for each of her offspring in the form of a check from Aid to Dependent Children.

ONE WILD NIGHT

Also not infrequently, this check is cashed at the skid row bar of a nearby, off-reservation town and the sum blown in one glorious night of drinking and fighting. The spree most often ends in the local jail and, upon release, the drinkers return to their shack, empty handed and sick, hoping to receive some sort of additional welfare assistance.

It isn't a pretty scene from any angle. And if you drive far enough north off U.S. 20 you'll soon come to a conclusion that the once great American Indian whom we had hoped to transform into the great Indian American, is no longer a heroic figure posed in tribal regalia against a western skyline and idolized by Boy Scouts all over the world.

There are exceptions, and we'll meet them along the way, but by and large the Indian who remains in our northern areas has become a wretched figure, stripped of pride, steeped in poverty, beset by disease and motivated by ambition only to acquire the most fundamental necessities of life plus heaps of firewater.

He poses a serious community problem in many towns not far from the reservations. He goes there seeking work and a new way of life. All too often he finds only disillusionment, joblessness without welfare assistance, and housing frequently worse than his pitiful shack on the reservation.

But after all, when he sells his land he must go somewhere.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 4, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—ODD PERSONALTY OF INJUN JOE NOT EASILY UNDERSTOOD

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

By your standards, Injun Joe appears to be a rather odd individual. He may be an improvident soul and a poor judge of values. But he possesses an earthy sense of humor despite his stoicism. He loves a good joke even if it's on him. And by his standards, you appear to be an oddity, too.

Perhaps that's why he loves to put his family in the old battered pickup, if he has a pickup, throw some blankets and some jerky (dried deer) in the back end, and drive to town. Valentine, Nebr., is one of his favorite haunts.

Sometimes all he wants to do is stand around. He'll lean for hours against a street lamp support and watch the strange doings of his white brothers. Maybe he'll get drunk if he has the money.

You wonder what goes on in his mind. Does he wonder, perhaps, that much of Valentine's prosperity is a joke on him? Or does he regard it as a joke on you? Injun Joe may suffer from myriad ails, but ulcers is not one of them.

Valentine, on U.S. 20 in the northern part of Nebraska's panhandle, is a bustling, modern cowtown of 3,000-plus population. It boasts one of the biggest and most active livestock markets in the region.

Does Injun Joe ever ponder the fact that much of the plump stock sold in Valentine's sales rings comes from ranches built by non-Indians on lands that the Indians practically gave away?

Perhaps he does, and perhaps that's why he gets lousy drunk and perhaps that's why

Sheriff George Welker estimates that 80 percent of his jail and law enforcement costs are attributable to Indians.

Injun Joe is a problem to Valentine. The problem is worse now, says Sheriff Welker, because Injun Joe can legally buy liquor. And the white man's firewater is bad medicine for Injun Joe.

A few years ago Valentine had another problem. It had a "teepee town." It was another of those "Places of Many Sorrows" referred to by the anonymous letterwriter who sparked this series of articles.

Destitute Sioux tribesmen from the Rosebud and other reservations of South Dakota came to Valentine. Some sought employment. Some were content to exist on public handouts or the prosperity of their Indian brothers.

This willingness to share is one of the most frequently overlooked complexes in the Indian personality. Failure to understand this one fundamental fact in the Indian makeup has caused more than a file full of well-intended programs to fall flat.

Almost universally, the Indian believes that he is obligated to share whatever he has with any other member of the tribe, particularly if that tribesman is related to him.

Thus it is understandable that when one Indian makes some financial gains and builds a better house, his destitute relatives may move in on him with their youngsters and dogs. This custom could hardly be considered conducive to greater initiative. It explains why 32 persons spent the winter of 1958–59 in one house in Great Falls, Mont.

FRIENDS, RELATIVES MOVE IN

So Injun Joe had moved to Valentine and was living it up in a tent? The word got around. His friends and relatives came to Valentine to share their brother's new-found contentment and good fortune. Valentine's teepee town grew.

Valentine bought the property out from under the Indians, told them to seek other quarters, and offered to help them relocate. This constituted charity, however, and it perhaps offended the Indian's strange sense of pride.

He'll accept welfare handouts—because the Government treaties promised him rations and other benefits. That's not considered charity. Those treaties were made long ago, but, while he may deny it, the Indian remembers promises made and he expects them to be kept.

He may deny this, too, but until recent times the great majority of Indians were hamstrung in their efforts to get ahead by a feeling that they still were defeated prisoners of war, free to move about, but prisoners nevertheless.

These complexes in the Indian personality must be understood before any program for their betterment can be undertaken with assurance of success.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 4, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—CASH PRODS INDIAN LAND SALES

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

From Valentine, Nebr., a good surfaced highway leads northward 33 miles to Mission, S. Dak., a town within the Rosebud Indian Reservation.

The highway traverses fine grazing lands dotted by impressive ranch buildings. Although this is "Indian country," most of the prospering ranchers are non-Indians or persons with little Indian blood.

These fertile acres were parceled out to individual Sioux tribesmen when the Rosebud Indian Reservation first was founded. Little of it remains in their hands.

Originally all Indian lands were held in trust by the Government because the Indians were considered incompetent to handle their own affairs But the General Allotment Act of 1887 destroyed the trusteeship and permitted the issuance of fee patents to Indians considered able to administer their own affairs.

In the years following, American Indians lost 88 million acres of their most valuable lands. The Sioux were no exceptions. Land-hungry settlers with ready cash, and now and then a jug of firewater to smooth the deal, bought Indian land at bargain prices. The Indian was the loser.

Congress restored trusteeship in 1934 with the Indian Reorganization Act. But in 1953 a House concurrent resolution expressed the desire not only to end trusteeship but to withdraw from all Indian affairs.

It soon appeared that the Federal Government was going to rush to the nearest exit and get out of the Indian business entirely. The red man would be left to shift for himself as best he could. But termination of trusteeship meant also the end of tax exemptions for Indian lands, and that could spell ruin.

POLITICAL BRAKES

It was this one aspect of the problem that caused Indians and their friends to apply political brakes on the trend.

After you've traveled the road to Mission and have seen the flourishing ranches operated by non-Indians, you wonder why it is that the Indians would want to sell their property.

It's a complex problem and it extends from the Sioux to the Northern Cheyenne and beyond to the Blackfeet and on throughout the Rocky Mountain Empire to every Indian reservation with allotted lands.

To understand it, you have to back up a bit. First, it must be realized that we actually don't know what an Indian is. He's never been defined legally. He's been described for one purpose or another, but even Webster seems evasive, content to call the Indian an aboriginal of the continent.

Because of this, allotted lands may be owned by many heirs, descendants of varying Indian blood content. Each, however, holds title to whatever allotted lands may remain in possession of the family. The share may be fractional, but it is there just the same.

Most of the tracts allotted to Indians are so small that they won't support one family, much less a dozen or two. So the lands are usually rented to one big operator, usually a non-Indian, and the rent collected by the Government which distributes it to the respective owners.

MAY RECEIVE PENNIES

It is not uncommon for an Indian landlord to receive a check for a few pennies as his share of rental income. At best, the average income check is insufficient to support a family.

Untrained for most kinds of work, the Indian finds himself forced to depend on welfare assistance, or seasonal work at meager pay, for subsistence.

Under these circumstances, the offer of cash payment for his land seems like an inviting proposition. So he sells, quickly dissipates the money, and finds himself worse off than before.

You wonder why an Indian gets drunk?

Once he owned a continent. He was run into a corner, and the corner gets smaller and smaller with each inevitable land sale. Where does he go from here? To bigger and bigger relief rolls, more shacks, deeper poverty.

Oh, we've tried to do something for the people whose land we took. Down through the years we've spent something more than $2 billion on them. We've provided health service, given rations, launched innumerable programs.

But a look at the life on reservations today—and off them—seems to indicate we've made precious little progress during our 100 years of stewardship over the affairs of our aboriginals.

WATER FACTOR

There is another reason Indians sell their land. One purchaser may acquire a key tract and thus break up a ranch unit by becoming the owner of the only water. The property that remains becomes worthless. He can then buy that land for a song.

He may make a purchase that hampers access to an Indian's property. That, too, becomes worthless. He can then acquire that.

Sometimes an Indian landowner of considerable holdings will sell the entire place. He's the one you hear about who blows his wad in one grand ball that may last from a weekend to a month or two.

When he goes broke, he "goes back to the blanket," asks his tribe to help him. You'll meet an instance of this in a subsequent article.

Not all Indians are failures, however. You'll hear it said around the reservations that when an Indian's blood is diluted by more than one-half, he becomes aggressive, competitive, energetic, and he forges ahead.

One of these is Claude Lamoureaux, whose ranch is just outside the town of Mission.

Lamoureaux had a crew spraying some of his Hereford cattle when I drove onto his place. Incidentally, he doesn't rent a sprayer. He owns it.

He dropped his work at once, shook hands, and said, "Come into the house. I want you to meet the wife—Hattie."

On the way through the spacious and well-constructed corrals, Lamoureaux pointed out some of his splendid quarter horses. Just beyond the horse corral was a fine barn and a roomy, comfortable house for Lamoureaux's foreman and ranch hands.

MODEL RANCH

It was a model ranch and a model home surrounded by lawn, shaded by trees. Inside, after introductions, Lamoureaux whipped off his left boot, sat down to his electric organ and exclaimed, "You're going to listen to me play if I have to lock the door. I'm trying to get over bashfulness. Had this organ only 6 months, but I love it."

We toured the Lamoureaux ranch, saw hundreds of fat cattle and calves lazing around windmill well pumps surrounded by rich, tall grass. Lamoureaux was proud of his livestock, proud of his wells, proud of his sheds, and proud of his hay.

Before we left with a promise to meet again at the National Western Stock Show in January, Lamoureaux confided that he was one-eighth Sioux Indian.

"And I never in my life bought an acre of land from a squaw," he said with a laugh.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 5, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—"GRIPE SESSIONS" FOR INDIANS OFFER LITTLE AID HOPE

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Although the results are sometimes questionable, at least one policy in our dealings with the Indian has remained unchanged down through history. Congress sees to it that the Indian has occasional opportunity to voice his complaints.

One of these congressional gripe sessions took place a few weeks ago at the headquarters of the Rosebud (S. Dak.) Indian Reservation. The meeting was held in the American Legion Hall and the crowd, both inside the small frame building and out, resembled any other gathering of ranch people from Wagon Mound, N. Mex., to Cut Bank, Mont.

Representative JAMES HALEY, Democrat, of Florida, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, presided. One by one, members of the Sioux tribe stood and uttered the same timeworn expressions of dissatisfaction with their plight.

Outside, a pickup drove up. An Indian rolled down the cab window, stuck his head out and shouted, "What's going on in there?"

"Congress has moved from Washington to Rosebud," someone yelled back.

When the laughter subsided, an elder tribesman in black hat observed gravely, "You can always tell when an election year is coming up."

These were sincere tribesmen, soberly and intelligently concerned with the problems of their people. Many spoke eloquently to the committee of visiting Congressmen.

Their words underscored a report of the Indian Health Division of the Public Health Service that "the poorest, sickest, and least educated" of all American racial groups are the Indians.

It was obvious, however, that the Sioux had little confidence any good would come from their appeals for a program of assistance. There may be good reason, too. For one thing, no one seemed able to agree on what form such assistance should take.

But the pattern for a program of self-help could be found on the Cheyenne River Indian Reservation farther north. Here there is a glimmer of hope for the Indian.

William Red Bird, tribal council vice chairman, reported on it recently before the fifth annual conference on Indian affairs sponsored by the Institute of Indian Studies at the University of South Dakota.

Red Bird said the program began in 1956 with a $10 million fund realized from flood-damage payments. Half the money was set aside by the tribal council for rehabilitation.

Thirty-two students were sent to college last year. An adult education program was established. Fifty-seven Indians participated. Some were set up in cattle raising. Each of the participating families started with 100 head of cattle and a $10,000 cash loan.

Seventy-two modern homes were built on the Cheyenne River Reservation. Thirty more were built at Eagle Butte, S. Dak., for elderly Indians. Five business enterprises were financed for tribesmen.

"We [the tribe] are rich in lands," said Red Bird, "but we are poor in money. So we are trying our best to get our people to support themselves. Sometimes we think we cannot solve our problems, but sometimes we do."

In all, the tribal council has issued 4,156 head of cattle to individuals, and there now are 22,000 head of Indian-owned cattle on the reservation, compared with 13,771 non-Indian-owned cattle.

Vernon G. Collins, of Gregory, S. Dak., a fullblood Sioux employed as a special officer for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, summed up the Indian problem in this fashion:

"Indian people must quit being dependent upon somebody else for everything. They must learn to live in this modern world and to do things for themselves. They must learn to use their lands and to work with their white neighbors in towns and cities.

"If they work hard, try to improve themselves, and learn to mingle with whites, they will be accepted. And the best way to bring these things about is to put Indian children in schools with white children. Then they'll learn to compete. Then they'll get ahead."

Geography circumvents this intermingling, however, and the fact remains that the Indian is not getting ahead.

To what extent he is lagging behind and what causes this backwardness will be developed later in this series of articles. To understand it, you may have to be able to read some at times indistinct smoke signals on the Indian horizon.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 5, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—INDIAN HOPES TO SURVIVE WHITE "FOLLY"

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

The unreconstructed reservation Sioux believes his paleface brother is not long for this earth. Long before perfection of nuclear weapons, the strangely gifted Uwipi medicine men of the Sioux tribe were telling their followers that the white transgressors would destroy themselves by some act of folly.

After that, the buffalo is to return. The Indian will then be free to resume his normal way of life.

Graham Holmes, superintendent of the Rosebud Indian Reservation, theorizes that this belief may explain the widely prevalent attitude of resignation among many Indian tribes.

The Indian knows, according to Holmes, that his "powers of survival" are greater than those of the white man and that they would carry him through disaster that might wipe out more civilized races. So he's content to sit and wait.

Then, too, there is something in the Indian's ancient religions that tells him this life is only a transitional period between the beginning and the final life in the Happy Hunting Ground. This mundane existence, the creed contends, is so fleeting it is foolish to try for more than a bare existence.

MANY CONVERSIONS

It is true that a great many solid and lasting conversions have been made among Indians to Christian faiths. It is equally true that a great many of these so-called converts hedge their religious bets by playing along with both sides—the ancient beliefs and the white man's church.

Thus the supine posture of so many American Indians. Thus the halfhearted plodding along behind their more aggressive leaders who sit in the tribal councils and formulate plans for the advancement of their people.

Does the increased tempo of sales of allotted Indian lands to non-Indians work to the disadvantage of the Indians?

Holmes says there are two answers to the question. "Yes" and "No."

Some allotted tracts are too small to be of value. However, many of these tracts can be bought at Government-supervised land sales by the tribe and put to work for the best interests of the entire tribe.

A great many Indians wouldn't improve their land or try to wrench an existence out of their acres if they owned the best soil in the Nation. Again the attitude of resignation, which so closely resembles sheer shiftlessness, comes into focus.

Whatever the cause, the distressing fact remains that the Nation is spending somewhere in the neighborhood of $425,000 a day of State and Federal funds in direct services to Indians and getting extremely poor long-range results.

Moreover, there is an abundance of evidence on every hand that this sum is woefully inadequate insofar as welfare assistance is concerned. And there is equally abundant indication that the need and the cost will mount with each passing year.

OUTLAY FOR INDIANS

The total annual outlay for services to Indians as reported to the House Insular Affairs Committee a year ago was in excess of $154 million. It is undoubtedly greater this year and it undoubtedly will be greater next year.

Progress has passed the Indian by—left him standing in his moccasins 50 years behind the rest of the Nation. He has little hope of ever catching up unless some new approach to his problem is devised.

The story of his backwardness, as contained in official reports, is nothing less than appalling.

While a decrease was noted in welfare requirements on the Cheyenne River Reservation during the report period 1949–56, the superintendent there said, "There is a continuation of lack of general education and failure to assimilate modern culture due to isolation and racial culture. Dependency has become traditional."

Elsewhere in South Dakota, where 30,000 Indians live, the Lower Brule Reservation reported the failure several years ago of a tribal cattle enterprise because of a price drop. Since World War II "there has been a gradual increase, both of general and public assistance."

From the Crow Creek Reservation came a report that there is a "hard core" of relief cases who are "poor credit risks."

Invocation of the vagrancy provision in the law-and-order code of the reservation was being considered for persons "who can work and will not leave the reservation to do so."

The Sisseton Indian Reservation of North Dakota and South Dakota reported wide fluctuations in relief caseloads. A Government report observed:

"The men are unable to support their families because they can do only unskilled labor and often are not interested in steady employment or cannot keep a steady job because of personal inadequacy, irresponsibility, or alcoholism. There is also a lack of employment opportunities."

SURPLUS FOOD

On the Rosebud Reservation practically all residents depend to some extent upon surplus food commodities during the winter months:

"In the past 20 years there has been a gradual increase in public assistance and a decrease in Bureau of Indian Affairs general assistance. There is a lack of realization by the Indians that personal and social problems can be solved more by them than by anybody else. They do not seem to realize that things can be changed. Rural slums, the defeatist attitude, lack of job opportunities, and lack of effective local government could be improved if they were methodically attacked."

On the Pine Ridge and Standing Rock Indian Reservations, figures compiled for the House Insular Affairs Committee's Subcommittee on Indian Affairs showed increases in welfare requirements.

At Pine Ridge, where there are 1,900 families, 925 were reported dependent upon general assistance in varying degrees from one-quarter to complete dependency.

Standing Rock reported 608 families with 528 of them dependent upon assistance. Four hundred of these were in the three-quarter to complete dependency category.

It's the same picture of poverty, malnutrition, overcrowding, broken homes, illegitimacy, and sickness throughout most of the Indian country. With it all goes a higher crime rate, juvenile delinquency, degeneracy.

Within recent months a survey group made up of church and Government people in South Dakota studied the impact on communities and reservations of the existing trend in Indian sociology, and it came up with this one statement on law and order:

"In this field we find serious developments giving rise to grave concern on the part of Indians and non-Indians in many communities. Due to the very complicated regulations governing the jurisdiction of county, State, and tribal law-enforcement officers, some very serious problems are growing.

LAW BREAKDOWN

"In some instances communities are facing all but complete breakdown in law and order. In some instances county and city law enforcement officers are without jurisdiction, and many of the Indians involved are expressing strong convictions that such situations should be rectified."

This conceivably could account for the unofficial report that within recent months there have been five unsolved murders either on or near the Sioux Reservation country of southern South Dakota.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 7, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—TIME AND PROGRESS PASS THESE INDIANS BY

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Westward out of Mission, S. Dak., you speed along U.S. 18, past the turnoff to the Rosebud Indian Reservation headquarters, into the pine-grown ridges of low mountain country, then suddenly downhill to the crossing of the Little White River.

A red cross on the map at this point indicates a change from central standard time to mountain standard time. Actually the change in time here is very significant.

For the several score ill-clad, ill-housed, and ill-fed people who live here, it is still 50 years ago. Time and progress have passed them by. They are among the poorest Sioux tribesmen on the reservation.

These are a shy people who suffer in silence, resent intrusion by strangers, flinch at the sight of a camera, and largely refuse to talk on less than a weeks-long acquaintance.

Many of them find escape from their miseries in the peyote rites of the Native American Church or, when they can afford it, in the white man's firewater.

Peyote makes a man's dreams come alive in vivid technicolor. For one night at least, he who drinks deeply of peyote tea experiences the tingling joys of release to another world of heavenly visions and unimaginable pleasure far beyond the Indian's lot on earth

Firewater makes a man forget. Unfortunately, both have much the same aftereffects if indulged in too generously.

If you stop at the tiny By-the-Way store operated just across the river fork by Harry Berogan and his wife, Lizzie, you may meet a tall, handsome youth named Black Lance.

He will not talk to you. He will only grin good-naturedly, accept the candy you offer him, and make a stuttering sound with his mouth. Black Lance has a speech impediment.

Another boy in another community might be spared a lifetime of embarrassment in a case of this nature. Speech impediments can be corrected by trained technicians. But not Black Lance.

He is condemned by circumstance, isolation, and a compounded lack of self-confidence to live out his days hiding from strangers or standing in painful silence, one foot planted on the other in awkward withdrawal.

If you talk long enough with Berogan you may meet—let us call her Bethel.

It was cold and windy the day I met her. She was carrying her baby boy, a warmly dressed little fellow about 16 or 18 months old. Bethel wore a thin cotton dress and a light sweater. She obviously was pregnant.

At first she regarded me coldly but warmed when Berogan introduced us, and I handed her youngster a fistful of candy which he eagerly accepted. He withdrew and let out a tearful bawl, however, when I sought to pat him on the shoulder.

Bethel's brown parchment face cracked into a smile that revealed a yellow set of broken teeth in need of repair.

I wondered how the woman could chew her food. But Berogan assured me that mush and beans and Government surplus cheese and dry milk could be managed without teeth.

This, then, was the picture at the Little White River. Off in the distance from Berogan's store were the modest homes and the little shacks of the Sioux.

In back of one, a family wash fluttered on the line. At another, a woman swept the yard. At yet another, a woman chopped kindling for a fire.

Atop the roof of the house nearest to the store stood a towering television aerial. Contradiction is the story of the Indian.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 6, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—PROGRAM OF SELF-HELP CAN EASE SIOUX HARDSHIPS

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

From the crossing of the Little White River on the Rosebud Indian Reservation of South Dakota, you continue westward on U.S. 18 and soon cross into the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, second largest in the Nation.

The Oglala Sioux who live here number 12,300. Their average monthly income is less than $100 per family. And most of that is in the form of public assistance.

The scene is monotonously repetitious of what you saw on the Rosebud—grassy hills in great swales and bulges, little ranch homes, some fairly prosperous, some extremely modest. And the wind—always the wind—the wind that pushes and jerks you around and hurls sand in your face and sends tumbleweeds dancing across the road.

It's a cold, hard, unrelenting winter wind that punishes the Sioux country. It rips and tears at the flimsy huts and whips snow through the cracks. Its companion is familiar to the Sioux—hardship.

SELF-HELP PROGRAM

Yet here you'll find something heart warming. It is a projected program of self-help.

Tribal leaders have done the groundwork for a tepee village with which to bid for the tourist trade. It would be authentic, from the handmade Indian goods in the "trading post" to the genuine Indians themselves. In time, the project would include motels, Indian ceremonial dances for entertainment of visitors, good restaurants, possibly a museum.

Back in the late 1940's when the Navajos were in possibly more desperate circumstances than the Sioux, they sat in council, discussed their plight and subsequently entered the motel and store business, set up a sawmill and other tribal projects. Today those projects are paying dividends in both profits and tribal employment.

JOB FOR DELINQUENTS

The Sioux project would be Indian owned, Indian operated. Properly managed, it should prove to be a beneficial investment.

Initial construction work would be done by impressed crews of the reservation's plentiful juvenile delinquents. The tribe would help finance the undertaking with tribal funds. Private investment may be considered.

The Oglala Sioux wisely reason that if cowboys can capitalize on being cowboys, Indians can capitalize on being Indians.

Goodness knows it is high time the Oglala Sioux did something to help themselves. Their once vast Pine Ridge Indian Reservation is rapidly diminishing. Thousands of acres of individually owned allotted land are being sold to non-Indians each year.

In the 12-month period ending April 30, 1958, South Dakota's Department of Revenue reported alienation of 24,324 acres of Pine Ridge land in 137 tracts. (That's an area one-half the size of Denver.)

This, of course, makes South Dakota happy. Once Indian title to the land is removed, it becomes taxable.

Pine Ridge Superintendent Towle initiated a study a year ago of the cause and effects of Indian land sales. It was learned that "much of the individual allotted interests (in the lands) are in the hands of the older generations," Towle's preliminary report stated.

"These older people are more interested in making use of the land-sale proceeds while they are alive rather than to have the benefits pass on to their heirs."

FOR CONSUMER GOODS

The study also disclosed that funds realized by Indians from the sale of their lands were being spent on consumer goods, such as food, clothing, and used cars.

"Only a small portion of land-sale funds are being used for permanent betterment, such as building new homes, purchasing more suitable lands, or in the establishment of an enterprise that might result in a livelihood or a better standard of living," the report added.

The report could have added that much of the money is squandered even more frivolously in the border town skidrows.

So much for the effect. What prompts Indians to rush into the market with their allotted lands when fee patents are granted? Towle largely blames old-age assistance liens.

In a report prepared in response to a questionnaire sent out by Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana, chairman of the Senate Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Towle appended a detailed and revealing explanation of "the effects of old-age assistance on the Indian's desire to sell trust lands."

TREATY RECALLED

To paraphrase the report, Towle said it originally agreed with the Indians through treaty, that the United States would provide for all elderly Indians in perpetuity, with no strings attached. But under social security, the Government can now take their lands in repayment.

For years, Congress recognized the treaty promises as a special obligation on the Government. Appropriations were made regularly to assist States which had programs for caring for Indian aged.

At first, grants were made to aged Indians in the form of provisions. Later, financial assistance was substituted.

Then in 1935, Congress passed the Social Security Act and the Bureau of Indian Affairs no longer doled out Federal aid to old Indians. Social security took over care of the Indian aged.

But the act contained a provision that enabled the administering States to recover the amount of aid extended from the estates of beneficiaries of old age assistance. Liens could be placed against all income from such estates and, in many Indian cases, would be in force 20 years or more.

The Indians objected that this collection system was in violation of their treaties. It naturally followed in Indian logic that if a man had no estate which the Government could tap for repayment—if he sold his allotted land—he could spend both the land sale proceeds and the old age assistance.

Thus began the boom in sales of individually owned Indian allotted land.

It was either resort to this practice or simply forgo desperately needed assistance. The Indian took the former course.

GAINING SUPPORT

You won't be in Indian country very long, and you won't talk to many Indians about it until you'll hear over and over again that this "repayment of treaty grants" is the most cruel device yet employed to wrest Indian lands from the Indians.

It should be noted, too, that the Indian is winning considerable support for his contention.

Towle's report showed how land sales can snowball to avalanche proportions.

It was estimated that 149 "key tracts" totaling 32,519 acres of Pine Ridge land had been sold in years past. One effect of the sale of these key tracts, the report said, "has been to handicap Indian cattle operators to such an extent that these operators either have had to liquidate their holdings or go to the expense of moving their entire ranches to other areas.

"Another effect has been to reduce values of surrounding or adjacent lands by lessening competition where key tracts control use of adjacent land."

It might be observed that the final effect well may be destruction of the reservation's usefulness to the Indians. In that event, Rapid City, S. Dak., and other towns in the reservation country can expect their "Place of Many Sorrows" to gain population.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 7, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—INDIAN SLUM POSES BIG PROBLEM TO RAPID CITY

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Just outside the handsomely modern metropolis of Rapid City, S. Dak., there is a junk-strewn, shack-grown hill. You'll find it strangely silent.

In the words of Indians who may tell you about it, the hill is another "Place of Many Sorrows."

It has its counterpart in many other regions inhabited by Indians. Here are the ever-present ills, disease and want. This is Rapid City's Indian slum area euphemistically known as the "Sioux addition."

Here, in neglect that is sometimes criminal, are raised succeeding generations of the hill's inhabitants. Here a father too often drinks up the family's relief check. Here it often happens that a young Indian girl is introduced into prostitution.

This is a dump heap where we dispose of the reminders of our tragic failure in the management of Indian affairs.

A few years ago a similar Indian village flourished in the very heart of Rapid City on the marshy banks of a small stream below the railroad tracks, almost in the shadow of the sumptuous hotel that recently became the Sheraton-Johnson.

Indians came to Rapid City to revel in the bright lights and sometimes to seek jobs. Too frequently, however, the jobs were abandoned after the first pay check and a round of drunken nights.

Some were Indians who had sold their allotted lands and had become homeless. Some were just wanderers. Population of the slum area varied then as it does now, from a few dozen families to several hundred individuals. Eventually the settlement was moved to the hill.

Police Chief W. K. Armstrong, a vigorous administrator, estimates that Rapid City's Indian population is from 4,000 to 6,000 at all times and he shudders at what it could be under a Government policy of reservation termination.

The problem is big enough already. Detective Capt. Ralph Johnson says 75 percent of the city jail's drunks are Indians. Although they are responsible for comparatively few felonies, Indians—a fraction of the city's population of around 40,000—comprise the biggest law enforcement problem.

Johnson says the city's troubles with Indians have been compounded by legalizing firewater for them and by the recent influx of a minority that has been preying on young Indian girls.

Most of this new group, Johnson says, are transient males, young men looking for opportunities and a new way of life after release from military service.

Some gravitate to the poverty rows, both within and outside the city and are thus brought into contact with impressionable and easily swayed young Indian girls with no means of support. Introducing them into prostitution is easily accomplished.

"We've even found cases where these men talk unmarried Indian mothers into sharing their Aid to Dependent Children checks with them," Johnson says. "We've had cases where they've taken the whole checks away from these young unmarried mothers and have forced them into prostitution.

"We work hard on these cases. We catch most of them before they get too far along. But it is shocking—especially when you remember that not many years ago Indian morals were high and Indian women were respected for it. Liquor, bad influences and their poor economic lot are responsible.

"I don't know what could be done about it on a big scale."

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 7, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—AID CENTERS OFFER INDIAN HEALTH, CRAFT COUNSELING PROGRAMS

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

There still are those who believe the only good Indian is a dead one. There are also the "do-gooders" who cry "Lo, the poor red man," and who would cater to his every whimsical fancy.

In other wigwams there are those who fold their hands and hope the Indian problem will resolve itself or simply go away. Then there are those realistic souls who continue to chip away at the flinty edges of the problem and at the same time minister modestly to the most urgent cases.

Fortunately, for both the Indian and non-Indian, Rapid City, S. Dak., had a wealth of humanitarians. Two of the most outstanding are Rev. Father Peter Price, a Jesuit priest, director of the Mother Butler Center, and the Reverend Percy J. Tibbets, a Congregational minister who runs the Community Service Center.

Asked jokingly if the two denominations worked in competition to help Indians, the Reverend Mr. Tibbets smiled and said: "No, we work in cooperation."

Reservation-born and reared, the Reverend Mr. Tibbets is a fullblood Sioux. His wife, Emma, is also a fullblood Sioux.

He came to Rapid City to help rehabilitate Indians there. He found the problem quicker than he bargained for. No one would rent him a house. Finally he managed to rent a small place and began a community center from which he could operate.

RECREATION PROGRAMS

Now, 10 years later, he has a fairly spacious, two-story cement-block building where he lives, conducts religious services, operates a small clinic, and counsels with his clients.

He has 18 young Indians enrolled in a typing class; 15 studying leathercraft; 18 in cooking and sewing classes; 120 in the 4-H Club, and 250 signed up in the Black Hills Council of American Indians.

Both Rev. M. Tibbets and Father Price conduct youth recreation programs, and frequent rummage sales to help finance their projects. Businessmen and civic and religious groups in Rapid City help generously.

Father Price has a more elaborate layout and Tibbets envies him his gymnasium. The Mother Butler Center, named for a nun famous for her charity and for founding the Mary Mount College, New York, maintains a program of activities comparable to that of the other center and, in addition, runs a modern, well-appointed home for Indian girls.

The place is spotless, offers private rooms for $1 a night, and board and room for $16 a week. A girl staying there can study typing, cooking, sewing, all-around housekeeping, and receive other aids and advantages under the guidance of the Daughters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, one of the few civilian orders of nuns.

The home can accommodate 16 girls. But it is strangely devoid of customers. Father Price attributes the lack of patronage to objection by the girls to a requirement that they be in by 10 p.m.

Over in the main building, separate from the girls' home, Sister Nora Mulhern runs a clinic stocked liberally with serums, antibiotics, and other pharmaceutical needs.

BROGUE A HELP

Sister Nora is straight from the heather hills and perhaps it is her persuasive Scotch brogue that accounts for her success in wheedling medical supplies from laboratories and other sources.

She's a graduate nurse from both Scotch and American colleges and also a member of the Daughters of the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

Last year she dispensed 3 polio shots each to 106 Indians, 2 shots to an additional 74, and 1 shot each to another 40. She'd given antirabies to 5 Indian youngsters bitten by dogs and cared for 2,500 patients, one-third of them children.

She's called upon to treat all sorts of ills from the contagious to the invited.

One sentence in her report to Bishop William T. McCarthy, founder of the Mother Butler Center, is revealing. It dealt with the wide variety of cases. It said:

"Sometimes I'm called upon to treat lacerations which I suspect were received in a fracas in a bar. And a guy (so being treated) can't understand why a nurse can't suture."

Father Price, a tall, shy individual, originally from Nebraska, has instituted another phase of help to the Indians. It is a credit union which now boasts $4,000 operating capital. Although the collector, George Iron Cloud, is optimistic about recoveries on loans, Father Price is skeptical.

"Indians," he said, "are notoriously poor credit risks. They like to get it when they need it, but they hate to pay it back."

It was a chilly Sunday afternoon when I interviewed Father Price and the Reverend Mr. Tibbets. All the Indians had vanished after services—all except a boy with an infected eye and an older man who had fallen from his cot and had struck his head a sharp blow on the base of a stove. Each received treatment at one or the other of the two centers.

The Reverend Mr. Tibbets delayed his departure on a trip to one of the reservations so he could talk for the interview. He rubbed his face in deep reflection.

"How would I sum up the problem of the Indian? I think, frankly, it is one of overdependence upon the Government.

"The Indian must be taught to help himself. He must build self-reliance. He must have a place to call home. Home is very important to the Indian. When he has none, he develops a strong inferiority complex.

"He hasn't had the advantages of environment to help him in his need to learn to live the white man's way. The Negro copied from the environment into which he was born—or thrust. But it was essentially a white man's environment.

"An Indian says, 'I'm an Indian, so I can't do what the white man does.'

"The Indian must be taught to think for himself. He needs closer association with the white influence. And he must make up his mind about what he wants to do. When he does, we should help him.

CAN'T STAND DRINK

"Until that time the Indian will continue to have an inferiority complex and he will seek to drown it in alcohol. And he can't drink."

Why can't an Indian drink and handle it like most whites? I wondered too, and I asked a doctor.

Later on I asked a former Navy pharmacist who is part Alaskan Indian and part Filipino and now is working in Great Falls, Mont. You'll meet him later on and you'll like him.

The doctor explained that there is no reason, organic or chemical, why an Indian gets lousy drunk when he drinks. It's simply that he has fewer inhibitions and fewer restraints. When he drinks, he goes at it with a warwhoop.

The pharmacist had a good answer, too. The average American has been conditioned to alcohol through centuries of European ancestry. His body has become accustomed to it through heredity. The Indian hasn't—and he can't take it.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 8, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—U.S. LAND MOVES CONFUSE, STYMIE CHEYENNES

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Shadows grow long and dense in the rolling plains country. And the shadow of need that darkens the land of the South Dakota Sioux extends finger-like westward to the hunting grounds of the Northern Cheyennes in Montana.

You leave the Black Hills of South Dakota with the rising sun and follow that shadow over a northwesterly course, cross a tiny corner of Wyoming, and within 3 hours you're in the low-lying, pine-grown mountains of the former allies of the Sioux.

It's like flying backward in time.

It was in this sector that is now the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, that Lt. Col. George A. Custer and his cavalry command spent their last night on earth before riding to the Little Big Horn and death.

Compared with most other reservations, the Northern Cheyenne is small—roughly 28 square miles. Some 2,300 members of the tribe live here. Three hundred or more live off the reservation.

But the smallness of the reservation does not minimize its problems. Instead, they are multiplied and aggravated by geography, primitivism, the general rural economic squeeze of the mid-20th century, and some of the most deplorable official bullheadedness since the Custer debacle that fateful summer of 1876.

That date in history was the beginning of the Northern Cheyennes' lament. They joined the Sioux in the Custer massacre. It was their last victory.

In time they were cornered, subdued, and taken as prisoners of war to Fort Reno, Okla., where it was planned to colonize them with the Southern Cheyennes.

Then, even as now, the U.S. Government underestimated the fierce love of the Northern Cheyennes for their home country. The Indians rebelled. Many were killed trying to escape.

At last, however, about 60 of them, led by Little Wolf, broke away. In a stark and difficult terrain, they braved death by freezing, starvation, sickness, and constant attack, and they fought their way home.

Throughout this long and arduous ordeal, the Sutai medicine men of the tribe carried along a revered object—the "sacred hat" which remains enshrined Indian fashion to this day in the back country of the reservation.

Few white men have ever seen it. Custer was one who did, and he was warned by the Sutai seer against the fate which befell him.

By succession, the sacred hat and its shrine are in the custody now of another Sutai medicine man, Henry Little Coyote. Together, as you will see later, they provide a strange and interesting insight into the problems of the Indian.

Despite possession of their protective medicine, however, the Northern Cheyennes were recaptured upon returning home, and in 1884 the Government established their present reservation.

The Cheyennes developed a livestock economy owned in common. They never asked the Government to allot their lands. But in 1927, the Government did. It created a crazy-quilt patchwork of property holdings that defied successful operation, confused the Indians and opened the way to liquidation of some of the reservation's most valuable lands.

Thus far the tribe has slowed the liquidation by meeting the white buyers' top bids and acquiring the land for the tribe as a whole.

But there was one instance in which the Bureau of Indian Affairs tied up $40,000 of tribal money in red tape and thus prevented the tribe from bidding on key tracts.

Now there are new threats to security of the Northern Cheyennes. One key tract threatens to provoke more land sales, and there are two other factors—oil and firewater.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 10, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—NORTHERN CHEYENNES ENGAGED IN TWO "WARS"

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

From the time the buffalo dominated the Plains, the Northern Cheyenne Indian tribe has been feared and respected as one of the most warlike in the West. They would fight at the drop of a feathered coup stick—and they are engaged in two "wars" right now.

One is on a broad field extending northward from Colorado's Arkansas River to the North Platte River of Wyoming and Nebraska, and westward from a point well inside western Kansas to the Continental Divide.

This vast area, which includes Denver, Colorado Springs, and other important towns and cities, was once the hunting ground of the Northern Cheyennes. For 8 years now, the Cheyennes have skirmished with the Indian Claims Commission seeking payment for these lands and minerals which were ceded to the whites by various treaties.

But in another "war" while they fight for millions of acres, the Northern Cheyennes are being flanked by an acre-by-acre conquest of their little reservation.

Headquarters for their "wars" is in the small agency town of Lame Deer, Mont., near the northern border of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation.

Lame Deer's main street is bisected at one end by State Highway 8. At one end of the street are a couple of stores, a cafe, a hotel and service station. Across the highway, northward, are the Government buildings and the one-story frame office of the tribe.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED

The scene contrasts sharply with that of 50 years ago. No more do the squaws carry papooses on their backs. The men no longer pad along the street in moccasins. Indeed, it is difficult to find a woman who knows how to make moccasins.

Taste in women's clothing runs from the modern skirts or suits to a design copied from the dresses of the cavalry officers' wives of years ago. The men prefer cowboy boots, jeans, and western hats.

Yet there is something primitive here, something reminiscent of the days when women chopped wood and men hunted or fought. Here as elsewhere in Indian country, there are many contradictions, much conflict.

Many women still do chop wood and carry water. But you'll also find some of them participating in a study of home sanitation and talking of forming a women's club similar to those on some other reservations.

In the tribal headquarters you'll find spirited leaders of the tribe working and planning to preserve their reservation and improve the lot of their fellow tribesmen.

SEVENTY-FIVE TO EIGHTY PERCENT

These leaders, members of the tribal council, were in session when I arrived at Lame Deer. The meeting was taking place in a room in the basement of the tribe's headquarters. Perhaps 75 or 80 were in attendance.

Save for the pronounced Indian features and skin coloring of the tribal representatives, the informal dress and here and there a handsome set of tied braids, the gathering resembled that of any other group of American councilmen.

At the rear of the room a tall young man was urging adoption of a resolution to approve a cooperative campaign for tuberculosis control with the State of Montana. He spoke eloquently in both English and the sonorous language of the Northern Cheyennes. The resolution was adopted with a chorus of assenting grunts.

During a lull in the meeting I introduced myself to the young man who had been talking. His name was musical, typical—Melvin Wounded Eye.

We shook hands and talked. Then he stood, addressed Tribal Vice Chairman Willy Hollow Breast who presided at a desk in the front of the room, and introduced me in both English and Cheyenne. Hollow Breast acknowledged the introduction with a raised hand "Hau." Then he invited me to tell the council the nature of my business.

As I spoke, the tribal secretary took notes. Wounded Eye interpreted. When I had finished, the council pledged its cooperation to see that I received the information I sought. We shook hands all around.

Next morning we held our first meeting in the tribal headquarters. Present were Council Chairman John Wooden Legs, Wounded Eye, Henry Coup Cane, Rufus Wallowing, and Hollow Breast, among others.

Wounded Eye and Coup Cane are veterans of the war in the South Pacific. Both are vigorous and effective leaders in the tribe's drive toward a better culture.

Thus far, they said, they have managed to hold their reservation fairly intact despite Government-supervised sales of allotted Indian lands. Of 445,736 acres, approximately 6,000 have been sold. In 1959, 2,399 acres went up for sale. The Cheyennes matched the bids of the whites and thus retained ownership in commonalty.

OTHER SALES

Other sales may be in the offing. There's talk of oil in the northwest corner of the reservation, and white men are seeking to buy in there, Hollow Breast said.

"With the cooperation of the reservation's Government officers and with the help of lots of liquor to help talk the Indians (landowners) into selling, they might get that land, too," Hollow Breast continued. "But we are hoping to stop them."

Their plan was contained in a letter to Miss LaVerne Madigan, executive director of the Association of American Indian Affairs, Inc., New York. The letter said in part:

"Our land is more than a reservation to us Northern Cheyennes. Our land is the home of our people, and that is why our grandfathers broke out of prison in Oklahoma and died and starved and froze and fought all the way back to this good place.

WANT TO HOLD LAND

"We want to hold every foot of our land. We do not want one foot of it sold out of Northern Cheyenne ownership.

"Once our land belonged to the whole tribe and no Cheyenne could sell away a piece of it. That was good. Then the land was allotted. Every Cheyenne was given a piece of it. Today, we children of those Cheyennes are very poor, and God will forgive us for selling our pieces of our homeland to buy food and clothes.

"But it is not good for our people to do that. When they have eaten the food and worn out the clothes or spent the money childishly, they live right here among us on relief and a part of our community is gone forever.

"Soon * * * more acres will go up for sale, and other lands will follow, and we are asking the Bureau of Indian Affairs to lend us $500,000 from the Indian Revolving Loan Fund so that we can keep pace.

REVOLVING FUND

"The Revolving Fund will be empty until Congress appropriates money for it, and we Northern Cheyennes are only one of many tribes that have applied for land purchase loans.

"The loan we need may be a long time coming, and half our reservation may be sold while we wait. The borrowed money, even after we receive it, will not be enough to buy all of the allotted Cheyenne lands, and we may face a hard future in which we will be borrowing and repaying at interest for years to save our homeland, without a penny to help our people live better lives.

"We will do that if we have to. But there is a better way."

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 10, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—LAWS ENCROACH ON INDIAN'S LOVE OF HOMELAND

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

There are some things the white man does not share in common with many of his redskin brothers, the Indians. Prominent among these are a taste for puppy soup and jerk meat; confidence in the curative powers of the medicine man, and a belief that tinkering with nature invites the wrath of the Great Spirit.

Conversely, an Indian wouldn't give a war whoop for hors d'oeuvres or a fingerbowl, and he wouldn't be caught scalped at a cocktail party.

He's a practical soul. When he eats, he eats to satisfy his hunger. When he drinks, he drinks to get drunk.

There are exceptions, of course, and there is much to be said in behalf of dried jerky made from deer meat. But on one common ground Indians and non-Indians meet in agreement—love of home country.

It is this love of homeland which inspired the Northern Cheyenne tribesmen to escape from Oklahoma in the late 1880's and fight their way back north. And it is the same devotion that motivates them today in advancement of a plan to stop the sale of allotted lands on their reservation in southern Montana.

Soon the Northern Cheyennes intend to present to Congress a petition asking for an "unallotment" program for the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation.

Government-supervised sales of individually owned allotted lands on the reservation have alarmed tribal leaders. They say the sellers too often squander money received from such sales, then return to the reservation to live on relief and become burdens.

The program the Northern Cheyenne propose would continue 50 years.

"During that time there would be a moratorium on all land sales except to the tribe," Tribal Chairman John Wooden Legs wrote in a letter of explanation to the Association on American Indian Affairs. "The tribe would be required to purchase all land offered for sale and at the appraised value at the time of sale.

"The land would be purchased by the tribe out of annual, unborrowed income (from land leases, minerals, and sales of timber or other tribal enterprises). The amount of land to be purchased each year would be on a 50-year basis.

"The right of Northern Cheyennes to sell their land out of Cheyenne ownership is not acknowledged by the tribe, but the right of the individual to sell would not be violated because the tribe would be obligated to buy."

It seems to be a fair proposal designed to keep the reservation intact and to preserve the security for all members of the tribe. It also is the hub of a contemplated program of resource development founded on coal, oil, and lumber.

But if the past is any criterion for the future, the Northern Cheyennes have little to hope for. A coal mining undertaking several years ago reportedly was halted on Government orders with no explanation.

Prior to one Government-supervised land sale, the tribe sold cattle to raise $40,000 with which to match the bids of the whites. The money was tied up in Washington for an "audit."

Representative LEE METCALF and Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, of Montana, asked the Bureau of Indian Affairs to release the money in time for the sale. Then the tribe requested that the sale be postponed. Neither request was honored.

An attempt by tribal leaders and a Catholic mission on the reservation to secure leases for expansion of a small plastics industry at Lame Deer, Mont., has been snarled for months by "procedure."

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 10, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—400 INDIAN FAMILIES OUT OF 450 GET WELFARE RELIEF

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Except for his high cheekbones, the slight slant of his dark eyes and his black, sometimes matted hair, Robert Fighting Bear appears little different from any other American boy.

Robert is 2 years old now and he achieved that age against terrific odds. The odds against his living to be 1 year old were twice that of the average infant born in the United States. Should he survive babyhood, Robert Fighting Bear can look forward to a life expectancy of 40 years compared with 62 for the other children of the Nation.

Statistic Fighting Bear is a Northern Cheyenne Indian. He lives with his parents in a little log cabin in the reservation village of Birney, Mont., population about 125.

When he becomes older he may be a big help to his parents. He can then pack wood and he can carry water from the community's one source of supply, a trickling artesian well that runs from a pipe into an iron trough shared by Birney's dwellers and dogs alike.

If the Fighting Bear family is like most other residents of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation, Robert's parents probably will spend some time this winter living on relief money.

Statistics show that of the reservation's 450 or more families, only 50 are entirely self-supporting. Of the 400 relief client families, 50 are one-fourth dependent on welfare assistance; 200 are one-half dependent, and 180 are dependent to the extent of three-quarters or more.

This is a sad state of affairs, indeed, for a tribe whose total assets are reckoned at more than $7½ million, with family assets averaging $6,200. It speaks strongly of underdevelopment.

Seriousness of the relief situation of the Northern Cheyennes was accented by the report several months ago by Supt. Don Y. Jensen. He said the Bureau of Indian Affairs took over administration of general assistance in 1940.

During the war years the case load dropped. But in the postwar period payments of social security aids and general assistance have quadrupled.

"This tribe," Jensen reported, "lives primarily in a relief economy and has over one-fourth million dollars each year in grants.

"These Indians are very conservative and belong to the Peyote organization which they call the Native American Church. The Peyote group members do not expect to seek employment or live primarily off the reservation.

RELOCATION SLOW

"Relocation has been proceeding at a snail's pace."

Tribal chairman John Wooden Legs will tell you the Government's effort to relocate Indians in cities around the Nation "has failed 100 percent so far as the Northern Cheyennes are concerned. All our people who have left to find jobs in the cities have returned to the reservation."

You wonder why anyone would elect to return to the poverty and squalor of the Northern Cheyenne Reservation as you drive through the little communities. Admittedly there is something attractive about the countryside and obviously it could be productive.

On the visit to Birney in company with Melvin Wounded Eye, Willy Hollow Breast, Henry Coup Cane and others of the Northern Cheyenne tribal council, we passed one small ranch home that bore every evidence of efficiency and a degree of prosperity.

The owner, I learned, was an Indian woman married to a white man who was managing to "whack" out a fairly good living off the land.

A few miles farther on we stopped in Birney, a typical Indian village dotted by outhouses and old automobiles. There is no store in the community. Shopping must be done in one of the other towns, several miles distant.

BLOOD AT THE WELL

A dark splotch of blood beside the little water well testified that hunting had been good recently. Women of the village were hanging jerk meat on poles to dry in the sun.

As we watched, a middleaged Indian woman emerged from one of the low-built log huts, walked to her outhouse but didn't enter. Instead, she sought a position to one side of the little facility and, with no show of embarrassment, relieved herself in plain sight of our group.

Then, without further ado, she stood and walked back to the log cabin.

The tribal council members shouted friendly greetings to the Birney residents, joked and laughed and wished there were a better water supply.

I wanted two children to pose in a photograph of the town's one water well. One of the men in our party persuaded a mother to allow two of her youngsters to serve as models.

Then she spent 30 minutes grooming and scrubbing them and changing their clothes.

The sun ball was dipping westward and the wind that blew had begun to take on a sharper edge when Hollow Breast decided to pay me one of the tribe's highest honors—a visit to the shrine of the "Sacred Hat."

It was only a short drive through dry washes and over hills and past the spot where a motion picture company shot a sequence for a western movie years ago. It was based on the Custer massacre, and many of the great-grandsons of the Cheyenne warriors who took part in it—some who were in our entourage—were in the movie.

They enjoyed their role, they said, but complained that they were required to sit for hours on horseback, dressed only in breechcloths, and they sunburned terribly.

Henry Little Coyote, the Sutai medicine man, and Sitting Man, his companion, had a good fire going when we arrived at the shrine of the "Sacred Hat." Sitting Man, 86 and blind, is revered as the tribe's oldest man, a mark of great respect among most Indians.

The tribal councilmen conferred briefly with Little Coyote, an emaciated, almost venerable figure. His Sutai forebears undoubtedly wore buckskins, but Little Coyote was dressed in moccasins, jeans, and a western shirt. His head was wrapped in a cloth head band from the back of which hung two hair braids tied with colored cloth strips.

DECLINES CIGARETTE

He excused himself and walked down a path. Sitting Man conversed in the tongue of his people and declined a cigarette. An interpreter explained that Sitting Man believed in neither smoking nor drinking.

"When a man drinks, he becomes another man," he declared, emphasizing his statement with hand signs. "He goes crazy."

Presently we followed Little Coyote. The shrine proved to be a canvas tepee partly concealed from view by a low, encircling hillside. We tossed our hats on the tepee stakes and entered. No one spoke.

Hollow Breast knelt on one knee. We sat crosslegged on a strip of carpet on the ground, directly opposite Little Coyote who sat similarly on a couch also on the ground. At the head of the couch, apparently attached to a cross-like support, was the Sacred Hat. It was never revealed. It is shown only to tribal leaders once each 50 years.

History of the Sacred Hat, I was told, is lost in antiquity. Later I learned that the origin of the Sutai medicine men likewise is buried in the dim past and that they are a strange and gifted race of great honor.

We spoke in turn to Little Coyote who stared, trance-like, straight ahead. His translated words to me were that he hoped my mission was successful and that I could help bring about better understanding of the Indian's way of life and his problems. Then he said he was sure I'd have a pleasant trip.

That night I had my first flat tire of the entire junket.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 11, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—MISSION IN MONTANA PROVIDES JOBS, EDUCATION FOR INDIANS

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Ashland, Mont., once was described by an eastern writer as perhaps the only town in the United States that enjoys the unique distinction of having no law and a two-story privy.

Since then, however, time has wrought some changes in the tiny community on the eastern border of the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation. A deputy sheriff now enforces the law as best he can in Ashland, and the strange, offset structure which once was attached to the rear of a two-story frame hotel, has tumbled over. The hotel, itself, has long been deserted.

It stands today on Ashland's one street like a hollow shell, windows shattered, floors strewn with broken bottles, a rickety outside stairway clinging to one side.

One of Ashland's residents said the town had long considered tearing down the old building but ventured a guess it would "make the younger Indians mighty mad.

"When they come in here during the summer and get tanked up, they sometimes use that place for love-making. Some of the others don't care for that much privacy."

BAR CROWD SMALL

I saw what he meant that very night. It had been some time since welfare checks had been distributed among the Indians, and the crowd in the bar consequently was small.

A cluster of tribesmen held forth at the lower end of the bar. Some cowpunchers and a traveling salesman drank and talked at the other end. A jukebox blared.

On the dance floor at the rear of the tavern, a young Indian in soiled work shirt and blue jeans, and an Indian girl who was similarly dressed, were vigorously engaged in what passed for dancing.

With the girl clutched to him, the youth lurched and stomped about the dance floor with the ponderous movements of a grizzly. When the music stopped, they staggered out the back door and into the shadows.

It is a scene duplicated nightly in reservation border towns from one end of the Indian country to the other. When relief checks are received or when some lucky tribesman cashes a sizable land sale check, the boisterous bottle belting and lovemaking assume louder and even grander proportions.

FORTUNES SQUANDERED

Indians have squandered fortunes in a few days on the skid rows of some of the larger cities and in the smaller but no less sordid pup towns that rim the reservations with temptation.

A few miles from Ashland, however, the St. Labre Catholic Mission continues undismayed to whack away at the Indian problem through education of the young and by engaging in an unusual project for a religious institution—an industry.

The Reverend Father Emmett Hoffmann, a Capuchin Franciscan monk, directs the 76-year-old mission. This year 266 Indian boys and girls are enrolled in the elementary and high schools. Ten full-time teachers, seven of them nuns, are employed.

Also employed in fairly well-paying jobs provided by the mission are 120 adults, 95 of them Indians. Most of them work in Father Hoffmann's "plastic doll plant," a moccasin-strap operation which not only makes jobs but gives the mission its principal source of income.

Five years ago Father Hoffmann conceived the idea for the industry. He contracted with an eastern plastics firm for unassembled, unpainted parts for a small Indian doll which he named "Johnny Walks Last."

Then he set up an assembly line, hired Indian men and women to put the pieces together and paint on the hair, eyes, and lips. He created a sort of boiler-room operation which produced a huge mailing list. Then he completed the circle by establishing a packaging and mailing department.

That first year one-half million dolls were mailed, each with a solicitation for a donation. Last year one million dolls of a new design were mailed.

The return mail 1 year ago brought in $250,000 above costs, in all more than $800,000.

Father Hoffmann expanded the mission's charity program of direct relief to the Northern Cheyennes. He established a trade school. It teaches adults welding, woodworking, typing, and home economics.

Then, looking toward his dream of someday establishing an Indian college, he launched an ambitious construction program which includes a huge, modern cafeteria for his Indian boys and girls, a new dormitory and other facilities.

More jobs for Indians were created by the construction program and jobs for Indians is Father Hoffmann's idea of a solution to the Indian problem.

"These Indians are skillful with their hands," he said. "They work fast and with dexterity. They enjoy working and when they earn their money instead of having it given to them, they appreciate it more. Also, a tired Indian is more likely to go home at night than he is to drop in at the bar and get drunk.

COULD LICK PROBLEM

"If we could get industry on the reservation, we could lick the Indian problem in one generation."

Another branch of the plastics operation is at Lame Deer, Mont., on the northern edge of the reservation. It is run by a nonprofit organization which has been at loggerheads for months with reservation superintendent Don Y. Jensen over a proposed lease for expansion of the project. Until the lease is approved, the plant must continue on a limited scale.

Jensen disclaims responsibility for holding up the lease and says the organization has been tardy in supplying information requested despite the exchange of numerous memoranda.

At Billings, Mont., it was learned from Percy E. Melis, area director for the Bureau of Indian Affairs, that the information desired concerned salaries and production costs which the nonprofit organization regards as confidential.

Officers of the organization and many members of the Northern Cheyenne Tribal Council blame Jensen, whether justly or not, for most of the reservation's problems including the sales of allotted lands.

WORKS BY THE BOOK

Jensen, who came to the reservation from a similar assignment at Standing Rock Reservation in South Dakota 2 years ago, replies he is running the reservation "according to the book."

The job of reservation superintendent is not easy. For one thing the Indians are not schooled in modern business practices. Too, they are inclined to procrastinate.

Jensen explained the whys and wherefores of the single source of water for a community of about 125 Indians at Birney, Mont. He said the tribe received a donation of $1,000 for a well there several months ago from Arrow, Inc., a nonprofit, nationwide Indian welfare organization.

The tribe appropriated several thousand dollars for a well-drilling program but thus far has done little or nothing about it, he said.

Regardless of the Indian's wishes or his own, for that matter, Jensen must hew to policy set by higher ups in the Bureau of Indian Affairs. And almost without exception, persons interviewed on the reservation seem convinced that policy now is aimed at termination of trust protection now enjoyed by the Indians, to oppose establishment of industry on the reservations, and eventually to compel as many Indians as possible to leave the reservation.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 12, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—MISUNDERSTOOD INDIAN OFTEN A HARD WORKER

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Possibly we've treated the Indian too long as a mere statistic and not as the perplexed human he actually is. At least that was my impression as I left the Northern Cheyenne Indian Reservation to cross the land of the Crows and continue northward to Blackfoot country.

Could it be that we expect too much of these too-frequently-benighted tribesmen? Or don't we demand enough of them? You'll wonder about this after an extended visit with the Northern Cheyennes.

These are a simple, almost childish people for the most part, content to accept and live on the white man's gratuities, reluctant to interfere with nature, friendly and trusting, a people who love home, whether it has a dirt floor or not, and who see no good reason to leave it.

Although there are many outstanding exceptions among the Indians, ambition as the white man knows it is not a universal characteristic.

Yet they are restless, unhappy with their plight. They know something is wrong but they don't know what it is or what to do about it.

INDIANS WORK HARD

The Indian is a stranger in his own land. He's a hard worker when he has an assigned task, or a goal in mind. Maybe he wants to buy a horse, a saddle or a gun.

He'll slave until he saves enough money to get what he has in mind. Then he'll quit. The women seem to have a greater tenacity in this respect. One employer said the labor turnover rate for men runs as high as 1,000 percent. Women stay on the job.

Lyman Brewster, a rancher who used to lease grazing land from the Northern Cheyennes, told this anecdote to provide an insight into the thinking of some of the more backward Indians:

A few years ago an unusually heavy blizzard swept the reservation. Cattle were stranded without feed. So the Air Force put a haylift into operation and flew emergency feed to the livestock.

This hay-from-heaven was considered a truly great wonder by the Indians.

New year, Brewster continued, many Indian ranchers didn't bother to raise hay. They thought that surely the white man's airplanes would return if the stock needed feeding.

The complexities of leasing land when so many heirs are involved finally provoked Brewster into quitting ranching. He moved to Billings, Mont., and now is selling ranches.

Willy Hollow Breast, vice chairman of the Northern Cheyenne Tribal Council and one of the best informed Indians in Montana, is aware of the shortcomings of his people. He favors holding the reservation intact, so the tribe can operate a corporate cattle raising enterprise.

Money from this venture, he believes, might enable the tribe to send many of their young children to white schools. According to Hollow Breast, an early association with whites is highly desirable. He knows that young impressions last a long time.

Proof of the value of such association can be found on the Crow Indian Reservation, which adjoins the Northern Cheyenne. The average Crow Indian is visibly more generally adapted to the white man's ways.

His reservation is on a main highway, just north of Sheridan, Wyo., and south of Billings, Mont. The thriving city of Hardin, Mont., is only a few minutes' drive from Crow Agency.

The Crows are related to the Sioux. But a Government booklet on them says they broke away from the ancestral group and settled in the valleys of the Yellowstone and Big Horn Rivers in northern Wyoming and southeastern Montana long before the coming of the white man.

At one time long ago they were an agricultural people, but with the change to the buffalo economy, greater stress was laid on military valor. Personal gain, the booklet says, and the accumulation of private wealth still means little to the Crows.

Yet the Crows are generally further advanced than many of the northern tribes. They more frequently make good employees, enjoy vigorous and enlightened leadership, and share to a degree in the general good fortunes of their region.

They are retarded in school, however, because most children speak no English when they enter school.

Approximately 3,000 Crows live on the reservation which is several times larger than that of the northern Cheyennes. About 800 live elsewhere. Years ago thet Crows warred with many neighboring tribes over hunting grounds and readily joined U.S. military forces to fight the enemies of the Crows.

In return for this they were generously rewarded in the Laramie Treaty in 1851 with a reservation of 38,531,174 acres in Montana and Wyoming Territories. By 1868, however, the second Laramie Treaty was signed and the white man reneged on his original promise. The reservation was cut to 9 million acres.

Subsequent cessions to whites, the Government, the Northern Pacific Railroad, the State of Montana, and land sales reduced the reservation to 1,727,201 acres of trust land.

By and large, however, the Crows have done fairly well. They adapt readily to the agricultural and livestock economy but their living standards are still low.

Construction of Yellowtail Dam, for which the tribe was voted $2.5 million of Federal funds for 7,000 acres to be inundated by reservoir, may afford unequaled opportunities for employment.

Undoubtedly it will bring in considerably more wampum for the skid row bars of Billings' South Side, where the test of a man's sobriety frequently seems to be his ability to crawl to the bar, hoist himself up and offer cash.

In some of the noisier joints which advertise "Skid Row Champagne, two bits," there seem to be only one or two simple rules: All fights are quickly ended and no person is served if he or she is lying on the floor. It should be added that some of the establishments forfeit considerable trade because of this one restriction.

On the one night I toured the bars on Billings' South Side I counted eight drunks who fell to the floor at one time or another; was solicited by three fairly young Indian girls and counted two dozen patrons who were helplessly drunk.

PLACE OF SORROWS

Early in this series of articles, a letter from an anonymous writer was printed. In it he told of a "Place of Many Sorrows" in Billings. I found no such place, unless it was the slum area on the south side of the tracks, inhabited by Indians and a mixture of bloods drawn together by the common bonds of poverty, depravity and companionship in misery.

No one knew of an all-Indian village such as the one at Great Falls, Mont., known as "Hill 57." That was the next destination. From there came the story of Heartbreak Hill, the end of the trail for many a once-proud Indian.

From there also came the story of a courageous group of civic-minded citizens and religious leaders, crusading for a better way of life for the Indian. It proved to be a story of hope and rescue.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 13, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—"HILL 57" TYPIFIES INDIAN SQUALOR AT GREAT FALLS

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

The towering smokestack of a sprawling smelter dominates the skyline of Montana's leading metropolis, Great Falls. Its crown commands a sweeping view. It looks over endless miles of rich agriculture, down into the city's bustling business streets and on hosts of handsome homes in expanding residential sections. It's a scene of prosperity in a growing western city.

If you could look from the top of the stack you'd see a big Air Force base, extensive railroad yards and the broad Missouri River.

In the middle of the river you probably would notice a small, uninhabited island. It was the site of the last sun dance put on by the Indians in the Great Falls area in 1914.

Yet this is still big Indian country. Southeast of Great Falls lies the Northern Cheyenne and Crow Indian Reservations on the Wyoming-Montana border. Northeast toward North Dakota are the Rocky Boy, Fort Belknap, and Fort Peck Reservations. Northwest, on the Canadian border, is the Blackfeet Reservation and to the west is the reservation of the Flatheads.

The on-reservation population of Montana is 27,500. But not all Indians live on reservations.

Three miles west of the smelter, almost at the edge of a modern housing development, is infamous "Hill 57." It's an Indian village. Its shocking filth, poverty, and degradation already have commanded national notice.

A short distance back toward the smelter plant and overlooking acres of new, modern homes, is "Mount Royal," another Indian village. Its residents regard themselves a notch higher on the social scale than their Hill 57 neighbors, possibly because their homes have wood flooring.

Of the two, Hill 57 is the more populous. It likewise is the more awesome trasherie. Its outstanding features are the frail huts, the battered hulks of abandoned cars, the ever-present outhouses, a hand pump which is the sole water supply for the entire community and an almost unbelievable sea of junk resembling a city rubbish disposal

Here in the two communities, in the midst of rusting and rotting discards, live 260 persons, 159 of whom are children under 17.

The census figure was obtained last spring by the Friends of Hill 57, a civic group of Great Falls citizens. Overcrowding is serious enough in spring and summer, but when winter comes and jobs are precious, the population rises above 350, and suffering becomes tragically acute.

The shacks are poor protection against the Arctic blasts of the Montana winter. Respiratory illnesses mount. The cry for relief grows louder.

Two winters ago, one family lived in a tiny log shed that had been used for years as a stable. Their floor was the dried accumulation of manure. A wood fire in a tub in the middle of the stable provided heat.

A spring thaw sent a small flood through the stable and down the hill through the house of a neighbor Indian family. Later, the water froze, turned the floors of both homes to ice. One Indian girl froze her feet. Another suffered leg injuries when she slipped on the ice, barefooted, and fell.

In one of the larger houses last winter, 32 persons shared accommodations and meager food supplies. On the Rocky Boy Reservation, one oldtimer was reported to be living in a chicken coop. Privation is not limited to off-reservation Indians.

The winter of 1957 brought tragedy. Some boys picked up old battery boxes and burned them for fuel. One died. The others were hospitalized for lead poisoning.

Violent death visited the hill early in the winter of 1959. An Indian whom officers said had been drinking, returned home and found his pregnant wife packing to leave him. He told officers he jabbed a broken bottle into her abdomen. She died on the littered floor of their shack in sight of her children.

Hospital attendants said she might have been saved had there been a telephone in the neighborhood.

A poignant sequel to the tragedy took place in Havre, Mont. An eye-witness told of being in a hotel some months ago when the hotel manager ran downstairs and exclaimed that a baby had just died upstairs. The man had called for a doctor, but he had not arrived in time.

It was an Indian baby, 4 to 5 months old. There were three other children in the room. They had been cold and hungry and the hotel man had given them shelter.

Their mother was the woman who died on the floor of the shack on Hill 57.

Grim and stark, indeed, is the picture of Indian life in Montana. Surprisingly, it grows worse the further you look. And you get a really good look through the findings of the friends of Hill 57.

Nucleus of the relief efforts of the good citizens of Great Falls is a self-appointed work force. Chief among these are Sister Providencia, Mrs. James Moriarty, Max Gubatayao, and Richard A. Charles. In one way or another they represent the Cascade County Community Council.

SISTER OF CHARITY

Sister Providencia, a member of the Sisters of Charity of Providence, is professor of sociology at the College of Great Falls. She calls her work with the Indians of Hill 57 and Mount Royal her "Dust Bin Project." She once was described by a Montana Congressman as one of the Nation's foremost authorities on the American Indian.

Mrs. Moriarty, wife of a prominent Great Falls businessman, can always be depended upon to find sources of emergency aid to the Indians. She once came to the rescue with a truck to haul wood after Hill 57 had been without fuel in winter weather for 2 weeks.

Gubatayao is a pharmacist at Columbus Hospital and a tireless worker for the Indians. His understanding runs deep. He is Filipino and part Alaska Tlingit Indian. Shortly after his discharge from the Navy, Gubatayao met Charles, a semiretired veteran of the Army and Air Force, at Seattle, Wash.

UNDER CLINICAL STUDY

They found a mutual interest in Indian problems. Gubatayao persuaded Charles to move to Great Falls. And their coworkers have put the residents of Hill 57 under a finely focused clinical study.

Most of the hill dwellers are Cree or Chippewa although there are a few Blackfeet and transients from other tribes. Some were chased out of Canada years ago. The Crees have been booted about from place to place for years, have been moved four times around Great Falls and burned out once by aggravated whites.

They make meager livings picking rocks off cultivated fields or work in crop harvests and at picking cans off the city dump for reprocessing.

The researchers learned that 7 families, totaling 36 persons, lived in 1-room shacks; 29 families of 172 persons lived in 2-room houses; only 4 families of 33 persons occupied 3-room houses, and 2 families totaling 19 persons resided in 4-room houses.

Seventy-six percent of Hill 57 residents had lived thusly 10 years or longer.

Some originally were on reservations. Some sold their land and became homeless. They've stayed homeless. They're not easily assimilated into the white culture. They don't fit and nobody wants them.

Once the Government bought land near Great Falls for an Indian housing project. When whites objected, the project fell through. The land was sold after 1950 and the money spent on the Rocky Boy Reservation.

They found 62 percent of the hill's people getting various types of Government assistance, 24 men with seasonal work and only 8 employed the year around. One father of 13 children under the age 8, had no job, no relief, and no food.

Only 39 percent of the children attended school.

Some other statistics were even more appalling.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 14, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—U.S. BUREAU APPARENTLY WOULD END TRUSTEESHIP

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Every indication throughout Indian country points to an apparent determination of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to terminate Federal trusteeship in Indian matters and to scatter unprepared, near-primitive tribesmen upon the charities and institutions of American communities.

The attitude seems to be "We haven't been able to resolve the Indian problem in nearly 100 years of stewardship. So let the Indian take care of himself."

Alarmed observers close to the heart of the Indian problem in Montana say that Indians are being compelled by a combination of inadequate supervision, inadequate opportunity, inadequate relief, and the inadequacy of the Indian, himself, to sell their land for food.

Sister Providencia, Catholic nun and professor of sociology at the College of Great Falls, Mont., recognized as one of the foremost authorities on Indians, says this wholesale dispersal of tribes threatens western communities with economic chaos and possible ruin.

In Montana, the Government-supervised sales of individually owned Indian allotted lands has reached enormous proportions. In January a year ago the Blackfeet Tribal Council asked the Government to halt the sale of lands because "within 5 years there won't be enough land left to organize economical grazing units or even for Indian-owned livestock on the reservation."

During the same month at Poplar, Mont., bids were opened for the eighth time on one parcel of Indian lands. This, according to a newspaper account, was because only 12 of 30 bids received were at or above the appraised value. The bids averaged $25.82 an acre. The acreage totaled 14,064.

Sister Providencia has figures to show that 80,000 acres have been sold on the Fort Peck Reservation alone "due to want."

A few months ago, Representative LEE METCALF, Democrat, of Montana, told the House Subcommittee on Indian Affairs of the seriousness of removal of the Indian land base. He quoted from a report and memorandum from Senator JAMES E. MURRAY, Democrat, of Montana, one of the Indians' best friends.

The report said the Indian is losing his land at a potentially disastrous rate. During the period from 1953 to 1957, 1,790,649 acres went out of Indian trust status. This total was more than twice the amount (804,763 acres) which was removed from trust during the preceding 5-year period, from 1948 to 1952.

"A total of 3,307,217 acres was removed from individual Indian trust during the 10-year period from 1948 through 1957, including lands which were sold to the tribes and which presumably remained in trust status.

"Tribal trust land increased by 1,213,307 acres during the 10-year period. However, the study shows that neither sales to the tribes nor takings for public purposes were major causes for the loss of Indian trust land."

Again the question arises: What becomes of Indians who sell their lands?

One Blackfeet tribesman squandered $40,000 in a few months. He returned to the reservation with his family begging tribal assistance. Another reportedly went through $80,000 in similar fashion. These are exceptional cases—only so far as dollar volume is concerned. Most land sales net only a few dollars to a few thousand dollars.

Admittedly not all the Indians on Hill 57 in Great Falls, Mont., are tribesmen who have sold their land in recent years or months. But their circumstances, their confusion, their unwillingness or inability to adapt to modern culture are typical of the average.

Sister Providencia's intensive studies have revealed some arresting side effects of Indian displacement. Tops on the list are "an alarming number of young people who are manifesting personality disorganization—truancy, delinquency, alcoholism, paranoid or schizophrenic demonstrations."

She said there are instances where schoolchildren have reported to class in a drunken stupor because their fathers ordered the youngsters to drink with them. They didn't want to drink alone.

While there are encouraging exceptions, to be sure, the pattern of degeneration seems to recur too frequently to be denied. The Indian leaves the reservation for whatever reason. Eventually he gravitates to the skid rows and the slums, where living conditions are usually worse than the substandard levels of the reservation.

Principal product of these slum areas is a costly human waste, morally, physically, mentally, and taxwise, a waste of resources.

Representative METCALF and Sister Providencia have compiled separate charts in this area of thought which can be described as nothing less than startling.

ONE-FIFTIETH OF POPULATION

These show that while Montana's 27,400 Indians make up only one-fiftieth of the State's population, they comprise one-third of the inmates of the State Industrial School, one-fourth of the inmates of the Home of the Good Shepherd, one-third of the inmates of the Montana Orphans' Home, and almost two-thirds of the enrollment of the Vocational School for Girls.

The office of the warden of the Montana State Prison counts 18 percent of convicts as either all Indian or part Indian, and that doesn't include those of less than one-fourth Indian blood.

Indians account for more than 4 percent of old-age assistance, 26 percent of aid to dependent children, almost 14 percent of the aid to needy blind, and 8 percent of aid to the disabled.

In the child-welfare services field, 19.2 percent of the children on the rolls are Indians.

"If we are to measure the success of the Bureau's program by this yardstick," Representative METCALF said in a prepared statement to the House Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, "it is a complete and utter failure."

Yet, despite this lopsided Indian dependency one way or another upon the public purse, the cry is for even more assistance.

Sister Providencia obtained statistical material only a few days ago from agencies at the State capital in Helena, which disclosed that both tribal and county general assistance are cut off in some instances during periods of great need when the Federal Government distributes surplus foods to Indians.

During such periods the county or the tribe on the Blackfeet and Fort Peck reservations "have arrangements to provide a token welfare payment. The average payment per person, 1956–59, 75 cents a week."

SUPPLEMENT TO FOOD

The payment supplements surplus foods for some people from November 15 to April 15 or May 1. For September the surplus foods were as follows: 10 pounds of flour per person; 1 package of powdered milk; 1 package of powdered eggs, and 5 pounds of rice.

Of 1,200 Indians on the Rocky Boy Reservation, 842 were reported on surplus commodities during September.

Any attempt to report on the general assistance and other relief programs of the bureau, the counties, the States and whatever other agencies may be involved, is almost impossible. The Blackfeet tribal council, for instance, tries to help from tribal funds. Whoever else chips in is difficult to determine, so confused are reports on the subject.

However, Representative METCALF in his previously mentioned statement, brought out an interesting sidelight on assistance administration. He read into the report an exchange of letters between Iliff McKay, secretary of the Blackfeet Tribal Council, and various agencies of the Bureau of Indian Affairs concerning a reported $40,000 set aside for assistance on the Blackfeet.

At last, METCALF reported, "we finally traced $38,000" of it. Iliff's correspondence began apparently on November 18, 1958, with an inquiry to Reinholt Brust, assistant BIA area director, Billings, Mont. An accounting of the $38,000 expenditure for general assistance was requested.

Iliff was referred from one department within the agency to another. In the end his persistent inquiring brought a reply from Area Director Percy E. Melis, according to METCALF'S copies of the correspondence, which gave this explanation of what happened to the $38,000:

"Branch of Welfare at the Blackfeet Agency had approximately $38,000 available in fiscal 1958 for salaries, operating expenses, and child welfare (mainly boarding home care). Because of two vacancies in the branch for nearly 6 months * * * expenditures totaled approximately $18,000 and are listed as follows:

"Equipment, $523.64; child welfare, $7,707.77; other welfare services, $69.01; salaries, $8,274.91; travel and motor expenses, $408.11; other expenses, $1,683.08."

Less than half the $18,000 went for assistance. More than half went for administrative expenses.

[From the Denver Post, Jan. 15, 1960]

AMERICA'S LOST PEOPLE—U.S. EFFORTS TO AID INDIAN CLUMSY AND COSTLY

(By Robert W. Fenwick)

Where do we stand today with relation to the so-called "Indian problem"? There's a simple answer to the question that seems to sum up effectively:

We stand mired in almost precisely the same moccasin tracks of nearly 75 years ago. Somewhere we missed the trail—and at overwhelming expense in wasted funds and both natural and human resources.

We have failed miserably to raise the economic and cultural standards of Indians generally, at least throughout most of the West.

SOME PROGRESS

Admittedly, some progress has been made. And there are encouraging indications that even more may be achieved. But even progress sometimes compounds the Indian problems which beset both the Red Man and our country. For example:

Some effective blows have been struck in the arena of health. In 1940, 115 of each 1,000 Indians born alive died in infancy. This has been cut to 58 deaths in each 1,000 births.

Deaths by tuberculosis have been reduced dramatically—by 40 percent. The tuberculosis incidence rate has been chopped 25 percent. All this in 4 years.

A grave disparity between health conditions for Indians and non-Indians still exists. Yet Indian health has improved measurably.

All this has added up to a population resurgence for our "vanishing race." The division of Indian health of the U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, reports that the Indian birth rate since 1950 is outstripping that for the rest of the U.S. population.

THREE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND IN 24 STATES

Census estimates are that there are now 350,000 Indians living in 24 States having Federal Indian reservations—most of them in the Rocky Mountain empire.

This increase in population amounts to 100,000 since 1890. It puts the Indian in the predicament of a man whose feet are swelling while his shoes shrink. As the Indian family grows bigger and bigger, the reservation home grows smaller and smaller. His land-based security is dwindling because of national policy and the vicissitudes of complex, modern economics which put the squeeze on the small landowner.

There are now more than 300 Indian-occupied land areas in the Nation (excluding Alaska) which are under Federal trusteeship. They range from a few acres to the great Navajo Reservation topping more than 15 million acres.

Before the allotment of 1887, Indian lands totaled 137,724,570 acres, all tribally owned. By 1934 that figure had shrunk to 52,142,935 acres of which 17,622,700 were individually owned.

Some lands were ceded to the Government, some disposed of for other reasons. Now today, the principal threat to the reservation is the mounting sales of individually owned allotted lands.

COST FANTASTIC

The entire situation adds up to more Indians on public assistance, more Indians who require greater numbers of Federal employees to help cope with their problems—at fantastic cost.

On June 30, 1959, the Bureau of Indian Affairs had 11,477 employees. A report by the U.S. Bureau of Health's Indian Division a year earlier listed 4,520 employees. The total Federal employees devoting their full time to the Indians therefore adds up to just 3 short of 16,000—a figure undoubtedly surpassed by now.

This amounts to 1 Federal employee in just the 2 services for each 21 Indians. And on the Indian family pattern that would be 1 hired man for each 4 families.

On the same grand scale, a city the size of Denver conceivably would have in excess of 20,000 public employees.

It must be allowed in fairness, however, that the reservations are widely separated, their requirements considerably different, and that a few of the 11,477 BIA employees are occupied with Indian problems in Alaska which does not figure in the population figure used here. That may pull down the employee-per-Indian average a little—but only a little at best.

Nevertheless, to project the pattern of public dependency a bit further, it must be understood that the employees listed as working for the Heatlh Service and the Bureau do not include another army of Federal workers engaged in other services.

These agencies also serving Indians run a long and expensive list. Included are the Indian Claims Commission; Lands Division of the Department of Justice which represents the Government in civil litigation pertaining to Indians; the Bureau of American Ethnology, Smithsonian Institution; the Indian unit, interior section, National Archives, and Records Services; Indian Claims Section of the General Accounting Office.

The Department of the Treasury handles Indian tribal funds and the Library of Congress does research on Indian matters for Congress.

Also not included on the visible payroll are untold numbers of other Federal and State employees administering Social Security and other public assistance, teachers not employed in BIA schools but whose salaries are paid at least in part by BIA funds, and undoubtedly others.

The cost of these services has never been ascertained because it would require more time than could be afforded by the House committee which reported on the question in 1958. That by the committee's own admission.

This much is on the record: In fiscal 1920 the appropriation for the Bureau of Indian Affairs was $11,286,000; 1930, $18,879,000; 1940, $42,609,000; 1950, $67,470,000; 1960, $115,467,000.

HEALTH BUDGET EXTRA

And it should be noted that the 1960 appropriation figure does not include a separate appropriation of $50,287,000 for the U.S. Public Health Service which assumed medical care of Indians July 1, 1955. Prior to that, health costs were included in the BIA appropriation.

Thus it would seem with even the simplest arithmetic that the Indian is a luxury we can hardly afford. It likewise would appear that we've not only lost the trail; we've forfeited considerable cash along the way.

This is not the end of the drain on the public purse. Wherever Indians accumulate in sizable numbers, new problems are born. In Great Falls, Mont., for example, Ben P. Broderick, credit manager of Columbus Hospital reported recently to the division of Indian health on an alarming increase in charity cases among Indians. He said it put a threatening burden on the hospital's resources.

Great Falls' two hospitals, Columbus and Deaconess, he said, learned from a study that 18 Indian patients currently were paying on their own bills; the Blackfeet Tribal Council had assumed responsibility for 24; the Polio Foundation and other private groups were sponsoring 11; Cascade County was paying for 18; and the Public Health Service for 23 patients from reservations. That's only one area far removed from the reservations.

Police Chief Anthony Coppens of Great Falls attributes 60 percent of the city's jail maintenance costs to Indians who don't live within Great Falls. The situation has grown gradually worse since Indians have been given the legal right to drink, he added.

GEOGRAPHY NO FACTOR

The pattern differs little with geography. In Gallup, N. Mex., a few weeks ago, the police committee issued a public appeal for support of a proposal to hire police sufficient for a city of 35,000. Gallup's actual population is around 13,000. The need for additional police is attributed to the large transient Indian population.

Cooperation with the Navajo Tribal Council, a new police code for offenses, and a special records section were urged to help curb drunkenness, reduce the slaughter on the highways, and make it possible for police to make adequate investigations of suspected murder cases.

"The practice of not thoroughly investigating the causes of various deaths," said a report by the Gallup Board of Trustees, "has caused Gallup considerable embarrassment."

Extra law-enforcement officers hired, and many of those already on the payrolls of scores of off-reservation communities, can also be added to the armies engaged in services either to or because of Indians.

There are other hosts of citizens in the service of the Indians—unrewarded workers in the free schools and missions of various religions, hundreds engaged in charitable enterprises everywhere, and the volunteer and salaried workers of such organizations as Arrow, Inc., and the Association of American Indian Affairs headed by inexhaustible Oliver LaFarge, the New Mexico champion of Indian betterment.

SOME BRIGHT SPOTS

There are bright spots in the picture, too. A proposed point 4 program of Federal, self-help assistance to Indians on a reservation-by-reservation basis adjusted to varying needs, holds excellent promise.

Various groups and prominent individuals in Montana and North Dakota are winning support for a plan to employ Indian youths in national forests on a program similar to the Civilian Conservation Corps of the depression era.

Indians in Nebraska have a program called "We Shake Hands" which is accomplishing great things with backing of the Association of American Indian Affairs.

Alcoholics Anonymous has won toeholds in some areas of wanton intoxication and is working hard in others.

There is evidence of rebellion among many Indian women against the backwardness of their people although at times this evidence takes a sordid turn as it did on Hill 57 at Great Falls, Mont., a few months ago. There, according to hospital officials, a wave of abortions broke out. Women induced the abortions by banging their bodies with automobile doors. In some reservation areas, however, women's clubs and study groups are being formed.

In many centers where the Relocation Service is trying to settle reservation Indians, such as Denver, considerable good influence is being exerted in the field of integration by local groups of Indians and their non-Indian friends. In Denver it's the White Buffalo Council.

EXPENSIVE EDUCATION

They are succeeding in wresting a measure of success from the relocation program which has not been a glittering triumph by any measure except that it provides a form of education, expensive education at that.

For instance it is a little farfetched for even a Government agency to expect an Indian hay hand to graduate to a factory job overnight. And it is too much to expect an Indian woman whose domestic experience has consisted of sweeping a dirt floor and curing jerk meat, to take a job as maid in a modern urban home.

By nature, by training, by intuition, by religion, by birth, the average fullblooded Indian is still largely primitive. He cannot be expected in a few generations to effect a transition from a buffalo-hunting culture to an atomic age economy. But until he does, he'll continue to be a public problem and an almost indissoluble one at that.

Right now there seems to be no unified plan of attack on that problem. Our national policy toward the Indian has vacillated from one of absolute Government paternalism to abrupt termination of all responsibility in Indian affairs.

CHAOTIC CONFUSION

Our approach to the Indian problem seems to change with each new national administration. The result has been confusion bordering on chaos in the handling of Indian matters from Washington down through the unwieldy area offices to the actual reservation site of policy execution.

I'm convinced that most Government workers in the Indian service are conscientiously striving to do the best they can and that they are devoted to the Government's declared purpose to improve the cultural and economic lot of the American Indian.

But the entire program obviously lacks direction. For one thing there is a lack of basic agricultural backgrounding on the part of the very officials who deal directly with these fundamentally agrarian peoples.

And we have lost sight of the simple fact that the human being with whom we are working must advance first from the primitive to rustic before he can be catapulted into the role of a strap-hanging commuter on a city transportation system.

In summation I'd like to use two quotations:

A commission charged with reporting on Indian conditions nearly 100 years ago concluded its report to the President with the words of Thomas Jefferson: "I fear for my country when I remember that God is just."

And Secretary of War Edwin McMasters Stanton, under President Lincoln:

"The Government never reforms an evil until the people demand it. Tell the good bishop that when he reaches the heart of the American people, the Indians will be saved."

THE JAPANESE TREATY AND OUR FUTURE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, several years ago it was my pleasure to to be present as a congressional observer, in San Francisco, at the signing of this country's treaty of peace with Japan.

This week it was again my pleasure to witness the signing of a document linking the United States and Japan. I refer to the treaty of mutual cooperation and security. In the words of Japanese Prime Minister Nobusuke Kishi, this was a "truly significant occasion."

In an article appearing in the January 21 edition of the Washington Evening Star, Mr. Constantine Brown discussed the merits of the treaty, as well as some of the problems we shall face in our future relations with Japan. I think Mr. Brown's outstanding analysis of the situation is worthy of the attention of every Member of this body; therefore, I ask unanimous consent that the article, entitled "Hopes for United States-Japanese Treaty," be printed as part of my remarks in the body of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Evening Star, Jan. 21, 1960]

HOPES FOR UNITED STATES-JAPANESE TREATY—FUTURE THREAT TO ACCORD SEEN FROM REDS AND FASCIST FACTIONS

(By Constantine Brown)

With inadequate supplies and no hope of reinforcements, the American-Filipino forces in January 1942, were fighting a hopeless battle against the strong invading forces of Japan. Manila was in the latter's hands. General MacArthur—who has now "faded away"—was preparing to put up a final but useless resistance at Corregidor. Any American who had said in those days that the two nations, bitter enemies, would sign within a few years a treaty of permanent amity and alliance would have been put away as "a mental case."

Japan's Prime Minister, Nobusuke Kishi, once jailed by us as a war criminal but now the factual head of state, since the Emperor is constitutionally a mere figurehead, pledged last Tuesday Japan's full cooperation with its former enemy and victor in all military and economic fields. We have been granted bases in Japan for our Armed Forces as well as the cooperation of the Nipponese military power, when these may be needed.

Of course, at present the Japanese military establishment is negligible. But its potential, taking into account its population and its traditions as warriors, is great. So is the industrial potential. The treaty signed in an impressive ceremony in the East Room of the White House provided absolute equality between the two signatory powers.

We have undertaken never to use the facilities accorded us by the Japanese Government of its own free will, without prior consultation and consent by Tokyo. Japan and the United States have agreed to join their own efforts with those of the other free nations of the world to help underdeveloped countries. This is regarded as good business by the Japanese industrialists and may serve the purpose of eventually achieving the greater Asia program which failed so lamentably when force was used in the years preceding the defeat in 1945.

There is no doubt whatsoever in the minds of our policymakers and of those who have known the activities of the Japanese Premier, that Mr. Kishi is sincere in his views that the future of Japan must be intimately linked with that of the United States and the rest of the free world. Mr. Kishi has not been lying on a bed of roses ever since he came to power in 1957. He has had to fight not only political opportunism, which is more rampant in Japan than in many Western countries, but also the growing power of the Communist agitators and infiltrators who have vowed not to rest until their country joins the U.S.S.R.-Red China bloc.

His position will remain unassailable as long as Japan continues to be as prosperous as she is at present. But those who are keeping tabs on the affairs of the island empire are skeptical as to whether in the event the prosperity cycle comes to an end the Japanese people themselves will want to live up to the terms of the American-Japanese treaty signed this week.

Under the pressure of public opinion, Mr. Kishi had to give his tacit approval to an exchange of cultural and commercial missions with Peiping. The relatively small but highly vocal and energetic Communist Party, supported openly or surreptitiously by the various Socialist factions, is bitterly opposed to the alliance with the United States.

Many moderates fear, because of the power of the Soviet Union and China, as well as their proximity to the Japanese shores, that this alliance might threaten the welfare and security of Japan. And, what is more important, the Japanese people themselves do not seem to have forgotten the crushing military defeat at our hands as well as the occupation of their homeland by American military forces. We are still being denounced by Mr. Kishi's opponents for having handed over the Kuriles and Sakhalin to the Russians.

It is not easy to wipe the nationalist slate clean only a few years after their national pride had been so severely injured. Japan had never been defeated before 1945. The opponents of Mr. Kishi are taking advantage of this sentiment and may be able to exploit it when the opportunity occurs.

The words of Mr. Kishi, "This truly significant occasion (the signature of the alliance) is a happy augury for the future," were unquestionably sincere and in good faith. But the question is being asked by those who are conversant with the political trends in Japan whether they represent also the intimate feelings of the Japanese masses themselves.

There was before World War II a far-seeing group of political men in Japan who were convinced that a war with the United States would be fatal. This group was swept aside by the warlords who had been lured by the Nazi-Communist infiltrators in the highest position in Tokyo. History has a nasty habit of repeating itself.

NO SURRENDER ECONOMICALLY TO SOVIET RUSSIA

Mr. BRIDGES. Mr. President, I am sure that all of us are fully conscious of Soviet Premier Khrushchev's promise to bury us. He has explained this in terms of economic warfare. This is a conflict he means to win by any method he can find.

As an example of this new type of warfare and the Communist leader's desire to build on our know-how and our materials, we find that a group of American companies have sold to Russia a multimillion-dollar complex of textile machinery.

The representatives of Soviet Russia first approached the chemical industries. In a letter to the President on June 2, 1958, Premier Khrushchev proposed to buy $100 million in chemical plants, processes, and technologies.

Mr. President, it is heartening to know that the Manufacturing Chemists' Association, in polling its members, found them turning down the offer flat.

The chemical industry is a must with Communist Russia, for in that country that industry is rated one-fourth to one-third of our own industry; and to catch up would take years.

All this is brought out in an article by Holmes Alexander, of the McNaught Syndicate, Inc., published in the Manchester (N.H.) Union-Leader.

Because of its great importance in this economic warfare declared on us, I ask unanimous consent to have the article printed in the body of the RECORD, for the information of all.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Manchester (N.H.) Union-Leader, Jan. 14, 1960]

NO SURRENDER—ECONOMICALLY?

(By Holmes Alexander)

WASHINGTON.—Internationally speaking, pursuit of the White Dove has become what chasing the Bluebird used to be. But these fine-feathered creatures never get captured. The achievement of peace, like that of happiness, occurs only in legends.

This melancholy truism strikes the New Year reporter in an odd but prophetic fashion. At the White House and State Department you can hear peace talk. At the Defense Department you can hear of cut budgets and disarmament. But at the Commerce Department, of all places, you hear war.

Of all places? No, on second thought, commerce is where you would expect to get the truest pitch these days. There is a war on—but it's an economic war. It is a conflict through which the Sino-Soviet bloc intends to win world domination without much bloodshed and at little risk, since the Communist bloc has all to gain and little to lose.

Your reporter obliquely came upon these facts which have been unchanged by all the Red whistling for the White Dove. A consortium of American companies has sold a multimillion dollar complex of textile machinery to Russia. It seemed a good subject for a background column. Did this pre-Christmas sale presage other deals to come? With the lifting of the steel strike, are we about to ride an export boom of products for which Russia will pay cash? Has the spirit of Camp David descended upon the market place, so that now we can dispose of our surpluses to a former enemy in the cold war?

In each instance, the answer is a scoffing negative. Commerce Secretary Mueller is less of a no-trade man than ex-Secretary Strauss, but the policy still stands—no trade in strategic goods. It gladdened this capitalistic heart to find that on at least one toughly contested sector of the economic war front—American industry is passing the word to American Government: You can't do business with communism.

This commendable example is the $25 billion 1959 chemical business. It is an industry which appears to be more adamant toward Russian trade blandishments than other industries, and even more adamant than many top Federal officials.

The reasons can be confidently set forth. It was, first and specifically, to the chemical industry that Khrushchev first offered a big deal. The Soviet boss, in a letter to Eisenhower on June 2, 1958, proposed to buy $100 million of chemical plants, processes, and technologies. The Manufacturing Chemists' Association polled its member companies which, to their everlasting credit, spurned the offer and urged the President, the Secretary of Commerce and all Western allies to give the same rejection to similar Red proposals. Spokesmen for the industry today feel just as strongly opposed as ever to trading their know-how for any conceivable amount of money or promises.

And why so big "No"? Well, here we come to the central fact of the economic war of the 1960's. It is this—the Russians are not industrially ahead of this country. Despite their missiles and space vehicles, which are the result of cramming sessions and crash programs, the Russian technology is far behind American and Western production and quality.

In industrial chemistry, which is a "must" matter, Russian capacity is rated one-fourth to one-third that of the United States. Given time, the Russians may catch us in chemistry. But it is calculated that, at a minimum, the Russians must expend 10,000 man-years to close this crucial gap. In different terms, Russia, to achieve the chemical industry goals set by Premier Khrushchev, would have to take 1,400 top technicians from other duties and work them for 7 years.

Conceivably, Khrushchev may do this. In military production, in consumer goods, in world trade, in the exploitation of the enormous petroleum potential, Russia needs equal-to-our chemical skills, perhaps more than anything else. There is only one way in which Khrushchev may be spared the big outlay man-year costs. That way is for him to get prototype chemical plants from the United States or our Western allies.

The Russian boss would like to do this by purchase or theft. The proffered $100 million would be a grab. On the record, the Russians would not hesitate to steal secret formulas or to swipe American patents and copyrights. But for the United States to permit either the purchase or the theft of such valuable properties would be equivalent to losing—by surrender or lack of vigilance—one of the biggest battles of the economic war.

The American motto for 1960 ought to be hung, like the old frontiersman's rifle and powder horn, over the hearth. It should read: "There's still a war on, brother."

SAFETY IN THE AIR

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, during the course of the proceedings in this Chamber yesterday, the following suggestion was made:

> Perhaps the administration should consider halting all air traffic for a few days, for an exhaustive check.

Mr. President, that is not the answer to this problem.

I should like to read some statistics which I have compiled in regard to airline travel. They prove that to stop airline travel for an hour or a day or a week would not prevent air accidents.

U.S. trunk and local service airlines carry 144,000 passengers every day, right now. Eighty-five million passenger-miles are flown every day. The airlines make 8,800 takeoffs every day. Stuart Tipton made the statement that CAB records show a continuing decrease in the air travel fatality rate—from 2.45 fatalities per 100 million passenger-miles for 5 years 1940–44, to a low of 0.5 for period from 1950 to 1959. In the last 20 years the scheduled airlines have carried almost 500 million passengers.

Mr. President, in order to contrast that rate with the rates for other forms of transportation, let me point out that the National Safey Council figures show that 37,200 persons were killed on the highways of America last year, and that 24,200 of those fatalities occurred in passenger automobiles and taxicabs, at a rate of 2.3 fatalities per 100 million passenger-miles.

Mind you, Mr. President, the fatality rate for travel on the airways is only 0.5 per 100 million passenger-miles, as contrasted to that rate of 2.3 per 100 million passenger-miles in connection with travel by automobiles and taxicabs. Certainly we would not suggest that every person in the United States stop driving his automobile for 2 days, in order to stop accidents. Although that would stop accidents, it would also stop the country.

The total U.S. airlines industry—domestic and international—had 124 fatalities, and a rate of 0.39. Motor buses had 120, and a rate of 0.24; for railroad passenger trains, the preliminary figure is 61 fatalities, and a rate of 0.26. CAB testimony shows that the airline fatality rate—domestic and international—for 1959 is 0.68.

Mr. President, I submit those figures to back up my longheld contention that today a person who travels by airplane is safer than one who travels by any other form of transportation, unless it be when a person walks down a dark alley in the daylight, and even that is dangerous.

Mr. President, on yesterday, in criticizing the administration, this question was asked: "Why does not the administration determine why it is that the Military Air Transport Service was able, last year, to operate what is called the world's largest airline without a single fatality."

Mr. President, having raised the question about MATS, I call attention to the fact that General Quesada, who is the head of the Federal Aviation Agency, is trying to put into effect rules that MATS now has. The reason why MATS operates so safely is that it has excellently trained crews. I do not by that statement intend to downgrade the pilots of the airlines, because I have great faith in them. But MATS maintains constant schooling, checking, surveillance of flights, and constant checking to make sure pilots are able to handle all modern equipment. Again I do not reflect on airline pilots, because, as I said before, I have great faith in them.

General Quesada has been criticized for regulatory steps which have been taken by the Agency in the first year, as follows:

First. Air carrier flight crew training programs have been required to be submitted to the Agency for our approval.

Second. Qualification requirements have been raised for copilots serving on air carrier aircraft, and periodic checks of their competency required similar in many respects to those required for pilots in command.

Third. Improved and modernized medical standards for airman certification have been adopted.

Fourth. Upper age limitation of 60 years has been established for pilots serving in air carrier transportation.

Fifth. The skill and experience standards for certification of private and commercial pilots have been raised.

Sixth. Air carriers have been required to have airborne radar installed in transport category aircraft for weather surveillance purposes.

Seventh. Reasonable limitations have been imposed on the consumption of alcoholic beverages by passengers on air carrier flights.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed at this point in my remarks the details of these points I have made which General Quesada has been pushing.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

1. Each air carrier must obtain approval of its training program by the Federal Aviation Agency.

2. More comprehensive training must be given to air carrier copilots.

3. Proficiency checks must be given to air carrier copilots who serve as second in command by the FAA or by a designated check pilot of the air carrier. These proficiency checks must be given once each 12 months.

The new regulations will become effective on January 1, 1961. The 13-month period will permit the air carriers sufficient time to obtain approval of their training programs and to qualify their copilots under the new training and proficiency requirements. The air carriers are required to submit their training programs to the FAA for approval by May 1, 1960.

BACKGROUND INFORMATION

Air carrier training programs

Air carriers were previously given full control over their training program subject to inspection by FAA. Under this plan, FAA officials said, some carriers prepared and administered excellent training programs. Others, however, in the opinion of the FAA, did not achieve the minimum safety objectives sought by the training requirements of the civil air regulations.

Accordingly, the new regulations specify each air carrier is required to obtain FAA approval of its training program and any subsequent changes.

The new regulations do not alter the responsibility which each air carrier has at present for the preparation and administration of its training program.

Qualification of copilots

Prior to these new regulations, the air carriers were required to certify that their copilots had received instruction during initial flight training in landings and takeoffs and emergency procedures in each type aircraft they operated. This stipulation still holds.

The new regulations require additional initial training and practice in the following maneuvers and procedures in each type of airplane to be flown by the copilot in scheduled operations:

Taxiing; takeoffs and landings; climbs and climbing turns; slow flight; approach to stall; engine shutdown and restart; takeoff and landing with simulated engine failure; conduct of flight under simulated instrument conditions, including instrument approach at least down to circling approach minimum and missed approach procedures.

The copilot must also receive initial training and be proficient in the conduct of flight under simulated instrument conditions, utilizing all types of navigational facilities and the letdown procedures used in normal operations. Except for those approach procedures for which the lowest minimums are approved, all other letdown procedures may be given in a synthetic trainer (simulator) which contains the radio equipment and instruments necessary to simulate other navigational and letdown procedures approved for use by the air carrier.

Proficiency checks for copilots

The FAA said the previous system in which the pilot in command checks the copilot during daily operations is not adequate for assuring continued copilot proficiency.

Copilots must, under the new ruling, be given proficiency checks by an FAA or designated company check pilot. This flight check shall include a proficiency demonstration in flight maneuvers plus an oral or written equipment examination. Copilots will be given this proficiency flight check once every 12 months.

Qualifications for second in command in three-pilot crews

In the case of a three-pilot crew, previous regulations required the second in command to have the same airline transport pilot certificate and the rating for the aircraft held by the pilot in command. The new regulation adds to this requirement the stipulation that the second pilot in command must fulfill the same initial training requirements required of the pilot in command.

Proficiency checks for second in command in crews of three or more pilots

The new regulations require that proficiency checks shall be given by an FAA or company-designated check pilot. These proficiency checks must be the same as those given the pilot in command and must be given once every 12 months.

The amendment to part 29 of the Civil Air Regulations, "Physical Standards for Airmen," becomes effective October 15, 1959.

The disqualifying medical conditions which are spelled out in the new revision include: diabetes mellitus requiring insulin; coronary artery disease; a history of psychosis or certain other mental or nervous diseases including behavior disorders, chronic alcoholism, drug addiction, or epilepsy.

Dr. James Goddard, FAA, Civil Air Surgeon, said the number of persons who will be disqualified under the amended regulation is expected to be very small, since the policy over the years has been to deny medical certificates to persons with such defects.

The amendment applies to all three classes of medical certificates.

Latest available statistics which are based on calendar year 1957, indicate that only six-tenths of 1 percent of the 226,390 applicants for all 3 classes of medical certificates have been denied certification for medical conditions. Only three-tenths of 1 percent of the applicants were denied certificates because of diabetic, cardiovascular, or nervous and mental deficiencies.

It is anticipated that there will be little change in these statistics, since the manner in which the standards are administered will continue to be the same as they were prior to the revision. Medical progress, however, may reveal additional cases of persons with these defects in the future, through improved methods of identifying such cases. The advantage of the amendment is that the specific listing of the disqualifying physical conditions permits the Office of the Civil Air Surgeon to have a more effective administrative system for handling medical certification.

The notice of the proposed revision of the Physical Standards for Airmen (pt. 29 of the Civil Air Regulations) was published in the Federal Register, March 21, 1959, and circulated to interested parties for comment.

All of the views expressed were carefully considered with particular weight given to comments received from doctors and medical associations. As a result of the comments, one of the modifications made in the amendment concerned the proposal to eliminate the "limited medical certificate." In lieu of this, the amendment now specifies that the Civil Air Surgeon may issue a medical certificate to persons not meeting certain of the medical standards providing he has demonstrated ability to carry out pilot activities under usual and emergency conditions. This provision, however, does not apply to the diabetic, coronary artery disease, or nervous and mental diseases.

The FAA believes that because of the progressive deterioration of both physiological and psychological functions which normally occur with age, allowing pilots in this age group to remain in command of aircraft carrying up to 165 passengers at speeds of 550 miles per hour would be a hazard to safety in air carrier operations. These deteriorations result in significant medical defects.

The Federal Aviation Agency regulation is based on medical facts that clearly establish that sudden incapacitation due primarily to heart attack and strokes resulting from such defects become significantly more frequent in any group reaching age 60, and such attacks cannot be predicted on an individual basis by prior medical examinations. The hazards are further increased in the case of air carriers on scheduled airlines by the fact that older pilots fly the bigger and faster jets, carrying more passengers over greater distances, and into and over most heavily populated cities.

Other conditions which result from aging, and which were considered, relate to loss of ability to perform highly skilled tasks rapidly, to resist fatigue, to maintain physical stamina to unlearn or discard old techniques, and to apply the rapid judgment needed in changing and emergency situations.

